DICTIONARY

OF

CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

K

N.B.—Greek words beginning with K, and their derivatives, are generally given under C, as CATABASIA, CATALOGUS, CATECHUMEN, COENOBITUM.

KALENDS

KALENDS (Kalendæ), the first day of each month in the Roman calendar. The Rule of Fructuosus (c. 10) orders that on the first of each month (per capita mensium), the abbats of a district shall meet in one place, and earnestly celebrate monthly litanies, and implore the help of the Lord for the souls committed to their charge. The monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (§ 1, Migne, Patrologia, cv. 419) beg that they may be allowed, according to the custom of their fathers, to hold one vigil and say fifty psalms on the kalends of each month, for their brethren departed this life. This was in addition to the daily commemoration. (Martene, de Rit. Monach. II. xiii. 1.) For the observance of the Kalends of January in particular, see CIRCUMCISION, I. 394; NEW YEAR. [C.]

KEIVIN (or COEMGIN), abbat of Glendaloch [valley of the two lakes], in the county of Wicklow in Ireland, and bishop (ob. circa A.D. 618). He is commemorated on June 3 (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. i. p. 303). [R. S.]

KELLAC, bishop and martyr in Ireland (died early in the 7th century, A.D.), commemorated [especially at Eisceach, in Galway] on May 1. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. i. p. 106.) [R. S.]

KENELM, boy-martyr in England (ob. A.D. 819), son of Kenulf, king of Mercia, commemorated on July 17; especially at Winchelcombe Abbey, which had been built by his father. In the Sarum Breviary are three lessons for the day (add. to Usuard, Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. iv. p. 297). [R. S.]

KENTIGERN, bishop of Glasgow (circa A.D. 560), commemorated on Jan. 13. Some martyrologies also give July 1, "In Scotia, Translatio S. Kentigerni, ep. et conf." The reference, however, is quite unknown. (Molanus, Add. to Usuard; Acta Sanctorum, Jan. vol. ii. p. 97.) [R. S.]

KESSOG (or MACKESSOG), bishop of the provinces of Leven and Boia in Scotland (ob. circa A.D. 560), commemorated on March 10.

KEYS OF ST. PETER

KEYNA, virgin recluse of Brecon in South Wales, in the 5th or 6th century. From her Keynsham in Somersetshire, one of her abodes, is said to take its name; where the ammonites found in the neighbouring quarries were long attributed to her miraculous destruction of the serpents. She is commemorated on Oct. 8. (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. iv. p. 275.) [R. S.]

KEYS OF ST. PETER (IN ART). The key or keys appear to be one of the natural emblems of early civilisation, always conveying the idea of deputed authority and power. The abbé Auber (Symbolisme Religieux, vol. i. p. 199) speaks of the symbolic meaning of the keys in the Scandinavian-Gothic household. He further connects the prophecy of Isaiah xxii. 22, "I will set on his shoulder the key of the house of David," with Rev. iii. 7, where the church of Philadelphia is said to be in possession of the key of the house of David, and gives various interpretations of that expression, making it refer, very properly as it appears, to the Lord's Incarnation as a member of the house of David after the flesh, as the key or central doctrine of the Gospel. It seems unnecessary to follow him into the further meanings of the keys of hell in the Apocalypse; but it is preferable to take the symbol in its obvious meaning of deputed power, committed to the holder by a higher authority, as the Northern or Roman husband committed the keys of his house to the custody of his wife. (Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s.v. Matrimonium; Festus, s.v. Clavis.) "The bride saluted her husband with the words 'Ubi tu Caius ego Caia,' and after she had entered the house with distaff and spindle, she was placed on a sheepskin; and there the keys of the house were delivered into her hands." The distaff, spindle, and sheepskin will remind the Christian archaeologist of their frequent appearance on the sarcophagi.

The delivery of the keys to St. Peter occurs in early bas-reliefs. See D'Agincourt, Sculpture, planche viii. 11, where the apostle is certainly receiving a key, as it appears a single one, though two are delivered to him on other monuments. In Aringhi (t. i. p. 293) there appear to be two handles, though the wards of only one key are visible. On the sarcophagus on which this subject occurs, St. Peter is bearing the cross and receiving a roll of the Gospel from the Lord's hand, with another apostle. Martigny refers to Perret (vol. i. pl. vii.) for a remarkable but dubious fresco of the catacomb called Platonie,* where our Lord is seen half issuing from a cloud, with St. Peter on His right and St. Paul on the left, and giving the keys to the former. From Bottari (i. 185) we give a woodcut of this subject, which Bianchini regards as of great antiquity (note in Anast. Vita Urbani, n. 18). It forms part of the bas-relief round a vase. St. Peter and the keys appear next to our Lord in the church of St. Cecilia, in a mosaic restored by Paschal I., about 820 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. lii. 160).

From Martigny, after Bottari.

St. Peter is also represented with the keys on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Museum Veron. p. 484; Arch. Numm. vii. 22), and in the mosaic of the great vault of the basilica of St. Peter, on the Via Ostiensis, dated 441 (Ciampini, V. M. tab. lxxviii.); also in that of S. Maria in Cosmedin, at Ravenna, A.D. 553, where he seems to be presenting them before the throne of the Lamb (ibid. ii. tab. xxiii.). Martigny mentions a Greek MS. in the Vatican, dating as far back as the emperor Justin I., where St. Peter holds three keys on a large ring. (Alemani, de Lateranensis. parietin. tab. vii. p. 55. See also Perret, vol. iii. pl. xii.) Alemani considers the third key as conveying authority over the Empire and the temporal power in general. [R. St. J. T.]

KEYS, POWER OF THE. The metaphor implied in the symbolic use of the word "key" is obviously derived from the fact that he who has the key of a house can admit or exclude whom he will. Thus in Isaiah xxii. 22, the promise is given to Eliakim that on his shoulder shall be laid "the key of the house of David, . . . so he shall open and none shall shut; and he shall shut and none shall open." With a similar intention the Lord Himself is said (Rev. iii. 7) to have the "key of David," and again (Rev. i. 18) to have "the keys of hell and of death."

With the same use of metaphor our Lord gave the famous promise to St. Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xvi. 19), implying a power of opening and shutting the portals of the church on earth. We are not here concerned with the critical interpretation of the passage, but simply with the use of the term "power of the keys" (clavium potestas) in the ancient church.

The general belief of the fathers was, that the words were addressed to St. Peter as representing the whole church (Van Espen, de Censur. Eccl. c. 2, § 1; Opp. tom. iv. ed. Colon. 1777). Cyprian (de Unit. Eccl. c. 4) identifies the power given to St. Peter with that given to all the apostles after the Resurrection; it was given in the first instance (he thinks) to one man to indicate more emphatically the oneness of the church; and he proceeds to insist on the oneness of the episcopate. This power he seems in another place (Epist. 73, 7) to limit to the remission of sins in baptism. The power of "binding and loosing," and of putting away sins by the healing method or treatment (curatio peccata dimitendi), is expressly assigned to bishops in the treatise De Alectoribus (c. 1) in Cyprian's works (vol. ii. p. 93, ed. Hartel).

Augustine (c. Advers. Legis, i. 17) says expressly that Christ gave the keys to the church, and that St. Peter in receiving them represented the church. So also in commenting on St. John (Tract. 50, quoted by Gratian, causa 24, qu. 1, c. 6), he repeats that St. Peter in receiving the keys symbolised (significavit) the holy church; and again (Tract. 124) he says, "the church which is founded on Christ received from Him the keys of the kingdom of Heaven in the person of Peter, that is the power of binding and loosing sins." Leo the Great (Serm. 3 in Anniv. suae Assumpt. and Serm. 2 de Nat. Apost. in Gratian, cau. 24, qu. 1, c. 5) holds that the power in the church derived from St. Peter must be administered in the spirit of St. Peter in order to have validity: "manet ergo Petri privilegium, ubicunque ex ipsis fertur aequitate judicium, nec nimia est vel severitas vel remissio; ubi nihil erit ligatum, nihil solutum, nisi quod beatus Petrus aut solverit aut ligaverit."

The "power of the keys," then, is held to reside primarily in the church at large, though it be exercised through its bishops and other ministers. And, as Jansen (quoted by Van Espen, u. s.) has noted, in the primitive church sinners were in fact, after a first and second admonition, brought before the whole church of the place, that is, the whole body of Christians duly convened, and there, if found impenitent, excommunicated with the assent and approbation of all (1 Cor. v. 4). The evidence of Tertullian (Apol. c. 39) and Cyprian (Epist. 30, c. 5; 55, c. 5; 64, c. 1) shows that questions involving the reception or excommunication of a member of the church were not decided by the bishop alone, but by the bishop with the assent of the presbyters, deacons, and faithful laity. And although in after times the power of the keys came to be exercised by the ministers of the church and ecclesiastical judges without consulting the church, yet the source of that power remains in the church, so that it has always the right to prescribe the conditions on which that power is to be exercised. It is on the "power of the keys" that the right of the church to exclude offenders from its pale, and again to readmit them to its privileges and graces, to prescribe penance and grant absolution, is held to depend. The distinctions between the "forum internum," or penitential jurisdiction, and the "forum externum," or penal jurisdiction; and between the "potestas ordinis" and the "potestas jurisdictionis," were probably not drawn before the twelfth century (Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. vi. 25, § 12); with these therefore we are not here concerned. [EXCOMMUNICATION, PENITENCE.] [C.]

KIARA (or CEAR, CERA, etc.), virgin (ob. circa A.D. 680 according to her chronicler, though this date is probably too late), commemorated at Killchrea, in the south of Ireland, on Oct. 16. There is also another commemoration, perhaps of a translation, on Jan. 5 (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vol. vii. p. 950). [R. S.]

KIERAN (CIARAN, CIERAN, etc.) (1) bishop and abbat of Saigir in Ossory, in Ireland (ob. circa A.D. 520), commemorated on March 5. (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. i. p. 387.)

(2) Or Queran, abbat of Cluain-Mac-Nois, in Westmeath, in Ireland (ob. circa A.D. 548), to whom is due one of the most famous of the Monastic Rules of Ireland. He is commemorated on Sept. 9. (Mart. Usuard. "In Scotia, Querani abbatis." Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vol. iii. p. 370.) [R. S.]

KILIAN (KYLLENA, KILLENA, KILLINUS, CHILIANUS, etc.), the apostle of Thuringia and bishop of Würzburg, in the latter part of the 7th century, commemorated on July 8 (Usuard, Wandelbert, Rabanus, Notker). This day had its proper office, and seems to have had a vigil at an early period (Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. ii. p. 609). [R. S.]

KINDRED. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

KINEBURGA and KINESWITHA, virgins, daughters of Penda, king of Mercia (ob. A.D. 655), who, with their kinswoman Tibba, are commemorated on March 6, or according to some martyrologies on March 5. In one case, a separate commemoration of Kineswitha is assigned to Jan. 31 (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. i. p. 443). [R. S.]

KINEDUS (KYNEDUS, KINETHUS, etc.), hermit and confessor in Gower, in South Wales, in the 6th century (ob. circa A.D. 529), commemorated on August 1. (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. vol. i. p. 68.) [R. S.]

KINGS, PRAYER FOR. Prayers for the reigning Sovereign were introduced into the Liturgy at a very early date, in obedience to the injunction of St. Paul. In the so-called Clementine Liturgy we read: "Furthermore we implore Thee, O Lord, on behalf of the King, and those in high station (ἐν ὑπεροχῇ), and all the army." &c. Tertullian writes (ad Scapulam, c. 2): "We sacrifice for the safety of the Emperor; but to our God, and his, but in the manner which God has commanded, in simple prayer." So Arnobius (Contra Gentes, iv. 36), in a passage thought to refer to the Diocletian persecution: "Why have our writings deserved to be given to the flames; our meetings to be cruelly broken up, in which prayer is made to the Supreme God; peace and pardon asked for all in authority; soldiers, kings, friends, enemies; alike for those who are still alive, and for those released from the bonds of the flesh?" So also Cyril of Jerus. (Catech. myst. v.): "Then after that spiritual sacrifice is completed . . . we beseech God for the common peace of the churches, for the tranquillity of the world, for kings, for soldiers," &c. Many other patristic references to the practice might be adduced.^a St. Athanasius (Apol. ad Constan.) states that prayer was made in the liturgy for the heretical emperor Constantius; and Theophylact, on 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2, observes that the minds of Christians would probably be disturbed if ordered to pray for unbelieving kings at the time of the Holy Mysteries, and that St. Paul on this account gave as the motive for the command, and the inducement to obey it, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life.

In accordance with these passages the name of the reigning sovereign was inserted in the Diptychs which were read in the liturgy, and was so continued from the time of Leo the Great till the twelfth century.

The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom contains the following prayer in the canon (ἀναφορά); after the commemoration of the saints, and prayers for the orthodox bishop and clergy, the church and the "religious," follows:—"Moreover we offer unto Thee this reasonable service . . . on behalf of our most faithful and Christ-loving kings, and all their court [lit. palace, παλάτιον] and army. Grant them, O Lord, a peaceful reign, that in their tranquillity we too may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness." The Liturgy of St. Basil, in the corresponding place, contains the prayer: "Remember, O Lord, our most religious and faithful kings, whom Thou hast ordained to have rule upon earth. Invest them [lit. crown, στεφάνωσον] with the armour of truth, with the armour of Thy blessing: shelter their head in the day of battle: strengthen their arm: exalt their right hand: confirm their kingdom: subdue to them all barbarian nations, who wish for war: grant to them a deep peace which shall not be taken away: speak to their hearts good things concerning Thy Church and all Thy people, that in their tranquillity we may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness. Remember, O Lord, all rulers and authorities, and our brethren who are in the palace,^b and all the army."

Both the Liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil contain also the following prayer, immediately after that for the bishop and clergy, in the εἰρηνικά [see LITANY] at the beginning of the service, which are the same for both liturgies: "For our most religious and divinely-

^a e.g. Dion. Alex. (apud Euseb. Hist. vii. 11); St. Aug. (Ep. 59, ad Paulin.); Tertullian (Apol. 30, 31); St. Ambrose (de Sacr. iv. c. 4), &c.

^b ἐν τῷ παλάτιῳ. We should say, "who are about court," or "who are members of the household," but the expressions are somewhat too familiar to form part of a prayer.

protected kings, for all their court (παλάτιον) and army, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For his help to them in war, and that He will put under their feet every enemy and foe, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

The Roman canon contains, near the beginning: "Imprimis, quæ tibi offerimus pro ecclesia tua Sancta Catholica . . . una cum famulo tuo Papa nostro N., et Antistite nostro N., et Rege nostro N., et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.

There are also votive masses, pro imperatore and pro rege.

The following prayer is found in Roman missals from an early date.^d It is one of a series of intercessory prayers said on Good Friday, after the reading of the Passion according to St. John, headed successively: "Pro pace ecclesiae," "Pro Papa," "Pro universis gradibus ecclesiae," "Pro Imperatore," &c., and each introduced with its own preface of "Oremus," &c. That for the emperor is as follows:—

"Oremus et pro christianissimo Imperatore nostro N., ut Deus et Dominus noster subditas illi faciat omnes barbaras nationes ad nostram perpetuam pacem.

"Oremus. Flectamus genua. Levate. Omnipotens sempiterna Deus, in cujus manu sunt omnium potestates et omnium jura regnorum, respice ad Romanum benignus imperium; ut gentes, quæ in sua feritate confidunt potentiae tuæ dextera comprimentur. Per Dominum. Amen."

The Ambrosian canon has nearly the same words as the Roman: "una cum famulo et sacerdote tuo Papa nostro Ill.,^e et Pontifice nostro Ill. et famulo tuo Ill. Imperatore, sed et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.; and the two missal Litantes said on the Sundays in Lent, each contained a similar prayer: "Pro famulo tuo Ill. Imperatore, et famulâ tuâ Ill. Imperatrice, et omni exercitu eorum. R. Kyrie Eleison."

[Litany used on first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent.]

The Litany used on the alternate Sundays has an almost identical clause.

The Mozarabic Liturgy, in which the eucharistic intercession is short, contains, in its present form,^f no special prayer for the king.

Prayers for the king, however, are by no means confined to the Liturgy, but are found under varied forms scattered throughout the offices of the church.

Thus in those of the Greek Church the intercessions (εἰρηνικά) at the end of the daily mid-night office contain the clause, "Let us pray . . . for our most religious and divinely-protected kings,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For the prosperity and the efficiency of the Christ-loving army,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

Also at the end of Vespers is a prayer headed by the rubric, "And we confirm the kings, saying" (καὶ ἡμεῖς στερεοῦμεν τοὺς βασιλεῖς λέγοντες), which begins thus: "O King of heaven, confirm our faithful kings, establish the faith, calm the nations, give peace to the world," &c. The Euchology again contains a long prayer "for the king and his army," to be used in time of war and threatenings of war.

In the Latin Church we may refer to the ordinary form of Litany said according to Roman use on Fridays in Lent, St. Mark's Day, and the Rogation Days, which contains the petition, "Ut regibus et principibus Christianis pacem et veram concordiam [atque victoriam Saruni] donare digneris,

"Te rogamus audi nos."

And also to the verse "Domine saluum fac regem, R. Et exaudi nos in die qua invocaverimus te," which enters into the preces of Lauds and Vespers according to the Roman Breviary, and into those of Prime according to the Ambrosian.

[H. J. H.]

Prayer was also made for kings in the daily hour-offices. Thus the Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, de Septem Canoniceis Horis), desires the clergy, secular and monastic, in saying the ordinary offices, not to neglect to pray for kings and for the safety of the Christian church (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 367); and the monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (c. i. Migne, Patrol. cv. 419), pray the emperor, in the first place, that they may be permitted to continue their daily prayer for him and his children, and all Christian people, which they said after the Capitulum. KINGS, THE THREE. [EPIPHANY, I. 620.]

KISS—KISS OF PEACE (ἀσπασμός, εἰρήνη, osculum pacis, par, salutio).

The kiss, the instinctive token of amity and affection, from the earliest time found a place in the life and the worship of the Christian Church. The symbol of peace and love could nowhere find a more appropriate home, in its highest and purest idea, than in the religion of peace and love. As a form of Christian greeting, indicating the inner communion of spirit, "a holy kiss" is four times enjoined by St. Paul at the close of his Epistles (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26); and "a kiss of charity" (or "of love") once by St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 14). No limitation is expressed or implied. The Christians were simply bidden thus to "greet one another." Nor is there any doubt that the primitive usage was for the "holy kiss" to be given promiscuously, without any restriction as to sexes or ranks, among those who were all one in Christ Jesus; who thus, in St. Augustine's words, "in token of Catholic unity, when about to communicate in the church, demonstrated their inward peace by the outward kiss" (de Amicit. c. vi.). In the frequent allusions to the kiss of peace which occur in the early Christian worship, there is no reference to any restriction, while the cautions and admonitions we meet with as to its profanation and abuse plainly indicate the indiscriminate character of the salutation. A primitive extracanonical scripture, quoted by Athenagoras, A.D. 177 (Lecat. pro Christian. § 32), shews that the kiss was sometimes given a second time, in certain cases, for the gratification of appetite, ^c This clause is omitted in some modern editions of St. Chrysostom's liturgy.

^d It is in the collection of liturgies by Pamelius.

adding, "therefore the kiss, or rather the salutation, should be given with the greatest care, since, if there be mixed with it the least defilement of thought, it excludes us from eternal life." Clement of Alexandria also condemns "the shameless use of the kiss which ought to be mystic," with which certain persons "made the churches resound, occasioning foul suspicions and evil reports" (Paedagog. lib. iii. c. 11). Origen, too, commenting on Rom. xvi. 16, after stating that this and similar passages had given rise to the custom among the churches, for Christians after prayer to receive one another with a kiss, goes on to say that this kiss should be "holy, i.e. chaste and sincere; not like the kiss of Judas, but expressive of peace and simplicity unfeigned" (in Roman. lib. x. § 33). Tertullian speaks of the reluctance likely to be felt by a heathen husband that his wife should "meet any one of the brethren to exchange a kiss," "alicui fratrū ad osculum convenire" (ad Uxor. lib. ii. c. 4). The calumnious charges against the Christians to which this custom gave rise, joined to the real peril of it, especially when false brethren began to creep into the Church, led to the abrogation of the promiscuous salutation, and its restriction to persons of the same sex. The Apostolical Constitutions supply the earliest example of this distinction: "Let the deacon say to all, 'Salute ye one another with the holy kiss;' and let the clergy salute the bishop, the men of the laity salute the men, the women the women" (Const. Apostol. lib. viii. § 2). We find the same less distinctly stated in the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea (A.D. 371): "After the presbyters have given the peace to the bishop, then the laymen are to give the peace to one another" (Labbe, Concil. i. 1500). An early Oriental canon given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. Collect. vol. i. p. 222) from the collection of canons by Ebdnassalus (c. xii.), lays down the same rule: "The men shall kiss one another, but the women shall kiss other women; nor shall men give the kiss to them." It also prevailed in the Western Church. An Ordo Romanus, probably anterior to the 9th century, ordains that the "archdeacons should give the peace to the bishop first; then the rest in order; and the people, the men and women separately" (Muratori, tom. ii. p. 49). Amalarius, when speaking of the dangers and inconveniences which led to this limitation, remarks that if the men are distinguished from the women in their place in church, much more should they be in the reception of the kiss (de Eccl. Offic. lib. iii. c. 32).

This primitive custom seems to have been maintained in the Western Church till after the 13th century. We find from the acts of the Council of Frankfort, A.D. 794 (c. 50), and those of the Council of Mentz, A.D. 813 (c. 44), that it was practised in the 8th and 9th centuries. Cardinal Bona says that it is mentioned as still in use by Innocent III. (A.D. 1198-1216) in his Myst. Miss. (lib. vi. c. 5). But not long afterwards we first read of the introduction of a mechanical substitute for the actual kiss, in the shape of a small wooden tablet, or plate of metal, bearing a representation of the Crucifixion (Osculatorium, deosculatorium, pax). This, after having been kissed by the priest and deacon, was handed by the latter to the communicants, who, by all kissing it, were held to express their mutual love in Christ. This departure from primitive usage, in deference to the growing corruption, is attributed to the Franciscans by Bona (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). The earliest notice of these instruments is in the records of English councils of the 13th century (Scudamore's Notit. Eucharist. p. 438). The rite of the holy kiss has not entirely ceased in the Greek Church. In the Armenian Church the people simply bow to one another; but in the strictly Oriental churches, of whatever language, the kiss is observed without any difference (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 76).

The holy kiss originally formed an element of every act of Christian worship. No sacrament or sacramental function was deemed complete in its absence. To quote the words of Bona, "Osculum non solius communionis, sed et omnium Ecclesiasticarum functionum signaculum et sigillum, quod in omnibus Sacramentis adhiberi solebat" (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). Even common prayer without the kiss was considered to lack something essential to its true character. Tertullian calls it "signaculum orationis," "the seal of prayer," and asks "what prayer is complete from which the holy kiss is divorced? what kind of sacrifice is that from which men depart without the peace?" (Tert. de Orat. c. 18).

(a) Kiss of Peace at the Holy Communion.—The Holy Eucharist is the Christian rite with which the Kiss of Peace was most essentially connected, and in which it was preserved the longest. It is found in all primitive liturgies, and is mentioned or referred to by the earliest writers who describe the administration of the Lord's Supper. The primitive place of the holy kiss is that which it still maintains in the Oriental Church, between the dismissal of the non-communicants and the Oblation. The earliest author who mentions it, Justin Martyr, thus writes: "When we have ceased from prayer, we salute one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the president bread and a cup of wine," &c. (Apolog. i. c. 65.) St. Cyril of Jerusalem places it between the washing of the celebrant's hands and the Sursum corda. "Then the deacon cries aloud, 'Receive ye one another; and let us kiss one another.' . . . This kiss is the sign that our souls are mingled together, and have banished all remembrance of wrongs" (cf. Matt. v. 23), (Cat. Lect. xxiii., Myst. v. § 3). In the same way the 19th canon of the Council of Laodicea, already referred to, places "the Peace" before the holy oblation; and St. Chrysostom, "when the gift is about to be offered" (de Compunct. Cordis, lib. i. c. 3); and the Pseudo-Dionysius, at the time of the oblation of the bread and wine (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. 3). St. Chrysostom, in another passage, after describing the exclusion from the holy precincts of those who were unable to partake of the holy table, writes: "When it behoveth to give and receive peace, we all alike salute each other," and then proceeds to speak of the celebration of the "most awful mysteries" (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24, § 3).

The Apostolical Constitutions also introduce the Holy Kiss after the two prayers for the faithful before the Oblation (lib. viii. c. 11). The primitive liturgies are likewise unanimous in assigning to the kiss the same position in the Eucharistic ritual. In that of St. James it comes just before the Sursum corda and the Vere dignum, &c. (Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 30); in that of St. Mark it follows the Great Entrance, and immediately precedes the creed and the oblation of the people (ib. vol. i. p. 143); in those of St. Basil and St. Cyril it also occurs before the Anaphora (ib. pp. 12, 39), and occupies the same place in that of St. Chrysostom (ib. vol. ii. p. 243). In all it is introduced by a prayer asking for the gift of peace and unfeigned love, undefiled by hypocrisy or deceit (Collectio ad Pacem, Εὐχὴ τῆς εἰρήνης). The rite is also found in all Oriental (as distinguished from Greek) liturgies, and always follows the departure of the non-communicants, and precedes the Anaphora and Preface (Renaudot, vol. ii. pp. 30, 76, 134, &c.). It is introduced by three prayers (cf. Concil. Laod. can. 19), that of the Veil, that of the Kiss, and another of Preparation, but in uncertain order (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 435).

When we turn from the Eastern to the Western church we find the Kiss of Peace generally occupying a different position in the Eucharistic rite. It is not at all probable that in primitive times the usage of the Occidental was different from that of the Oriental church on this point. Indeed, in the earliest liturgies of the Spanish and Gallican churches, as well as in the most ancient forms of the Ambrosian rite, the Holy Kiss occupies its primitive position between the dismissal of the catechumens and the Preface. In the Mozarabic liturgy the collect of peace follows the prayer and commemoration of the living and the dead. The priest then says, "Make the peace as ye stand," and proceeds to give the kiss to the deacon, or acolythe, who gives it to the people while the choir chant "My peace I give unto you" &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, art. 12; Ord. 2, vol. i. p. 461; Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 15). The Gallican use was similar. A Gothic missal printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. ii. col. 517, s. q.) gives the Collectio ad Pacem, with petitions referring to the Kiss, immediately before the Preface, after the recitation of the diptychs and the collect post nomina (cf. Martene, u. s. Ord. i. p. 454). Its position is the same in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Muratori, u. s. col. 698, s. q.), and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (ib. col. 776 ff.), (cf. Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. 12, p. 369 ff.). The position of the kiss is also indicated by the mention of it by Germanus (bishop of Paris in the 6th century), immediately before the Preface (Exposit. de Missa, apud Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. vol. v. p. 95). But in the churches of Africa and Rome from the 5th century, when the earliest notices of it occur, onwards to the time of its virtual abrogation, it stands at a later period in the service, after the consecration, and immediately before the communion. Thus in a sermon included among those of St. Augustine, but more truly ascribed to Caesarius of Arles, we read: "When the consecration is completed, we say the Lord's Prayer. After that, Pax vobiscum is said, and Christians kiss one another with the Kiss which is the sign of peace." (Aug. Homil. de Diversis, lxxiii.)

The reference to the kiss in the undisputed

works of St. Augustin (e. g. Contra Iulianum Petilianum, lib. ii. c. 23; Homil. VI. in Joann. § 4) do not define its place in the ritual. From the letter to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium, ascribed to pope Innocent I., A.D. 416, "but certainly of later date" (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 437), we find that the Peace was given in some of the Latin churches previously to the consecration. Whether in the injunction that it should be given after the completion of the mysteries, that the laity might thus signify their assent to all that had been done, the writer was introducing a novelty, or reasserting the primitive Latin use, is warmly contested between Basnage (Annal. Eccl. Polit. anno 56) and Sala (iii. 352). Bona refutes the groundless assertion that the use of the Holy Kiss was first introduced into the Roman liturgy by Innocent I., "Non enim instituit, sed abusum emendavit" (Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 6). The impugned custom must probably have been the remnant of an earlier rule. Whatever may have been the date of the change of the position of the Kiss, in which respect they differed from all the other liturgies of the East and West, it is certain that in the liturgies of Milan, Rome, and Africa, the Salutation of Peace followed instead of preceding the consecration. On the conclusion of the canon, the bread being broken, and divided for distribution, and the Lord's Prayer recited, the clergy and people interchanged the Kiss of Peace, and all communicated. In the sacramentary of Gregory, the salutation follows the Lord's Prayer and precedes the Agnus Dei (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vetus, vol. ii. p. 6). The Ordo Romanus, earlier than the ninth century, given by Muratori (ib. col. 984, § 18), places it at the end of the canon while the host is being put into the chalice. "The archdeacon gives the peace to the bishop first, then to the rest" [of the ministers] "in order, and to the people" (§ 18). In the second Ordo, not much later, there is a slight variation in the rubric: "the rest [give the peace] in order; and the people, men and women, separately" (ib. col. 1027, § 12). In the liturgy of Milan, the Peace is bidden by the deacon before the priest communicates, in the words, "Offer the Peace to one another," to which the people respond, "Thanks be to God." The priest then says a secret prayer for the peace of the church, based on John xiv. 27, or, as an alternative, utters aloud, "Peace in heaven, peace on earth, peace among all people, peace to the priests of the church of God. The peace of Christ and the Church remain with us for ever." Then, according to the MS. printed in the revision of St. Charles Borromeo, A.D. 1560, he gives the peace with the formula, "Hold the bond of love and peace [habete vinculum instead of the more usual osculum], that ye may be meet for the sacrament mysteries of God" (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. vol. i. p. 478; lib. I. c. iv. art. 12, Ord. 3; Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. II. c. xvi. § 6, p. 584). This formula occurs also in the liturgies of York and Bangor, and may have been borrowed by Augustine from the older Gallican liturgies. The mention of the Kiss in the account of the Eucharist celebrated during a tempest at sea by Maximian, bishop of Syracuse—"they gave one another the kiss; they received the Body and the Blood of the Redeemer" (Gregor. Magn. Dial. lib. iii. c. 36)—also shews that at that time it came immediately before communion. In the modern Roman liturgy the Pax vobiscum stands in the same place, between the Lord's Prayer and the Agnus Dei.

At the conclusion of the eucharistic rite it was customary for the bishop to give the Kiss to the laity who had received it from him. On this custom see the notes of Valesius (in Cornel. Epist. IX. ad Fab.), in which he refers to Jerome (Epist. lxii.) and Paulus Diaconus (de Vit. Patr. Emeritens. c. vii.).

Before leaving this part of the subject, it may be mentioned that Tertullian informs us (de Orat. c. 18) that certain persons in his day objected to giving or receiving the Holy Kiss in public on a fast-day, "subtrahunt osculum pacis." This custom he strongly reprehends, not only because the kiss was the "seal of prayer," which was incomplete without it, but because such an omission of the accustomed rite proclaimed the act of fasting in violation of our Lord's injunction (Matt. vi. 17, 18). The same objection did not hold against the received custom of omitting the kiss on Good Friday, "die Paschae . . . merito deponimus osculum," because that was an universally acknowledged fast-day. An illustration of this omission may be derived from the remark of Procopius (Hist. Arcan. c. 9), that Justinian and Theodora began their reign with an evil omen, commencing it on Good Friday, a day when it was unlawful to give the salutation. The kiss was also omitted on Easter Eve, but was given on all other stated fasts (Muratori, in Tertull. loc. cit.). (Augusti, Handbuch der christ. Arch. vol. ii. p. 718, s. q.; Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. II. c. xvi. § 6-7; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xv. c. iii. § 3; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part iii. p. 485, s. q.; Goar, Eucholog. p. 134; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iii. §§ 4, 5; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. passim; Palmer, Antiq. of English Ritual vol. ii. pp. 100-103; Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. Collect. vol. i. p. 222, ff.; vol. ii. p. 76, ff.; Scudamore, Notit. Eucharist. c. ii. § 2, pp. 434-442.)

(b.) The Kiss of Peace at Baptism.—After the administration of the sacrament of baptism, the newly-baptized person, whether infant or adult, received the Holy Kiss as a token of brotherly love, and a sign of admission into the family of Christ. The kiss was first given by the baptizer and then by the other members of the congregation. There is a reference to this custom in a letter of Cyprian (ad Fidum Episcopum, Ep. lxiv. (lviii.) § 4), where the language is so beautiful that it deserves to be given at length. Cyprian is correcting the erroneous idea that an infant, as still impure, should not be baptized before the eighth day after its birth, asserting that as soon as it was born it was meet for baptism. He writes: "No one ought to shudder at that which God hath condescended to make. For although the infant is still fresh from its birth, yet it is not just that any one should shudder at kissing it, in giving grace, and making peace; since in kissing an infant every one of us ought, for his very religion's sake, to bethink him of the hands of God themselves, still fresh, which in some sort we are kissing in the man lately formed and freshly born, when we are embracing that which God hath made." This custom of giving the Kiss of Peace to infants at baptism Martene erroneously confines to the African church. But it is referred to not only by Augustine (Contr. Epist. Pelag. lib. iv. c. 8), but also by Chrysostom, (Homil. 50 de Utilitat. legend. Script.): "Because before his baptism he was an enemy, but after baptism is made a friend of our common Lord; we therefore all rejoice with him. And upon this account the kiss is called 'peace' (τὸ φίλημα εἰρήνη καλεῖται), that we may learn thereby that God has ended the war, and brought us into friendship with Himself." A relic of this rite still survives in the Pax tecum found in many baptismal rituals (Augusti, Handbuch, vol. ii. p. 451; Bingham, bk. xii. c. iv. § 6; Binterim, vol. i. c. i. § 2, p. 163; Rheinwald, Kirchlich. Archäolog. II. iii. § 108).

(c.) The Kiss at Ordination.—The imparting of the brotherly kiss to the newly ordained formed an essential element of the service for the ordination of presbyters and bishops in all churches. It is enjoined in the Apostolical Constitutions in the ordination of bishops: "Let him [the newly consecrated bishop] be placed in his throne, in a place set apart for him among the rest of the bishops, they all giving him the kiss in the Lord" (ap. Const. lib. viii. c. 5), and is mentioned by the Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccl. hierarch. c. v. p. 2, § 6), who states that the newly ordained presbyter was kissed by the bishop and the rest of the clergy. So also in the Sacramentary of Gregory, in the consecration of a bishop, we find the direction, at the conclusion of the rite, after the delivery of the ring, staff, and gospels: "then the elect gives the kiss to the pope, and to all the deacons. The archdeacon holding him conveys him into the presbytery, and he gives the kiss to the bishop and the presbyters." He is again kissed by the pope on the reception of the host (Muratori, u. s. vol. ii. col. 442). At the ordination of presbyters they are similarly enjoined to give the kiss of peace to the ordaining bishop, and then to the bishops, presbyters, deacons, and other ministers who are present, and they receive it themselves from the ordaining bishop at the holy communion, and are thrice kissed by him at the conclusion of the rite with the words, pax Domini sit vobiscum (ibid. col. 429, 430). In the Greek church the order is the same, both with bishops and presbyters. In the ordination of the patriarch of Alexandria the kiss is given in the same place, and in the same order (Renaudot, vol. i. p. 481); while in that of a presbyter, after the imposition of hands, the stole is brought over the right shoulder of the new presbyter, the casula is put on, and he then kisses the bishop and presbyters, and goes and takes his stand among them, reading his missal. (Goar, Eucholog. p. 298, b; Bingham, bk. ii. c. xi. § 10; c. xix. § 17; bk. iv. c. vi. § 15; Binterim, vol. i. part i. p. 492; Augusti, Hdbch. vol. iii. p. 242.)

(d.) At Espousals.—On the espousal of two Christians, the contract was solemnly ratified by a kiss given by the man to his future wife. This was an innocent custom dictated by nature, adopted by the members of the church from their heathen ancestors, among whom the marriage rite was ratified by the kiss, "uxorem aut maritum tantum osculo putari" (Quintil. Declamat. 276). It is mentioned by Tertullian as an old heathen custom (de Veland. Virgin. c. 11). So much stress is laid on the kiss as the ratification of espousals, that Constantine made the inheritance of half the espousal donations, on the death of one party before the consummation of the marriage, to depend on the kiss having been given or not. (Cod. Theodos. lib. iii. tit. 5; de Sponsalibus, leg. 5; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 3; de Donat. ante Nupt. leg. 16); (Bingham, bk. xxii. ch. iii. § 6; Binterim, vol. vi. part 2, p. 164.)

(e.) To the Dying.—The kiss dictated by natural affection to dying friends was not forbidden by the church of Christ. We find it mentioned by the Pseudo-Amphilochius in his life of St. Basil (c. 129). It is prescribed in several early monastic rituals in the case of a sick monk; e.g. in the ritual of the abbey of St. Giles of Noyon, ante ann. 500. After receiving extreme unction, the mouth of the sick man is washed, he then first kisses the cross, and afterwards all who are present; and in that of St. Ouen of Rouen, c. A.D. 400, where, after communion, the sick man kisses the cross, and is then kissed by the priest, and afterwards by all the monks present in succession, each asking pardon of him both before and after the kiss. (Martene, u. s. lib. ii. c. 11; lib. iii. c. 15; Ordo viii., xii.)

(f.) To the Dead.—At the funerals the voice of nature was again listened to, and a final kiss was given to the corpse before the actual interment. This tribute of natural affection is mentioned by Ambrose on the occasion of the funeral of his brother Satyrus: "Procedamus ad tumulum, sed prius ultimum coram populo valedico, pacem prædico, osculum solvo" (Ambros. de Excessu Satyri, c. 17). The Pseudo-Dionysius describes how, after the prayer made by the priest over the dead body, it is kissed by him, and then by all who are present (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. vii. § 8). We learn also from Goar that it was given to the dead (Eucholog. p. 542), and the custom is punctually observed in the Greek church to the present day. The prohibition of the kiss by the Council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (Concil. Autissiodor. can. 12) had reference to the superstitious practice of administering the eucharist, with which, as we have seen, the Osculum pacis was inseparably connected, to the dead: "Non licet mortuis nec Eucharistiam, nec osculum tradi" (Augusti, Hdbch. vol. iii. p. 306; Bingham, bk. xxiii. ch. iii. § 14).

(g.) As a Mark of Reverence and Respect.—As a token of reverence it was the habit to kiss not only the hands, feet, and vestments of bishops and other ecclesiastics, but also the walls, doors, thresholds, and altars of the sacred buildings. The references to this custom are very frequent. Paulinus, the biographer of St. Ambrose, says this token of respect was commonly paid to priests in his day (Vit. Ambros. p. 2). St. Ambrose himself refers to the hands of priests being kissed by kings and princes when requesting their prayers (de Dignitat. Sacerd. c. ii.), and St. Chrysostom relates how, on the first arrival of Meletius at Antioch, the people eagerly touched his feet and kissed his hands (Hom. de Melet. § 2, p. 521). But no more need be remarked on a custom so common in all countries.

The custom of kissing the pope's feet is of considerable antiquity. In the ordinals included in the sacramentary of Gregory the newly ordained presbyter is enjoined to kiss the feet of the ordainer, and the newly consecrated bishop of the consecrating pontiff. In the latter case, if the pope be not the consecrator, the mouth is to be kissed instead of the feet (Muratori, u. s. cols. 429, 443). In the Ordo Romanus of a pontifical mass, the deacon is directed to kiss the pope's feet before reading the Gospels (ib. col. 1022, § 8). The earliest mention of this mark of homage in Anastasius (Vitæ Pontif. Roman.) is in the case of Constantine, A.D. 708-714, before whom Justinian the younger prostrated himself, on meeting him in Bithynia, wearing his crown, and kissed his feet (Anastas. xc. § 173).

The reverent affection of the early Christians for the house of God and everything belonging to it was indicated by embracing and kissing the doors, threshold, pillars, and pavement of the church, and above all, the holy altar. We have a striking example of this last in an account given by St. Ambrose of the eagerness manifested by the soldiers who brought the welcome intelligence of the revocation of the young Valentinian's decree for surrendering the Porcian basilica to the Arians, to rush to the altar and kiss it [Ambros. Epist. xxxiii. (xiv.)]. So Athanasius speaks of those who "approach the holy altar, and with fear and joy salute it" (Homil. adv. eos qui in Homine spem figunt, tom. ii. p. 304), and the Pseudo-Dionysius, of "saluting the holy table" (Eccl. Hierarch. c. ii. § 4). The custom of kissing the doors is vividly depicted in Chrysostom's words: "See ye not how many kiss even the porch (πρόθυρα) of this temple, some stooping down, others grasping it with their hand, and putting their hand to their mouth" (Homil. xxx. i.; 2 Cor. xiii. 12). Prudentius also speaks of those who

"Apostolorum et martyrum Exosculantur limina."

Peristeph. Hymn ii. vv. 519, 520.

And again—

"Oscula perspicuo figunt impressa metallo."

Peristeph. Hymn xi. v. 193.

And Paulinus describes a rustic who, having lost his oxen, and appealing to St. Felix for their restoration—

"Sternitur ante fores et postibus oscula figit."

Natal. vi. Felicitis, v. 250.

These prostrations and kisses must be regarded as nothing more than natural tokens of reverence and affection. The kisses of the altar, the Book of the Gospels, the sacred vessels, &c., which occur so abundantly in the early rituals, have a distinctly liturgical character (see Martene, u. s. lib. i. c. iv. art. 3, § 2, and art. 5, § 6; Goar, Euchol. p. 298, b). KNEELERS. [PENITENTS.]

KNEELING. [GENUFLEXION, I. 723.]

KNOP (Nodus, pomellum), the bulbous ornament on the stem of a chalice. It is found in some of the earliest known chalices, though it could not be said that every chalice had a knop amongst the earliest Christians. The cups on all the so-called Jewish coins represented in Migne, Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Sacrée, all have a knop. It will be enough, he says, to consult these in order to get an idea of the form of the chalice actually used by our blessed Lord at the institution of the Eucharist. It may be observed that all the chalices figured on Jewish coins of the time of Simon the Maccabee (B.C. 143—B.C. 135) seem to be uniformly provided with a knop (Madden, History of Jewish Coinage, p. 43, ed. 1864). Hence it appears that the knop in the sacred cup was pre-Christian.

The chalices that have survived to us from the period traversed in this work are extremely rare; and the examples of the knop within the same period are therefore rare also. (See Mr. Albert Way on 'Ancient Ornaments, Vessels, and Appliances of Sacred Use,' Archæological Journal, vol. iii. p. 131). The knop, however, occurs in what Dr. Lübke describes as "the oldest^a of the chalices known in Germany," which was given to the Monastery of Kremsmünster by the Duke Tassilo, who founded the monastery in the year 777 (Ecclesiastical Art in Germany, p. 140, ed. 1876, Engl. transl.). Amongst the decorations of this chalice is a figure of our Lord, in the act of benediction. From the position of His hand the chalice seems to be of Eastern origin. The Gourdon Chalice, which Labarte (Histoire des Arts industriels, vol. i. p. 495, ed. 1864) shews to have been buried between A.D. 518 and A.D. 527, stands upon a conical stem, and has a bead, the germ of the knop, at the junction. This is the earliest example known. [CHALICE, I. 338.]

It is a mistake to suppose that the knop was invented for the purpose of adding strength to the chalice-stem,—a result which it could not effect, for the strength of a knopped stem would still be only the strength of its weakest or thinnest part. It may have been introduced first for the purpose of decoration, though afterwards it was expressly adopted to assist the priest in holding the chalice between his fingers in the act of consecration. He joins his finger and thumb, and then holds the chalice with the remaining fingers. In the Latin rite the priest while holding the sacred host in his right hand over the chalice is directed to hold the chalice itself in his left hand, "per nodum infra cupam." The dates given above shew that the knop existed before the doctrine of Transubstantiation was formulated.

Authorities.—The writer is not aware of any monograph on the subject in any language. The knop is not even mentioned in the Hieroglexicon by the brothers Macri. Fol. Romæ, 1677. But besides the works quoted above, the reader may consult Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxi. p. 336 and vol. xxii. p. 21; the Arundel Society's publication on Ecclesiastical Metal Work of the Middle Ages, and Diversarum Artium Schedula, by Theophilus. KOINONIKON (Κοινωνικόν). [Compare COMMENDATORY LETTERS, I. 407.] I. A letter of communion given to travellers, enabling them to communicate with the Church in the place to which they journeyed. The Nomocanon of the Greeks (c. 454; Cotel. Monum. Gr. i. 142) orders that "no stranger be received (to communion) without a koinonikon." Such letters were also called ἐπιστόλια or εἰρηικά, as by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Can. 11): "We have decreed that all the poor and those needing help shall, after investigation, travel with letters (epi-stolia), that is to say, with ecclesiastical eirenica only, and not with letters of commendation" (συστατικοῖς; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 1). The former word, epistolium, we find used in the West, as by the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 566, which decreed "that no one of the clergy or laity, except the bishop, presume to give epistolia" (Can. 6). The other name, eirenica, is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341: "No stranger is to be received without letters of peace" (Can. 7); Sim. in the West, Conc. Elib., as below.

It appears that the issue of such letters of communion had to be watched and regulated in every part of the Church. Thus the Council of Antioch (Can. 8) allowed chorepiscopi to grant them, but forbade presbyters. From the Council of Eliberis, A.D. 305 (Can. 25), we learn that intending travellers sometimes obtained them from confessors, as the lapsed did their libelli: "To every one who has brought confessors' letters are to be given letters communicatory, the confessor's name being cancelled, forasmuch as, under the glory of this name, they everywhere astonish the simple." The same Council (Can. 31) forbade women (supposed to be the wives of bishops and presbyters) to write litteræ pacificæ for the laity, or to receive them. The Council of Arles, in 314 (Can. 9):—"Concerning those who present letters of confessors, it is decreed that such letters be taken from them, and that they receive others communicatory." The Council of Carthage, A.D. 348 (Can. 17): "Let no clerk or layman communicate in a strange congregation (in alienâ plebe) without his bishop's letters." The Council of Agatha, in 505 (Can. 52), and that of Epône in 517 (can. 6): "Let no one grant communion to a presbyter, or deacon, or clerk, travelling without his bishop's letters."

In the Capitularies of the French kings we find these documents called litteræ peregrinorum, travellers' letters (cap. v. an. 806, tom. i. col. 456), and formatae (1225). The last name is given to them by the Council of Milevi, A.D. 416 (Can. 20): "It is decreed that any clerk who desires to go to court, wherever it be, on his own business, shall receive a formata from his bishop. But if he shall choose to go without a formata, let him be removed from communion." [FORMA, I. 682.]

II. The same names were given to those letters which bishops, on their ordination, sent to other bishops as an offer and claim of communion, and to letters which passed between bishops at any time as a token of adherence to the same faith. Thus Cyril of Alexandria, "If John, the most religious bishop of Antioch, subscribe it (a confession of faith), . . . then give to him τὰ κοινωνικά" (Inter Acta Conc. Eph. Labbe, iii.); that is, as the ancient translation of the West renders it,—the letters communicatory" (Nov. Coll. Conc. col. 910; Baluz. Synodicon, c. 204). A more common expression was κοινωνικά γράμματα. This is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 269, when announcing to the popes of Alexandria and Rome the election of Domnus to the see of Antioch. It requested them to send him letters of communion, that they might receive the like from him in return (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30). Using the same term, St. Basil challenges those who accused him of being in communion with Apollinarius to produce any letters of communion that had passed between them (Epist. 345; tom. ii. p. 1122). The same expression used by Cyril of Alexandria (Ep. ad Maximian. inter Acta Conc. Eph. c. 81) is rendered in the ancient Latin version of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus by the unusual phrase of litterae communicativae (Baluz. Nova Collect. Concil. col. 597). In the version of his epistle to Theognostus (Synod. c. 85) we have the more common litterae communicatoriae (col. 793). St. Augustine, writing in 397, says: "We wrote to some of the chiefs of the Donatists, not letters of communion (communicatorias litteras), which now for a long time, owing to their perversion from the Catholic unity throughout the world, they do not receive, but such private letters as it is lawful for us to address even to Pagans" (Ep. xliii. § 1). He repeats this in his work Contra Litteras Petilianus (I. 1). The same father declares the bishop of Carthage to be "united per communicatorias litteras to the Church at Rome, . . . and to other lands, whence the gospel had come to Africa" (Ep. xliii. § 7). He again and again speaks of such letters as a sign and proof of the intercommunion of churches (ibid. §§ 8, 16, 19). These letters, like those granted to travellers, came under the general head of formatae. Thus Augustine, speaking of a schismatical bishop, says, "We asked whether he could give letters communicatory, which we call formatae, where I wished" (Ep. xlv. § 5).

III. A troparion in the Greek liturgy, which is varied for "the day or the saint" (Goar, Lit. Chrys. p. 81; Typicon Sabae, 7). It is now sung after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and before the hot infusion and fraction. Originally, however, it was sung, as its name implies, during the communion of the people. This is evident from the following statement in the Chronicon Paschale of Alexandria (tom. i. p. 714; ed. Niebuhr). "This year, in the month Artemisius, the Roman May, 12th Indiction, under Sergius the Patriarch of Constantinople, was first introduced the custom that after all have received the holy Mysteries, while the clerks are removing the precious fans, patens, and cups, and other sacred utensils, also after the distribution of the Eulogiae from the side-tables, and the singing of the last verse of the koinonikon, this antiphon should be sung, Let our mouth be filled with praise," &c. This was in the year 624 of our era. In the Liturgy of St. James, from which the Greek is derived, the words, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is" (from Ps. 34), are both said by the priest and sung by the choir (Cod. Liturg. Assen. v. 57) before the communion of the former; but probably the Greek anthem rather took the place of four psalms (23, 34, 145, 117), which were said at the fraction in St. James. A shorter form would be sufficient, when the communicants became fewer. The words, "O taste," &c., were sung at Jerusalem in the 4th century, after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and therefore also before the communion. St. Cyril, addressing the newly baptized, says (Catech. Myst. v. 17), "After this ye hear him who sings with divine melody, exhorting you and saying, 'O taste,'" &c. In St. Mark's Liturgy, the celebrant says a certain prayer, "or else, Like as the hart," &c., i.e. Psalm 42 (Liturg. Orient. Renaud. i. 162); but there is no proper koinonikon. In the Clementine "the 33rd Psalm (34th) is to be said while all the rest are communicating" (Coteler. i. 405). The Armenian Liturgy provides proper hymns to be sung by the choir, "while they who are worthy are communicating" (Le Brun, Diss. x. art. 21). In the Coptic rite "they sing from the psalm" during the fraction, which is followed immediately by the communion of the celebrant (Renaud. i. 24). In the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil, "the people say the 50th (51st) Psalm and the koinonikon for the day" between the fraction and the communion (Renaud. i. 84, 345). In that of St. Gregory, only the 105th Psalm is then said (ibid. 124). In the Syrian St. James, used both by Melchites and Jacobites, and therefore earlier than the schism, the koinonikon is represented by an invitational, sung by the deacon and subdeacons while the people are communicating (Renaud. ii. 42): "The Church cries, My brethren, receive the body of the Son; drink His blood with faith, and sing His glory," &c. A similar form occurs in the Nestorian Liturgy (ibid. 596; Lib. Malab. Raulin, 326). According to the Abyssinian, which comes from St. Mark, "skilled persons chant some verses, while the sacrament is ministered to the people, . . . which the people repeat singing" (Biblioth. Max. PP. xxvii. 663).

The Greek koinonikon corresponds to a hymn which they began to sing at Carthage in St. Augustine's time, "when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people" (Retract. ii. 11); to the Antiphona ad Communionem of Rome, said to have been introduced by Gregory I. (Honorius, Gemma Animae, i. 90); and to the Antiphona ad Accedentes of the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, p. 7). In the last, we may observe, the anthem from Whitsun Eve to Lent, and on All Saints' day is, "O taste and see," &c., so familiar to the East. It cannot now be ascertained whether anything was sung during the communion in the original liturgy of Gaul (Liturgia Gallicana, Mabill. 53). [W. E. S.]

KYRIE ELEISON. [LITANY.]

LABARUM. In Christian antiquity the military standard bearing the sacred monogram ✠ P, adopted by the emperor Constantine as an imperial ensign subsequently to his celebrated vision and the victory over Maxentius, as described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. i. c. 28-31), and in later times the device itself, or the cross alone. The labarum has often been spoken of as if it were something altogether novel both in form and use (Gretser, de Cruce Chr. vol. i. p. 493). But the thing, and probably also the name, were already familiar in the Roman army. The labarum of Constantine was, in fact, nothing more than the ordinary cavalry-standard (vexillum), from which it differed only in the Christian character of its symbols and decorations. Like that it preserved the primitive type of a cloth fastened to the shaft of a spear, and consisted of a square piece of some textile material elevated on a gilt pole, and suspended from a cross bar, by which it was kept expanded. The eagle of victory surmounting the shaft was replaced by the sacred monogram contained within a chaplet. The emblems embroidered on the banner were also Christian. They were usually wrought in gold on a purple ground. To the eye of the early Christians, accustomed to discern the emblem of salvation in everything around them, the cruciform framework of the Roman standard had already marked it out as an appropriate symbol of the true faith. "In your trophies," writes Tertullian (Apolog. c. 16), "the cross is the heart of the trophy . . . those hangings of the standards and banners (cantabrorum aliter labarorum) are the clothings of crosses": and Minucius Felix (c. 29), "the very standards, and banners (cantabra aliter labara), and flags of your camps, what are they but gilded crosses, imitating not only the appearance of the cross but that of the man hanging on it." Nor was there one of the Roman ensigns the consecration of which to the honour of Christ would have so powerful an influence, especially on the army. For, as Sozomen informs us, "it was valued beyond all others, being always carried before the emperor, and worshipped by the soldiery as the most honourable symbol of the Roman power" (Soz. H. E. lib. i. c. 4). When therefore Constantine adopted it, consecrated by the symbols of his newly adopted faith, as "the saving sign of the Roman empire" (σωτήριον σημεῖον τῆς Ῥωμαίων ἀρχῆς), he took the surest method of uniting both divisions of his troops, pagans and Christians, in a common worship, and leading those who still clung to the old religion to a purer faith, since, to quote Tertullian again (u. s.), "the camp religion of the Romans was all through a worship of the standards."

Neither was the word labarum a newly-coined one. Even if the various reading, labarum for cantabrum, in Tertullian and Minucius Felix is rejected, Sozomen, when describing the result of Constantine's vision, speaks of it as a word already in use—"he commanded the artists to remodel the standard called by the Romans labarum"—τὸ παρὰ Ῥωμαίοις καλούμενον λάβωρον (H. E. lib. i. c. 4). According to Suicer (sub voce) the word came into use in the reign of Hadrian, and was probably adopted from one of the nations conquered by the Romans. The orthography varies in different writers, as is usual with a half-naturalised foreign word. It is written λάβωρον by Sozomen and Nicephorus (H. E. vii. 37), and λάβουρον by Chrysostom (Homil. iii. in 1 Tim.), who speaks of it as "the royal standard in war usually called laburum." Its derivation is still uncertain, "in spite," writes Gibbon, "of the efforts of the critics, who have ineffectually tortured the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Celtic, Teutonic, Illyric, Armenian, &c., in search of an etymology." We find λαμβάνω, "to seize;" εὐλάβεια, "piety;" λάβωρα, "spoils;" λαῖφος, a "cloak;" and even the Latin labor, with other still more far-fetched derivations enumerated by Gothofried (Cod. Theod. vol. ii. p. 142). Ducange's derivation from a supposed Celtic root, lab hair = panniculus exercitus, is repudiated by Celtic scholars. The word is most probably of Basque origin, in which language, according to Baillet (Dictionnaire Celtique, s. v.) labarva signifies a standard. According to Larramendi (Diccionario Trilingue), the word is of Cantabrian origin, and is derived from lauburu, signifying anything with four heads or limbs, such as the cruciform framework of a military standard. Cantabrum, used as a synonym for labarum, indicates the country from which it was derived.

The form of the labarum is very minutely described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. i. c. 31): "A long spear, overlaid with gold, formed the figure of a cross by means of a transverse bar at the top. At the summit of the whole was fixed a wreath of gold and precious stones, within which the symbol of the title of salvation was indicated by means of its first two letters, the letter P being intersected by X in the centre (χρῆζομένου τοῦ ρ κατὰ τὸ μεσάιτατον) . . . From the cross bar of the spear was suspended a square cloth of purple stuff profusely embroidered with gold and precious stones. Beneath the crown of the cross, immediately above the embroidered banner, the shaft bore golden medallions of the emperor and his children." This original standard formed the pattern of others which Constantine ordered to be made to be carried at the head of all his armies. Fifty of the stoutest and most religious soldiers, ὕπασπισται, were selected by him as the perpetual guard of the labarum, which was to be borne by them singly by turns. Eusebius relates a story he had heard from the emperor himself of a fierce engagement in which the soldier whose duty it was to carry it, panic struck, transferred the labarum to another and fled, paying for his cowardice with his life, while the soldier who boldly carried the sacred symbol escaped unhurt (Euseb. u. s. lib. ii. c. 8). Not content with having it represented on his standards, Constantine commanded that the monogram should also be engraved on the shields of his soldiers (ib. lib. iv. c. 21). Lactantius (de Mort. Persec. c. 44) is silent as to the standard, and only records the representation on the shields—"transversa X litera, summo capite circumflexo (i.e. with a line drawn through the middle and turned into a loop at the top, forming the letter Rho) Christum in scutis notat."

Prudentius describes the monogram as decorating both the standards (the labarum proper) and the shields of Constantine's army on his triumphal entrance into Rome after the defeat of Maxentius.

"Christus purpureum gemmanti textus in auro
Signabat labarum; clypeorum insignia Christus Scripserat; ardebat summis crux addita cristis."

and again:

"Agnoscas Regina (Roma) libens mea signa necesse
est,
In quibus effigies crucis aut gemmata refulget,
Aut longis solido ex auro praeferatur in hastis."

Id. 464-466.

and speaks of its acceptance by the senate as an object of adoration:

"Tunc ille senatus
Milittiae ultro citius titulum, Christique verendum
Nomen adoravit quod collucebat in armis."

Id. 494-496.

Paulinus furnishes us with a singularly detailed description of the monogram, forming a golden cross, depending from a "corona lucis," in the basilica of St. Felix at Nola, explaining how all the characters of XPICTOC are contained in it:

"Nam nota, qua bis quinque notat numerante Latino

The notes of Muratori on this curious, and not very easily intelligible, passage, should by all means be consulted.

Once adopted by Constantine as the imperial ensign, it was continued by his successors. Ambrose, begging the emperor Theodosius to take forcible possession of a Jewish synagogue, exhorts him to order his troops to carry in "his victorious ensign," i.e. the labarum consecrated with the name of Christ (Epist. lib. vi. Ep. 29); and in another passage utters the following prayer for the success of Gratian's arms against the Goths: "Turn, O Lord, and raise the standard of Thy faith. Here it is not the eagles, nor the flight of birds that lead the army, but Thy Name, O Lord Jesus, and Thy worship" (Ambros. de Fide, lib. ii. ad fin.). The sacred symbols were naturally removed from the standards by Julian (Soz. H. E. lib. v. c. 17; Greg. Naz. cont. Julian I. tom. i. p. 75), but were restored by Jovian and his Christian successors, and continued to be borne by the later Byzantine emperors.

Examples of the labarum, both as a standard and as borne on the shield, in different forms, are abundantly furnished by the series of imperial medals given by Ducange in his Familiae Augustae Byzantinae, which usually forms part of the same volume with the Constantinopolis Christiana, from which the subsequent illustrations are chiefly drawn.

No. 2. Coin of Constantius II. and Constans.

Fig. 1 is from a tiny coin of Constantine II., "a third brass of the smallest size." The engravings are much larger than the coins they represent. This "most important of the numismatic memorials of the triumph of Christianity," "of a rarity commensurate with its interest," (C. W. King, Early Christian Numismatics, p. 25), represents the labarum as described by Eusebius. The spiked end of the shaft of the banner transfixes a serpent (cf. Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 3). On the banner are emblazoned three roundels (interpreted by Mr. King's engraver, but without sufficient warrant, as DEO), above is the sacred monogram; on the exergue CONS. The obverse bears "the boyish, not to be mistaken, features of Constantine II." (Ibid.) Examples of Constantine I. with the same reverse type are in existence [NUMISMATICS].

Fig. 2, of Constantine II. (tab. v. p. 21), represents him in military dress, standing on a galley, steered by Victory. He bears a phoenix on a globe in his right hand, and in his left the labarum in the form of a banner, with the sacred monogram; the motto is Fel(l)icium Temp(orum) reparatio. This was a favourite device with Constantius II. and Constans (King, u.s., p. 68). Fig. 3, a coin of Constans (tab. xi. p. 33), shews the emperor holding a labarum of the same form in his right hand, with the motto Triumphator Gentium barbararum. This design is frequently repeated, e.g. tab. xii., xiii., pp. 35, 37; tab. ii. p. 56. The emperor is sometimes represented holding the labarum in one hand and seizing a captive in the other, e.g. a coin of Gratian (fig. 4, tab. ii. p. 56); at other times trampling a captive under foot (tab. xiii. p. 37). A not unfrequent design represents the labarum planted in the ground with fettered captives seated beside it, e.g. tab. vi. p. 23; vii. p. 25; viii. p. 27, &c. Sometimes we find the sacred monogram on a shield, as in fig. 5, a coin of Aelia Flaccilla, wife

LABORANTES. [COPIATAE; FOSSARII.]

LABRA (λάβρα), a form of the Egyptian word laḅra, a lane or narrow street (Epiphan. Haeres. 69), has been misunderstood (Macri, Hierolex. s. v. Labra) as equivalent to "parish" or "district." See LAURA. [C.]

LACERNA. [BIRRUS; PAENULA.]

LACRYMATORY. A name given by some modern antiquaries to certain small vessels not unfrequently found in tombs, once supposed to be intended to contain tears. They are in fact Vasa unguentaria, vessels intended to contain perfumes, like the ἀλάβαστρον of the Gospels. (Matt. xvi. 7, etc.) See Roman Antiquities found at Rouggham, described by the late Prof. Henslow; edited by Prof. Churchill Babington; Beccles [1872]. Prof. Babington refers to Millin, Dict. des Beaux-Arts, s. v. Lacrymatoire. [C.]

LACTANTIUS, Bede; LETATIUS, Usuard, one of the Scillitan martyrs, July 17, appears as Lactatus, July 18 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LACTICINIA, dishes prepared from milk and eggs (ώγάλα), the use of which was permitted, according to some authorities, in Lent and other times of fasting [FASTING; LENT]. [C.]

LACTINUS, Lacteanus, Lactocus or Molac-tocus, founder of the abbey of Freshford (Aghad-hur) and abbat of Clonfert (died 622), commemorated March 19. There was a spring sacred to him in Cassel and a convent (Lis-lachtin) in Ardferit diocese (v. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 32). [E. B. B.]

LACULATA, sc. vestis, a kind of dress, in which were square spaces (lacus), containing pictures, added in various ways: "Laculata est quae lacus quadratos quosdam cum pictura habet intextos, aut additos acu." (Isid. Etym. xix. 22.) For this sense of lacus, cf. Columella (i. 6), where the word is used for square spaces, with which granaries are divided for the storing of different kinds of grain separately. (See Ducange, Glossary, s. v.) [R. S.]

LACUNARY WORK. (Lambris, Fr.) The lacunaria or laquearia were hollow spaces or panels originally formed by the planks arranged at regular intervals, to compose the ceiling of a room. During the Romano-Byzantine period these were gilded and inlaid with ivory (Horace, Od. ii. 18); sometimes they were adorned with paintings (Suet. Vit. Ner. 31). The vaulted or wagon-roofed variety was called CAMARA or CAMERA. [DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANTIQ. s. v.] The panelling was applied also to the soffit or under surface of an arch; but this practice is apparently not earlier than the Renaissance, and was an innovation on the original custom, since earlier arches had no soffits properly so-called. The ancient basilicas had the ground of these recesses enriched with Caissons square, trefoil, hexagonal, in much variety; often again with roses, masques of animals, and such like; but these in later examples. The lacunary work was employed both in public and private buildings; "Laquearia, quae nunc et in privatis domibus auro teguntur," says Pliny (Hist. Natur. xxxiii. 18), and especially in Italy the ceilings of all the rooms of a house would be of this kind; some being more richly ornamented than others. It is to be distinguished from mosaic work (musivum opus); see MOSAIC.

When in the third and fourth centuries A.D. the Christians began to erect large and costly churches, the ceilings were often ornamented with this work. Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. iii. capp. 31-40) tells us that the church which Constantine built at Jerusalem had a vaulted roof (καμάραν λακωνάρειαν), of which the whole was divided into panels, carved and gilded.

Paulinus, bishop of Nola in Campania (A.D. 409-431), has described in one of his letters (Ep. 12, ad Severin.) a new church there, upon which the highest decorative art of the period appears to have been exercised. Of this the roof of the nave and galleries were panelled (lacunato). The term is frequently used by St. Jerome (A.D. 340-420), who did not altogether sympathise with the prevailing habit of lavishing adornment on churches. He says (Ep. 2 ad Nepotian.), "Marmora nitent auro, splendent laquearia, gemmis altare distinguitur," &c.

Patiens, bishop of Lyons, is recorded to have built a cathedral church in that city, of which we have a contemporary description from the pen of Sidonius Apollinaris (A.D. 431-482). He says:

"Intus lux micat, atque bracteatum
Sol sic sollicitatur ad lacunar
Fulvo ut concolor erret in metallo."

That is, the golden sunshine played over the golden plates of the panels in the church.

But yet the lacunar hardly appears to have been the prevailing style of ornamentation in these early centuries, at all events for churches. It was revived and much extended under the Renaissance. [S. J. E.]

LAITY. I. In the Old Testament, when the Israelites in general are distinguished from the priests, they are spoken of as "the people." In the Greek of the Septuagint this is δ λαός. See examples in Lev. iv. 3; Deut. xviii. 3; Ezra vii. 16; Is. xxiv. 2; Jer. i. 18, v. 31; Hosea iv. 9. Hence the use of λαϊκός to denote one not of the priesthood. Thus Clemens Alex. says that the hanging at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xvi. 36) was a "protection against lay unbelief" (Strom. v. 5, 33). The author of the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox, ascribed to Justin Martyr, observes that while the law "destroys by fire a priest's daughter guilty of fornication, it slays by stoning the daughter of the layman" (τοῦ λαϊκοῦ ἀνδρός) (Resp. ad Qu. 97). Philo calls the layman of his nation ιδιώτης, a private person. Thus he says that at the passover "the ιδιώται do not bring the victims to the altar, and the priests sacrifice; but the whole nation, by the ordinance of the law, assumes the priestly office" for the occasion (de Vit. Mos. iii.). Unless restrained by revelation, the first Christians, being educated as Jews, would naturally draw a somewhat similar line between their own office-bearers and the mass of believers. How far they were encouraged to do so by their inspired teachers may be gathered to a great extent from Scripture itself. Not to dwell on the relation of the whole body to the Apostles, whose commission was in some respects extraordinary, we find each local church or congregation subject to other rulers (ἡγουμένους, Heb. xiii. 17), who were "over them in the Lord" (1 Thess. v. 12; comp. 1 Tim. iii. 5, v. 17), under the name of overseers (ἐπίσκοποι, bishops) and elders (πρεσβύτεροι, whence priest), to whose teaching, exhortation, and rebuke, and to whose judgment in some things, they were required to submit (1 Tim. iv. 6, 11, vi. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 2; Tit. i. 9, 13, ii. 15, iii. 10). To their care and oversight the "laity" were committed, as a flock to the shepherd (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2). The distinction was observed everywhere; elders being ordained in every church (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5; comp. Acts xi. 30), and provision was made for the perpetuity of the system (2 Tim. ii. 2). Sometimes the laity were distinguished as "the church" or "the brethren." E.g. "when Paul and Barnabas were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders" (Acts xv. 4); and when "the apostles and elders, with the whole church" send a letter to "the brethren which were of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia," it begins thus, "The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren" (ib. 22, 23). This epistle was accordingly delivered, not to the rulers of the church at Antioch, but to "the multitude" (30). Compare Acts xii. 17: "Show these things unto James (the ruler) and to the brethren;" and 1 Tim. iv. 6: "If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." The distinction visible in these passages is preserved in the earliest extra-Scriptural records of the church. Thus Clement, himself bishop of Rome, in an epistle by which he sought to allay dissensions at Corinth, addressing "the brethren" there, says, "Ye did all things without respect of persons, and walked by the laws of God, being subject to those who had the rule over you, and yielding due honour to the presbyters among you" (Ep. i. c. 1). He illustrates the relative position of the laity and clergy by the parallel of the Jewish priesthood and people: "To the high-priest his proper ministries have been assigned, and to the priests their proper place appointed, and on the Levites their services have been imposed. The layman (ὁ λαϊκός) is bound by the precepts that affect laymen. "Let each of you, brethren, give thanks unto God in his own station (τάγματι), keeping a good conscience, and not overstepping the appointed rule of his ministry" (cc. 40, 41). This state of things was to continue; for the apostles, he tells us, not only appointed the first rulers in each church, but also "gave direction how, at their decease, other approved men should succeed to their ministry" (c. 44). In the Visions of Hermas, which many critics assign to the age of Clement, the laity, under the name of "the elect," are spoken of as being taught and ministered to by the apostles and bishops and doctors (i.e. presbyters: see Pearson, Vind. Ignat. ii. 13, 3) and ministers" (i.e. deacons) (Past. i. Vis. iii. 5). The following sentence from Ignatius is common to all the recensions: "My soul be surety for them who are subject to the bishops, presbyters, deacons" (Ep. ad Polycarp. c. vi.; Cureton, Corp. Ignat. p. 12). In the epistles known to Eusebius, A.D. 324 (Hist. Eccl. iii. 30) such expressions are frequent. In Tertullian, A.D. 192, the word "laicus" occurs often. E.g. "The chief-priest, which is the bishop, has the right of giving (baptism). Then presbyters and deacons, not, however, without the authority of the bishop, for the honour of the church, which being saved, peace is saved. From another point of view even laymen have the right" (de Baptismo, xvii.). The same writer says of certain heretics that among them, "one man is to-day a bishop, next day another. To-day one is a deacon, who to-morrow will be a reader; to-day one is a presbyter, who to-morrow will be a layman; for they enjoin priestly (sacerdotalia) duties on laymen" (de Praescr. Haeret. c. 41). In the so-called apostolical canons, the first fifty of which, at least, are supposed to have been collected about the end of the 2nd century, the word layman is of very frequent occurrence. Thus, "If any clerk or layman who is segregated, or not received, goes to another city, and is there received (to communion) without letters commendatory, let both receiver and received be segregated" (can. 12). By can. 31, a presbyter who, in contempt of his bishop, gathers a separate congregation, and all the clerks who adhere to him are to be deposed, "but the laymen to be segregated." See also canons 15, 24, 43, 48, 57, 62-66, 69, 70, 71, 84, 85. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a "conference held with bishops, presbyters, deacons, confessors, and also with the laymen who stood firm" (in a persecution) for consultation on the treatment of the lapsed (Epist. 30, ad Rom.). Elsewhere he says, "The faith of the militant people (of God) is disarmed, while its vigour and the fear of Christ is taken away. Let the laity see how they provide for this. On the priest falls greater labour in asserting and defending the majesty of God" (Ep. 59, ad Cornel.). The more frequent name for the laity with this writer is plebs, e.g. "The clergy and people (plebs) and the whole brotherhood received with joy" certain schismatics who had returned to the church (Ep. 51, ad Corn.). He warned some unruly persons that "when a bishop was once made and approved by the testimony and judgment of his colleagues and the people (plebis), no other could in anywise be appointed" (Ep. 44, ad Corn.).

11. Laymen duly qualified might give religious instruction among the Jews. In the synagogues it was usual for the elder to ask anyone of repute to comment on the lesson for the day (Luke iv. 17; Acts xvii. 2), or to deliver a "word of exhortation" (Acts xiii. 15). This liberty was continued under the Gospel in the case of those who had the gift of "prophecy" (Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28, xiv. 1-6, 31, &c.). Among unbelievers all Christians were expected to teach the gospel as opportunity was given. "They that were scattered abroad" by the persecution on the death of Stephen "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts viii. 4). The majority of these would be laymen. Thus St. Paul, before he received the laying on of hands (Acts xiii. 3), "preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27); Aquila and Priscilla "expounded unto Apollos the way of God more perfectly" (ib. xviii. 26); and Apollos himself "mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ" (28). "At first all taught and baptized on whatever days and seasons occasion required . . . That the people might grow and multiply, it was at the beginning permitted to all to preach the gospel, and to baptize, and to explain the Scriptures in church, but when the church embraced all places, houses of assembly were constituted, and rulers (rectores) and the other offices in the church were instituted. . . . Hence it is that now neither do deacons preach in the congregation, nor clerks nor laymen baptize" (Hilar. Diac. Comm. in Ep. ad Eph. iv. 11, 12). When Demetrius of Alexandria complained that Origen, who was not a priest, had been asked by the bishops of the district to "discourse and to interpret holy Scripture publicly in church" at Caesarea, the bishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea denied the truth of one ground taken by Demetrius, viz. that laymen had never been known to preach before bishops. "If," said they, "any persons are anywhere found capable of benefiting the brethren, they are encouraged by the holy bishops to preach to the people. Thus at Larandi, Euelpis was asked by Neon; and at Iconium, Paulinus by Celsus; and at Smyrna, Theodore by Atticus;—our brethren now in bliss. And it is probable that this has been done in other places without our knowing it" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 19). Frumentius and Aedesius, while laymen, laid the foundation of the church in Abyssinia (Soer. Hist. Eccl. i. 19). The same service was rendered to Iberia (Georgia) by a female captive, who having healed by her prayers the king and his wife and son, exhorted them to believe in Christ, through whose name their cure had been effected (ib. c. 20).

A law of Valentinian and Theodosius, published in 394, "touching laymen who presume to dispute about religion," forbids the opportunity being permitted to any one of "coming into public and discussing or handling matters of religion" (Cod. Theodos. 2 in Capit. Car. Mag. vii. 195). Four years later a council held at Carthage decreed that "a layman should not dare to teach in the presence of clerics, unless they themselves ask him;" and absolutely, that "no woman, however learned or holy, should presume to teach men in a meeting" (cann. 98, 99). Leo I., A.D. 453, writing to Maximus the patriarch of Antioch, in view of danger from the growth of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, entreats him to take order "that beside those who are priests of the Lord, no one presume to claim for himself the right to teach or to preach, whether he be monk or layman" (Epist. 92, c. 6). He repeats this in a letter to Theodoret of Cyrus (Ep. 93, c. 6), and expresses a hope that his letter to Maximus would be dispersed by him and "come to the knowledge of all." The council in Trullo at Constantinople, A.D. 691, declares "that a layman ought not to dispute or teach publicly, thence arrogating to himself the right to teach, but that he should be obedient to the order handed down from the Lord." Those who should violate the canon were to be segregated for forty days (can. 64). There is, we think, no evidence that laymen were at any time permitted to read the eucharistic lessons, either in the East or West. A law of Charlemagne entirely forbids it: "A layman ought not to recite a lesson in church, nor to say the alleluia, but only the psalm or responsories without alleluia" (Capit. v. 112). [LECTURE.]

III. Hilary, the deacon, as above quoted, appears to say that laymen could not confer baptism even in the first post-apostolic age. This was probably the general opinion; for the Greek compiler of the Clementine Constitutions ascribes the following prohibition to the apostles themselves: "We do not permit laymen to perform any of the sacerdotal functions, as sacrifice or baptism, or laying on of hands, or the lesser or greater benediction" (iii. 10). This would make them absolutely incapable; and the opinion of their incapacity was probably widely spread in the East to the end of the first four centuries after Christ. St. Basil, A.D. 370, implies that he held it, when he speaks with approbation of an argument against baptism by schismatical priests, which he attributes to Firmilian, one of his predecessors at Caesarea, and to St. Cyprian. It was to the effect that schismatical priests being cut off from the body of Christ, and thus losing their orders, having now "become laymen, have no power either to baptize or to ordain, being no longer able to impart to others the gift of the Holy Ghost, from which they have fallen themselves. On which account they commanded that those who came to the church from them (i.e. from any schismatical body) should be cleansed by the true baptism of the church" (Epist. ad Amphil. i. can. 1). An ancient Greek scholium, found in one MS. of this epistle (Cod. Ambergach), enlarging on this point, says, "He falls from the sacerdotal grace, which he received from Him to whom he was united, and becomes for the future a layman," not able to impart to others that which he no longer has, nor able to obtain a new supply of it from the body which he has joined (Bever. Pand. ii. annot. 221). We must observe, however, that St. Basil, though with evident reluctance, admitted the baptisms of priests in schism, feeling himself overruled by numbers: "But since it has seemed good to some of those in Asia, out of consideration for the multitude, that their baptism should be received, let it be received" (Ep. u. s.). May we not suppose that he would also have confessed, if the question had come before him, that the church had power to authorise or accept, under special circumstances, the baptisms of laymen in full communion with her?

Tertullian, on the other hand, whom St. Cyprian used to call his master, teaches that, abstractedly, laymen have power to baptize, but that they can only exercise it by permission, expressed or understood. He argues that "what is received equally (by all) can be imparted equally" (by all); but he adds, "How much more is the discipline of reverence and modesty incumbent on the laity, seeing that it is the part of those greater than themselves (i.e. the priests and deacons) not to take on them the office of the episcopate, which is assigned to the bishops. Emulation is the mother of schisms" (de Bapt. 17). The principle laid down by Tertullian receives a curious illustration from the well-known story told by Rufinus, A.D. 390 (Hist. Eccl. i. 14), of some boys baptized in play by Athanasius when himself "quite a child" (Socr. A.D. 439, Hist. Eccl. i. 15). The bishop of Alexandria, who happened to see what was done from a distance, finding on inquiry that water had been duly used and the right form of words said, decided, after conference with his clergy, that the children should not be rebaptized, but he supplemented their irregular baptism by confirming them himself. There is a difficulty in the story from the great youth which it assigns to Athanasius about the year 312; but it would not have been related by Rufinus, or repeated at length by Sozomen, A.D. 460 (Hist. Eccl. ii. 17), without some protest, if the ground on which the bishop was said to have acted had not been widely accepted in the church at that time.

From the council of Elvira, about A.D. 300, we first learn under what circumstances it was held lawful for a layman to baptize. Its 38th canon decrees that "during foreign travel, at sea, or if there be no church near, one of the faithful, who has his own baptism entire (not clinic, duly confirmed, and probably also not impaired by lapse in persecution), and is not a bigamist, may baptize a catechumen in extremity of sickness, on condition that if he recover, he take him to the bishop that he may receive the benefit of the laying on of hands." St. Jerome, writing in 378, says that "without chrism and the command of the bishop, neither presbyter nor deacon have the right to baptize; which nevertheless we know to be often permitted to laymen, if necessity compel. For as one receives, so can he also give" (Contra Lucif. 9). The reader will observe here the reasoning of Tertullian very similarly expressed. St. Augustine, about 400: "If any layman, compelled by necessity, shall have given to a dying man that which, when he received it himself, he learnt the manner of giving, I know not if any one could piously say that it ought to be repeated. For to do it without necessity is to usurp the office of another; but to do it under pressure of necessity is either no fault or a venial" (Contra Epist. Parmen. ii. xiii. 29). In a work written shortly after this he shows a disposition to go further, and to recognise the outward act under whatever circumstances performed. He is speaking of several questions that might be raised,—“whether that baptism is to be owned which is received from one who has not himself received it;” whether it is valid, whatever the faith, or motive, or position (as a catholic or schismatic) of the giver or receiver, or of both, &c. He even includes the case of baptism conferred on the stage where the actors are heathens, and here he clearly leans to the affirmative, if the person baptized has had a sudden access of faith at the time; but when God has not thus interposed (neque ille qui ibi acciperet, ita crederet, sed totum ludere et mimice et joculariter ageretur), he thinks that only an express revelation could decide. He would in all such questions defer to a “plenary council;” but an answer to the last must be sought by united and most earnest prayer (de Bapt. c. Donat. vii. 53). He says also that at all events he would at such a council “not hesitate to maintain that they have baptism who have received it consecrated by the words of the gospel anywhere and from any one whomsoever without deceit on their own part and with some faith” (ib. § 102). In Gratian (P. iii. de Consecr. iv. 21) we have an extract from a letter ascribed to Augustine:—“We are wont to hear that even laymen are accustomed to give the sacrament which they have received in a case of necessity, when neither bishops, presbyters, nor any of the ministers are found, and the danger of him who seeks it, lest he die without that sacrament, is pressing.” In another passage from the same epistle we find a story (which the writer confesses to be uncertain) of a catechumen and a penitent in danger of being shipwrecked together. As they were the only Christians in the ship the penitent baptized the catechumen and was in turn reconciled by him. What they did was approved by all (ib. c. 36). The question raised by St. Augustine, as to the effect of a mock baptism on the stage, probably suggested a tale of wonder which we find, with differences of detail, both in the East and West. An actor who personated a catechumen receiving baptism was said to have been suddenly and miraculously converted. One version lays the scene at Rome in the presence of Diocletian, about 285, and gives the name of Genesis to the comedian. The other calls him Gelasius, and makes the place Helio-polis in Phoenicia, and the year 297. In both cases the neophyte is said to have been led forth to martyrdom (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. in St. Genés). The authorities are, for Gelasius, the Paschal Chronicle of Alexandria, compiled in 630 (p. 642); and for Genesis, some Acta of uncertain date which were copied by Ado in his Martyrologium (A.D. 859) at Aug. 25.

Gelasius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 494, speaking of deacons:—“Let them not presume to baptize without (the authority of) the bishops or presbyters, unless extreme necessity compel them,—those officers being perchance settled a long way off,—to do which is for the most part permitted even to lay Christians” (Epist. ad Episc. Lucan. §c. § 7). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, cites our Lord’s words to the apostles (John xx. 22, 23; Matt. xxviii. 19) to shew that it is “not lawful for laymen (privatis = ιδιωταις) nor for clerks not of the higher orders (sine gradu; see Vulg. 1 Tim. iii. 13), to baptize, but for priests only” (sacerdotibus = bishops and presbyters). Therefore, he concludes, it is not lawful even for deacons to do so “without (the authority of) the bishops and presbyters, except when they are far absent and the last necessity of illness compel,—which is for the most part permitted even to the lay faithful, lest any one should be called out of this world without the saving remedy” (de Eccl. Off. ii. 24).

IV. There is evidence to shew that during the earlier part of our period the laity came up to the holy table to make their offerings and to communicate. Dionysius, the pope of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman as “going up to the table,” and “standing at the table” (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). Even women (nisi in abscessu) were, according to him, then permitted to “approach the holy of holies” and to “draw near to the holy table” (Ep. ad Basilid. can. 2). St. Chrysostom:—“Let no Judas, no Simon, come up to the table” (Hom. 50, in St. Matt. § 3). By the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea, about 365, it was “permitted to those only who were in holy orders to enter the place of the altar and to communicate there.” This probably only sanctions a custom already becoming general. Theodosius the Great, at Milan in 390, took his offering up to the altar, but was not allowed to remain in the chancel for the communion (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). In the East, however, he had been accustomed to stay and to communicate within the bema (ib.; comp. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 24). His grandson Theodosius says of himself in 431, “We draw near the most holy altar only to offer the gifts, and having gone into the enclosed tabernacle of the sacred circles, at once leave it” (Concil. Labbe, iii. 1237). For the East the rule was finally settled by the council in Trullo, A.D. 691. It forbade any of the laity to “enter within the sacred altar-place,” except the emperor, “when he wished to offer gifts to the Creator” (can. 69). Turning to the West we find the Council of Tours, A.D. 566, permitting “the holy of holies to be open to laymen and women for prayer and communion, as the custom is,” but forbidding laymen to “stand by the altar, at which the sacred mysteries are celebrated, either on vigils or at masses” (can. 4). This prohibition was confirmed by a council held at some uncertain place in France, about the year 744; but the permission is not also repeated (can. 6; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 153). The whole of the canon of Tours, however, appears in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (vii. 279). In the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus, the bishop is represented as “going down” to receive the gifts of the people, and being “conducted back to the altar” after receiving them (Mus. Ital. ii. 10, 74). This exhibits the custom at Rome in the 8th century. At that time the men and women were on different sides of the church, and the clergy went to their several places to communicate them (ib. 10, 50). In an epistle of Theodosius and Valentinian (Codex Theodos. ix. 45) the nave (ὁ ναός) of the church is called ἐκτέτριον τοῦ λαοῦ, "the praying-place of the laity." In a law of Justinian, A.D. 528 (Codex I. iii. xlii. 10), the clergy are exhorted to a punctual observance of their hours of prayer by an appeal to the example of "many of the laity, who for the good of their souls constantly frequent the most holy churches, and shew themselves diligent in the practice of psalmody." From this we may infer, as probable, that at that time laymen often met together in church to sing psalms out of the hours of public worship, and when the clergy were not present.

LAMB, THE HOLY. In the Orthodox Greek Church the oblation of bread for the Liturgy (ἡ προσφορά, oblata) is prepared of leavened bread, baked with special care, in the form of a moderate-sized, round, flat loaf or cake. In the centre is a square projecting portion, impressed with a stamp called the seal (σφραγίς),^b consisting of a cross, in the angles of which are stamped the words IC XC NI KA, i.e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς νικᾷ. This square projection is called the Holy Lamb, or in the rubrics the Holy Bread (ὁ ἅγιος ἄρτος). The circular (στρογγυλοειδής) shape, as of a coin, is considered by Durandus (iv. c. 41) to symbolise the price of man's redemption. The form, however, seems to have varied. Gabriel of Philadelphia^c (Apol. pro Eccl. Orient.) states that the bread for the oblation was made either round or square; and adds that the round shape is symbolical of our Lord's Divinity, the square of the universality of redemption. Allatius, too (de Eccl. Occ. et Orient. Conc., lib. iii. c. 15, s. 18), writes: "The Greeks when they make the bread for the sacrifice, for the most part do not make it round (ut plurimum non rotundant), but draw it out into four arms in the form of a cross: they then impress the seal (sigillum), just explained,^d in the centre of the cross and at the extremities of each arm. The priest who is about to celebrate takes the bread, in the Prothesis, and divides it in such a manner that each portion has a complete seal, and these parts are called seals (σφραγίδες, signacula)." [FRAGON.]

According to this description each portion would be approximately square; but whether the whole oblation be round or square, the Holy Lamb itself is square.

In the "office of the Prothesis," called διάταξις τῆς θείας καὶ ἱερᾶς λειτουργίας, which is performed in the chapel of the Prothesis, on the north side of the bema, as introductory to the liturgy, and in which the priest assumes the eucharistic vestments, and selects and prepares the elements for consecration; he separates the

"lamb" from the rest of the oblation, cutting it away squarewise with the "spear" (ἡ ἅγια λόγχη), which is a knife in the form of an elongated spear-head, with a short handle, ending in a cross, and symbolical of the spear which pierced our Lord's side; and lays it on the paten or disc (ὁ ἅγιος δίσκος), arranging afterwards in a specified order particles (μερίδες) cut in a pyramidal form from the oblation.

Five loaves or oblations are usually prepared in the Prothesis; in the Russian Church invariably so, according to King (p. 144), but in Greece one only is often prepared, and of old the number varied. The oblation thus prepared is covered with the "asteriscus" [p. 149], a sort of frame, consisting of two bars crossing each other and joined by a hinge at the centre, and bent into such a shape as to form, when they are at right angles, a support for the "veils," of which there are three; the innermost being called δισκοκάλυμμα, and the outer ἀήρ. It then remains in the Prothesis till the "great entrance," i.e. of the Elements in the liturgy.

At the "fraction" in the liturgy the priest breaks the Holy Lamb, there called "the Holy Bread" (τὸν ἅγιον ἄρτον), into four^e parts, and arranges them crosswise in the disc, thus—

He makes the sign of the cross over the chalice with the part , which he then puts into the chalice; he communicates himself and the assistants with the part , and the remaining two parts are divided among the lay communicants (Neale, Introd. 518).

For details of the office of the Prothesis, and their symbolical significance, see διάταξις τῆς θείας καὶ ἱερᾶς λειτουργίας, as given in the Euchologion mega; also Goar, Rit. Graec. (note in S. Joan. Chrysost. Missam); Neale, Introduction, pp. 341, &c.; Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. i. p. 117; and Allatius (ut supra).

LAMB, THE. [IN ART.] It appears best to treat early representations of the lamb as symbolic of our Lord (whether in the act of suffering or of triumph), apart from those of the sheep, which represent human members of the church of Christ. They are frequently brought together on the sarcophagi, and especially in the later mosaics within our period, as at SS. Cosmas and Damianus, and at St. Praxedes, in Rome; and the distinction is often sustained by the simple expedient of making the Divine Lamb of larger size than His followers, as Aringhi, vol. i. p. 307 (lib. ii. cap. x.), or He bears the cross or monogram (ib. pp. 293, 295): both at p. 425. In the church of SS. Cosmas and Damianus (see Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, vol. ii. tab. xv. xvi.) three symbolic phases of the form of the sheep or lamb are set forth. First He is represented above the keystone arch of triumph as prone, on a small highly-decorated altar, "as it were slain." Below stand full-length figures of our Lord and saints in glory, separated by the narrow belt of Jordan, JORDANES, from the sheep of the world below, who are issuing from the gates of "Jerusalem" and "Bethleem," to gather round the central Lamb with the nimbus, representing the Lord in His humanity [BETHLEHEM]. After the crucifixion, every paschal supper must have been understood to prefigure the Lord's death by its symbolic lamb. But it was not perhaps till the triumph of the cross under Constantine, when the upright or penal cross had taken the place of the decussated symbol [CROSS: MONOGRAM], that the lamb, as victim, came to be a constant object of contemplation, and His image began to be combined with the cross. In the great distresses of the succeeding centuries, the hopes and imaginations of clergy and people may well have been drawn to the Book of Revelation, and the distinction between the lamb as slain in sacrifice and the lamb conquering and triumphant seems to have been strongly felt and freely insisted on. In the sixth century, and as the cross gradually became exclusively a symbol of the manner of the Lord's death, not as of old, of His person or humanity, the lamb with crown or nimbus was placed at the intersection of the limbs of crosses [CRUCIFIX], and was in fact a mystic crucifix, with reference to the image in the Apocalypse, until the human form was substituted or added after the Quinisext Council. See Borgia, de Cruce Vaticano and de Cruce Veliterna. On the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv.; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 277) the spandrels of its pillared front are ornamented with curious sculptures of the symbolic lamb performing miracles and acts of ministry, mystically selected from the Old and New Testaments. He is striking water from the rock, changing water into wine, administering baptism to a smaller lamb, touching a mummy Lazarus with a wand, and receiving the tables of the law.

From Aringhi, i. 293.

The lamb appears in the vault mosaics of the chapel of Galla Placidia, in Ravenna, and is prominent on the ornamented capitals of St. Vitale.

In a quite distinct symbolism, the lamb is found accompanying Adam and Eve (Aringhi, i. pp. 613, 621, 623) as the sign of the appointed labours of the latter in spinning. Abel is also seen offering a lamb (Bosio, iii. v. p. 159; Bottari, tav. cxxxvii).

Under article GEMS [vol. i. p. 718] will be found a highly interesting engraving of an annular stone, representing the Lamb of God surrounded by a nimbus.

The lamb appears with the insignia of the Good Shepherd (the pastoral crook and vessel of milk) in Aringhi (i. 557) from a painting in the Callixtine catacomb. Also with the monogram, Aringhi, i. 293, Woodcut, No. 1.

In Ciampini (de Sac. Edif. tab. xiii.), the usual procession of the sheep of the Hebrew and Gentile folds centres in a lamb, whose blood is received in a chalice, and flows away in five streams. This formerly existed in the ancient Basilica of the Vatican, but had been restored by Innocent III., and can perhaps with difficulty be taken, as it stands in Ciampini's plate, for an authentic copy of the ancient condition of the mosaic. He is represented on an altar table in Ciampini (V.M. tab. xv. vol. ii.; also tab. xlvii.), perhaps with reference to the Paschal Feast.

Two or more sheep of the church frequently accompany the Good Shepherd, besides the one which He bears on His shoulders. They are often made to look to Him with an expression of awe and affection, and His hand is sometimes extended to bless them (Aringhi, i. 531, 532, 573, 587, from catacomb paintings; on sarcophagi, i. 295, 303, 307).

The CHURCH is supposed to be symbolised by the curious painting of a lamb between two wolves [vol. i. p. 389]. The original is rude in execution. As an emblem of innocence, the lamb is found in Boldetti, p. 365, and with an Orante, Bosio, p. 445. [R. St. J. T.]

LAMB, OFFERING OF. The general rule as to oblations upon the altar was that nothing should be offered there but the first fruits of corn and grapes in their season (Can. Apost. 3, Conc. African. can. 4), and bread and wine for the eucharist were constantly offered. In some churches, as, e. g. the Gallican, the rule was not so strict, so that money and other things were permitted to be offered (Conc. Aurel. i. can. 16); and it appears from a passage in Walafrid Strabo (d. 849) (de Rebus Eccles. c. 18), that a custom even existed in some places of consecrating a lamb, or offering it upon the altar, on Easter Day. This accusation is repeated by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 866, in his letter against the doctrines and practices of the West (Ep. 2, ad Patr.). The writers who replied to Photius in defence of the Western church, Ratramnus and Eneas, bishop of Paris, do not apparently deny the existence of such a custom. Du Pin (Cent. ix. p. 113) notices that an example of this usage is to be found in the life of St. Udalric, and that a form was provided in the old Ordo Romanus for consecrating the lamb to be sacrificed. Cardinal Bona, too (Reb. Liturg. ii. 8, n. 5), may be cited as a witness to the truth of the statement.

At first sight the practice looks very like a continuation of the Jewish passover. The strong repulsion, however, of the church from Jewish practices in those ages seems to render this unlikely; and we must probably regard it as being a singular and extremely crude way of indicating a mystical reference to the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God.

It can only have been an infrequent and obscure practice, and after the period mentioned we hear no more of it. [S. J. E.]

LAMBERT (1) Bishop of Maestricht † 709 (al. A.D. 696), comm. Jun. 5, Mart. Metr. Bede:

A church with shrine was erected on the site of the martyrdom, and Grimoald, son of Pepin, was killed there while praying for his sick father, A.D. 714. Thither, in A.D. 727, the relics of Lambert were translated from St. Peter's church, Maestricht, and the see also, and the saint became patron of the city of Liège, that grew up round his cathedral. The shrine was unhurt when the church was burnt by the Normans, A.D. 882 (Acta SS. Sept. v. 556). Dec. 24 was the local anniversary of the translation (v. Reiner, ib. p. 552). There were also churches to him, before A.D. 770, at Nyvels and Hermael, near Maestricht, where the blind and lame were cured on occasion of the aforesaid translation (v. Godescalcus, ib. p. 580). Liège appears to have been a favourite pilgrimage. Sept. 17 is noted as a feast, in Cal. Verd., and a 9th cent. calendar discovered by Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 460).

LAMMAS, a name applied in England to August 1, the festival of St. Peter in the Fetters (ad Vincula) [PETER, ST., FESTIVALS OF]. Somner's account of it (Dict. Sax. Lat. Angl. s. v.) is, that Lammas is a corruption of Hlafmaesse, or loaf-mass, because it was an ancient custom to offer on that day loaves made of the new corn [FRUITS, OFFERING OF; LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF]. A fanciful hypothesis is, that St. Peter became patron of lambs, from the Lord's words to him, "Feed my lambs" (John xxi. 15). [C.]

s. v.) speaks of οἱ κανόνες τῆς λαμπρᾶς μετὰ τῶν εἰρῶν, the canons [of odes] for Easter Day, with the hirmoi. [C.]

LAMPS. The lamps of the early Christians have been found in many places in great abundance, more especially in the catacombs of Rome and other cemeteries. For the early Christians were accustomed, in common with Jews and pagans, to place lamps in the company of the dead^a (Raoul Rochette in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri. t. xiii. pp. 758-764 (1838); Birch, Anc. Pott. part iv. c. ii.; Martigny, Dict. s. v. Lampes Chrétienues, and the references). Lamps of clay were found upon sarcophagi, at Vulci, in 1834, with Christian symbols, in company with coins of Constantine and his successors (Raoul-Rochette, u. s. p. 763); and have been met with either outside or inside Christian tombs and chambers in Rome, Naples, Corneto, Syracuse, Arles, Lyons, Carthage, and Alexandria. Others, of bronze, with chains attached for suspension, have been exhumed from the subterranean galleries and crypts of Rome, and in some rare cases hanging from the roof or vault; also clay lamps and candlesticks have been discovered in niches in the same situations, to give light to guide the wanderer through the gloom (Martigny, u. s. and references). A few (of clay) have been found in churches in Egypt, and were probably used for evening service (see Ducange, s. v. Lucernarium). Clay lamps, with Christian symbols, have also been met with among the ruins of the Palatine in Rome, and of houses in Geneva (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 23-28), and in the recent excavations in and about Jerusalem, in other places beside tombs. Indeed clay lamps have been found in very many parts of the ancient Christian world; but not always bearing Christian symbols. Many from the Roman catacombs, for example, have only scallops and ornamental patterns of various kinds (Perret, Cat. de Rome, t. iv. pl. xix.); and the same remark may be made of some of the lamps from Jerusalem in the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund, reasonably presumed to be Christian (Rev. G. J. Chester in Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 484-486, with figures),^b as well as of others from Egypt and various other countries contained in the British Museum. In our own country early Christian lamps, like all other Christian works of the Roman period, are of the rarest possible occurrence. Hübner (Inscr. Brit. Lat. p. 240, n. 27) mentions one in the museum at Newcastle, with the chrisma (✠), and there is another, of red clay, in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, with the same device in the centre and palm branches at the sides, found in Cannon Street, London (very like that figured by Bartoli, Ant. Luc. part iii. t. 22). A third was found at Colchester, of pale terracotta, having the chrisma slightly raised and coloured black (Journ. Brit. Arch. Assoc. 1855, p. 91, and H. Syer Cuming, in litt.). Lamps were also, though rarely, made of silver. In an inventory of church plate delivered by Paul of Cirta to the persecutors in the time of Diocletian, occurs the item, "lucernae argenteae septem" (Ad calc. Optati, p. 266 in Bingham, u. s.); and it appears that a silver lamp has been found in Rome (R. Rochette, u. s. p. 759); a single example of an amber lamp, without any ornament, has also been met with in the same city, in the cemetery of St. Callixtus (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 297, t. i. 7). The forms and symbols which the terra-cotta and bronze lamps present are sufficiently different to make it desirable to describe them separately.

(A) Terra-cotta lamps.—They are of various forms, but one of the most common is that which much resembles a modern teapot. It has a round body, with one or two apertures for oil; an ascending handle, often looped or perforated for suspension; and a horizontal spout opposite the handle for the wick. But the handle, body, and spout, are all liable to modifications of form, and the first and last (often nearly obsolete) are sometimes wholly wanting. The lamp may thus approach the form of a boat or of a shoe, to both which it has been sometimes compared; indeed, it was sometimes made in direct imitation of these objects either in clay or in bronze.^c Occasionally the handle is of a whimsical form, as a female holding palm-branches (Perret, Cat. vol. iv. pl. xv. fig. 3), or, it may have a crescent outline (Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, pl. xxiv. n. 4). Pagan lamps are not rarely made in imitation of altars and other objects (see Birch, passim); and we have an example of a Christian lamp in the form of an altar (Perret, u. s. pl. xix. fig. 4).

^b Among these is an Arabesque pattern, which may be intended for vine branches, where Mr. Chester supposes a reference to the Eucharist to be intended. The vine branch with grapes is realistically represented on a lamp of yellow unglazed clay of the common type from Melos, in the writer's possession, where many Christian lamps, nearly all bearing the cross, have been found; it may possibly be Christian. A not very legible potter's mark (?), perhaps ΕΦ: ΜΗ, is cut on the under side. Potters' marks have not been found on any Christian lamps at Jerusalem, and they would seem from the silence of authors to be very rare on Christian lamps generally. De Rossi mentions a lamp with the Good Shepherd and vine-branches, recently found in the Palatine excavations, having on the under side "the name of the potter or proprietor of the works stamped in beautiful letters, as on the pagan lamps, reading ANNI SER." probably, as he suggests, for Anni Serviani. The letters, he thinks, are of the 2nd or 3rd century; so that this will be amongst the earliest Christian lamps in existence (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 15, and 1870, p. 79, pl. vi. figs. 1, 2). Mr. H. Syer Cuming has a similar specimen.

^a Many of them shew signs of having been much used, and there is little doubt that from about the 4th century lamps and candles were often kept alight before the tombs of the saints. This excited the indignation of Vigilantius (A.D. 404), who thought it heathenish and idolatrous; St. Jerome (adv. Vigil. c. 7), who is inclined to excuse it, as done "pro honore martyrum," nevertheless styles it "imperitia et simplicitas saecularium hominum vel certe religiosarum foeminarum." Not very long afterwards, however, Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, left provision in his will (A.D. 474), "ut oleum paretur pro Domini Martini sepulcro indesinenter illustrando" (D'Achery, Spicil. t. iii. p. 303, ed. 1723). At an earlier period more dislike was felt to keep lights burning during the day in cemeteries. The council of Elvira in Spain (A.D. 324 ?) says in its 34th canon: "Cereos per diem placuit in coemeterio non incendi: inquietandi enim sanctorum spiritus non sunt," where, however, we have a converse superstition. See Bingham, Antiq. lib. viii. c. 6, § 21. The practice of placing lamps within sepulchres was easily explained in a pious sense, "ad significandum lumine fidei illustratos sanctos decessisse, et modo in superna patria lumine glorie splendere" (St. Jerome, quoted by Martigny, Dict. p. 351), but both the references (adv. Vigil. et Vit. Paulae, tacitly taken from Boldetti, Cimit. p. 525) are erroneous.

The great mass of the terra-cotta lamps found in the catacombs of Rome, "lesquelles sont au premier rang des objets d'antiquité chrétienne qu'on en retire" (Raoul Rochette, Cat. de Rome, p. 49), appear to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; some are considered to be older (Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, passim), while a few seem to be later. Martigny (Dict. p. 152) thinks that a great many (un grand nombre) may be referred to the 2nd or to the 3rd century; but this is perhaps too much to say. Those of Gaul may be, like the sepulchral inscriptions, mostly of the 5th and 6th centuries; but it would be interesting to investigate the dates of Christian lamps more accurately than appears to have been done at present. Several recently found in the Palatine in Rome, bearing the fish, lamb, palm, chrisma, and cross, are considered by De Rossi to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; but others with the two last types (ornamented with gems) he inclines to place in the 6th century. Two of the three lamps from Geneva figured by him (one with the Apostles' heads, the other with a palm-tree), he places in the 4th century; the other bearing a chrisma, beautifully inlaid with crosses, squares, &c., about the beginning of the 6th. (See his Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 11, 24, 25.) Those from Egypt in the British Museum are probably of the 4th and 5th centuries. The principal types are as follows:—

(1) Christ as the Good Shepherd. Bearing a sheep on his shoulders, probably from Rome^e (Bartoli, Ant. Luc. Sep. pars iii. t. 28, Rome, 1691). The same type, with other sheep at his feet, sun and moon above, accompanied by ark and dove, scenes from Jonah's life, &c., catacombs of Rome. (Id. 29, and Perret, Cat. de

^c Without referring to pagan examples, we have a notable instance of the boat of St. Peter and St. Paul (see below); a bronze lamp, on whose handle a dove is perched, and which may therefore not improbably be Christian, the body of which is a foot in the soldier's shoe (caliga), is figured by Licetus (Luc. Ant. p. 770); another, in the form of a boot, with palm branches on the sides, of terra cotta, probably Christian, is figured by Boldetti, Cimit. p. 64.

^d It is probable that among the lamps found in Africa more especially, of which the museums of Turin and Algiers possess large collections, there may be types not here enumerated. See Martigny's remarks on the rarity of their emblems (Dict. p. 353). The figures of lamps in the older books of Licetus, &c., are but rarely quoted, being of rude execution. Some of these and various others are repeated in Matrang's edition (Rom. 1341) of Mamachi's Origines et Antig. Christianae, especially in tom. iii., while some would seem to have been originally executed for Matrang's work. The subjects are (with the exception of the labarum, see below) of the same general character as those which are here mentioned independently.

^e When the locality of the lamps figured in this book is expressly mentioned, it is always Rome; where indeed the title-page professes that they were all found.

Tome, vol. iv. pl. xvii. fig. 2; De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, pp. 85–88.) The same type of the shepherd, vine branches at the sides, Rome, (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 1; see also a previous note.) Others in De Rossi, Bull. Arch. 1870, pl. 1 (from Ostia), and Sacken and Kenner, Die Sammlungen des K.K. Münz- und Antiken-Cabinetes, p. 256 (Wien, 1866), who, as well as other writers, observe the similarity of the style of the figure to that of Hermes Kriophoros. Some of these may probably be earlier than the 4th century.

Clay Lamp, with Pastor Bonus, and other subjects. (Bartoli.)

Clay Lamp, with Christ accompanied by angels, &c. (De Rossi.)

(2) Christ accompanied by angels. Christ standing, having a cruciform nimbus in the Byzantine style, bearing a long cross, between two flying angels, trampling on a lion and an adder (cf. Ps. xci. 13). The Palatine, Rome; of the florid style, probably later than the 5th century. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 12, fig. 1. Another and more perfect example in the Castellani collection, exhibited (1876) in the British Museum.) Christ seated, front view, between two flying angels, each holding a crown. Found in a subterranean chamber at Corneto, full of Christian lamps, given to R. Rochette by Melch. Fossati, who regarded it as a Transfiguration, but this is doubtful. (R. Rochette, u. s., p. 762, note; Martigny, u. s. p. 352.)

(3) Fish, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Catacombs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 5; Perret, u. s. pl. vii. fig. 1, and pl. ix. fig. 3.) Carthage (British Museum). Fish surrounded by six dolphins; very fine work in red clay, Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) See also below, under Inscriptions, and FISH (vol. i. p. 673).

(4) Lamb, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Catacombs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 2; Perret, u. s. pl. ix. fig. 2.)

(5) Christma or monogram of Christ. As X combined with P (✠), having a circle in centre; palm-branches at the sides of the lamp (Bartoli, u. s. t. 22). With loop of P to left; beautiful gemmed work; probably about the 6th century;

besides being found on Roman lamps in various forms, occurs also commonly in Gaul (Martigny, u. s.), and has been met with in Britain (see above), and in the catacombs of Syracuse (British Museum) and in Carthage (British Museum), and doubtless in many other places.

(6) Alpha and Omega (a monogram between them); Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. t. xxiv. fig. vi.) Christma between them, the letters inverted (Rev. S. S. Lewis).

(9) Fisherman, as symbol of an Apostle. Holding net and staff in his right hand, a fish in his left; on reverse of lamp a gemmed cross. (Mus. Corton. t. 85.)

(10) Female saint between angels, Carthage. (British Museum.)

(12) Dove, symbol of innocence, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xv. fig. 4.) Common on lamps of Gaul. (Martigny, u. s.) Carthage; on one lamp two doves facing; on another, one only. (British Museum.) See also Sacken und Kenner, u. s.

(13) Peacock, with tail spread out, and ornamented with three nimbi; emblematic of the Trinity. In Mr. H. Syer Cuming's collection. (Cuming, in litt. See also Journ. Brit. Arch. Assoc. 1855, p. 91.)

(15) Stag. (Cf. Ps. xlii. 1.) Rome? (Licet., de Lucern. Antiq. recond. p. 927, with fig.) Algeria (Münter, Symb. p. 112, referred to by Martigny, u. s. p. 353).

(16) Hare, supposed to be symbol of the swiftness of life, Lyons; on a vase of red clay, in the possession of the abbé Martigny. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353. See also p. 368, s. v. Lièvre.)

(17) Frog, as a symbol of the resurrection. Egypt, in the catacombs of Alexandria among other places, in conjunction with the cross. (Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. i. p. 52; Chester, u. s. p.

Rome. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 8. For similar work compare Birch, Anc. Pot. vol. ii. fig. 192.) Others in Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. vii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, figs. 3 and 4; Perret, passim, &c. With loop of P to left, formed like a crook; Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. ix.) The christma, 483. See also below under Inscriptions.) Several examples in the British Museum. Many lately found bear a late Greek Λ (A), impressed on the bottom, probably for Alexandria, where they were made. Chester, in Academy, Feb. 5, 1876, p. 123, who has some valuable remarks on the varied forms of these lamps.

The symbolic interpretation of the frog may be regarded as determined by the inscription given below; but it is not so certain that some of the animals mentioned above were meant to have any symbolical interpretation whatever. Some of them occur on Pagan lamps (Birch, u. s. vol. ii. p. 289), as does also the lion, which likewise is found on a lamp, of Christian fabric apparently, in the British Museum. This animal was sometimes taken as a Christian symbol of watchful power. (Martigny, u. s. p. 369. See also the articles in this Dictionary under the titles of the animals named above.)

(18) Chalice, Western Christendom. (Chester, u. s. p. 483.) One with two handles, a tree springing from it, Calymna (British Museum). Cf. CHALICE, vol. i. p. 337.

(24) Spies bearing grapes, Carthage. (British Museum.)

(25) Jewish candlestick, under various forms. With seven branches, six being bent in the middle at right angles; palm branch (?) on either side. Catacombs and Palatine, Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. iii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 7, fig. 12.) No palms, and branches of candlestick curved (Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. ii. fig. 192; Bartoli, u. s. t. 32; perhaps a Jewish work; probably from Rome). Quite conventionalised Rome (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 5); sometimes with a Christian inscription; Jerusalem. (Chester, u. s. pp. 484, 485, one figured.) Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) Carthage. (British Museum.)

Of pagan types, Christianised, we have the following:

(26) Venus holding apple, transformed into an Eve, as Séroux d'Agincourt suggests, but? Catacombs of Rome; good work, and probably of a very early period. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. 2.)

(27) Orpheus, who is made as a kind of symbol of Christ. Catacombs of Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xvii. n. i.)

There are also some other lamp-types of the Christian period, but which can hardly be intended to bear any Christian significance. The most curious is a fish swallowing an aquatic bird (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, tav. iv. n. 9, seemingly about the 6th century): another is a man killing a lion with a sword (British Museum). Some lamps appear to bear Christian portraits, either full-length (De Rossi, u. s. 1867, p. 25), or the bust only; one in the British Museum has apparently the head of an emperor, perhaps of Justinian.

Passeri (Lucern. Fict. vol. iii. pp. 126-7, t. xcii.) publishes a lamp of the usual type bearing the Graces, at the bottom of which is a cross, in dotted lines, which leads him to suspect that it is made by a Christian artist; and adds, "nam et aliae plures apud me asservantur, quae omnino Christianae sunt, et tamen ethnicorum symbolis atque imaginibus adornantur, praesertim Victoriae, Herculis, Palladis et Apollinis citharoedi sive Orphei, quas omnes, cum per otium licebit, sua in sede collocatas publicabimus." This promise does not appear to have been fulfilled; and the Christianity of such lamps (the Orpheus-type excepted) may be questioned. De Rossi cannot accept the cross on the bottom of a lamp "per segno certo di Christianesimo" (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, p. 80).

The same types, as was to be expected, are not found in all places where Christian lamps have been discovered in considerable numbers. The Rev. G. J. Chester observes of those of Jerusalem: "Many lamp-types of more Western Christendom, from the catacombs of Rome, Syracuse, and Carthage, such as the Good Shepherd, the Sacred Monogram, the Dove, the Cock of St. Peter, and the Chalice, are entirely absent; and the same may be said of the disgusting and probably Gnostic device of the toad" [rather frog] "associated with the cross, so often found in the catacombs of Alexandria and elsewhere, in Egypt. The earthenware bottles, with the effigy of St. Menas, an Egyptian saint, who flourished in the 4th century . . . so commonly found with Christian lamps in Egypt, are also absent. [See Böckh, C. I. G. p. 8978 and Academy, u. s.] The usual symbols of the Jerusalem lamps, which are all of a rude and cheap description . . . are the cross . . . ; the seven-branched candlestick . . . and the palm branch . . . These emblems, which the Christians of the mother of churches used and rejoiced in, in common with their brethren in more western lands, are all more or less conventionalised, and are represented in a distinctive and different manner." (Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 483-4.)

The types commonly occupy the disc or centre of the body of the lamp, while the sides are either plain or more usually decorated with floral or geometrical ornaments, or with subordinate types, as a wreath of palm-branches, or medallions enclosing the chrisma, &c.; or, more rarely, they bear inscriptions. In the lamps of Palestine, however, the emblems are placed along the edge, and not in the body of the lamps, which are in most cases not round but pear-shaped (Recov. of Jerus. p. 484).

Inscriptions on terra-cotta lamps.—These are rare, only three being contained in Böckh's Greek-Christian inscriptions, though a few others are now known. The following are the most important:—

(1) Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, p. 59, pl. xxii. fig. 14; Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8980:

ΤΟΥ ΑΓΙΟΥ ΠΟΛΥΚΤΟC (sic),

i. e. τοῦ ἁγίου Πολυεύκτου (the Holy Polyeuctus) written near the edge of a lamp, with a star in the centre, found in a church at Coptos in Upper Egypt, probably dedicated to that saint. Others of the same character, bearing the names of St. Sergius, abbat, and St. Christina, abbess (ἀμμή), and St. Cyriacus, may be seen in Böckh, nos. 8979, 8981, and Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. i. p. 52. The lamp in the Roman College, on which is written in ink Ο ΑΓΗΘΟΣ ΣΑΚΕΡΔΟΤΣ, may have been destined for the priests' use. (See Martigny, u.s.)

Clay Lamp, with star and Greek inscription. (Séroux d'Agincourt.)

(2) G. J. Chester, Recov. of Jerusalem, p. 485, with figure;

ΦΩΣ ΧΤ ΦΕΝΙ ΠΑCΙΝ,

i.e. φῶς Χριστοῦ φαίνει πᾶσιν (the light of Christ shines to all; adapted from 1 John ii. 8). Another, similar, accompanied by a cross; both are from Jerusalem. The same inscription variously blundered occurs on several lamps found in the same neighbourhood, on more than one of which the Jewish candlestick occupies the same position as the cross in the lamp here figured. The museum at Leyden has a lamp (from Egypt?) inscribed ΦΩΣ ΕΞ ΦΩΤΟΣ (Light of Light); and Dr. Birch mentions the same legend, and also ΘΕΟΛΟΓΙΑ ΘΕΟΥ ΧΑΡΙC (Theology is the grace of God), as occurring on Christian lamps from Egypt (u.s.). Of other lamps from Jerusalem one bears the same candlestick with seven lights, and reads in letters partly inverted, λυχνάρια καλὰ (beautiful lights), in allusion to the type. Another appears to have ΙΧΘ for ΙΧΘΥC (the Fish). See Chester, as above (where more information may be found), and the Egyptian lamps in the British Museum.

(3) Chabouillet, Catal. des Canées, &c. de la Bibl. Impér. p. 607. (A drawing sent to him by M. Muret.) A lamp, doubtless found in Egypt, formerly in the collection of the Abbé Greppo, has upon it the representation of a frog, with a cross and the inscription—

ΕΓΩ ΕΙΜΙ ΑΝΑΚΤΑCΙC.

The transformations of the frog seemed to the designer symbolical of the Resurrection; there seems no necessity to suppose any Gnostic feeling. The words are an adaptation from John xi. 25.

(4) A lamp is figured by Matrauga in Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christ. tom. iii. p. 37, tab. vi. fig. 2, on which a labarum of considerable size stands between two soldiers; on the tablet below the wreathed chrisma is written in two lines, ΕΝ ΤΟΥΤΩ (sic) ΝΙΚΑ. The margin is finely decorated with leaves, wreaths, and medallions. Apparently from the catacombs of Rome (in coemeteris repertum). This is termed vetustissimum monumentum; it may be of about the 5th or 6th century, to judge from the figure.

(5) Raoul Rochette (u. s. p. 763) mentions that lamps of the 4th century were found in 1834 in a little Christian cemetery at Vulci, bearing the type of heads surrounded by a nimbus, with inscriptions terminating with PAX CUM SANTIS (sic) or CUM ANGELIS. The early part probably mentioned the name of the person buried.

With regard to the paste, glaze, and style of art, it varies a good deal. The greater part appear to be of the bright red unglazed ware, called false Samian, which have been found in Egypt, among other places, where, however, the art of making lamps "seems to have been in a very low condition, and certainly inferior to its state in Rome and the provinces of Greece and Asia Minor." (Birch, u. s. i. 52, ii. 291.) The lamps of Palestine are of unequal merit, none being very high; while among the Roman lamps, of various ages, some are of very good work.

The number of Christian lamps, of terra-cotta, which enrich the museums of Europe, to say nothing of those in private hands, is very large; Martigny calls them almost infinite (u. s.). In this country the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund contains the largest collection of Christian lamps of that region: in the British Museum there is a considerable number (between one and two hundred) of others from various localities.

(B) Bronze lamps.—With regard to the lamps of bronze, which have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, they are generally thought to be for the most part of a later age than those of clay; and some of those which are preserved in museums lie under a suspicion of being forgeries (Martigny, Dict. p. 352). They have sometimes one spout, sometimes two, and are generally pierced for suspension by chains, some of which still exist. The chains sometimes met in an inscribed tablet, which was itself suspended. The curved pin for trimming the wick is occasionally found attached (Boldetti, u. s. p. 64). The earlier symbols, as the fish, hardly ever occur; the chrisma is frequent, and also the cross. Several of these lamps are figured by Bartoli, p. iii.; Perret, tom. v. u. s. tabb. 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31; Bottari, Roma Sotterr. t. iii. tav. ccvi.—ccviii.; and the British Museum has about twenty others.^f

The following notice of the Christian types which occur on bronze lamps must suffice:—

(1) Chrisma.—The handle formed by the chrisma in a circle, surrounded by vine leaves (Bartoli, t. 23). The same, surrounded by Jonah and his gourd (ib. t. 30). The same, plain, with transverse bar, accompanied by a

^f There are also some figured in the older work of Licetus, partly taken from Casalius, which seem to be of metal. See a very curious one, if it be genuine, with two spouts, a star on the body of the lamp, and a horseman standing on the side attached to the handle, which is a circle enclosing a chrisma, p. 782; also another, p. 870 (not made for suspension), having the Good Shepherd bearing a sheep, his head radiated, a suspicious peculiarity. For others more like those mentioned in the text, see pp. 951, 954, 994, which last gives a female called a Venus, under a gourd, otherwise much resembling Bartoli, t. 30. If indeed the two figures represent the same specimen, the drawing of Licetus is very bad; yet this seems to be the case: see Bellori's remarks.

The writer desires to express his special obligation to Mr. Percy Gardner for drawing up descriptions of the more important bronze lamps contained in the British Museum, as well as to the other officers of the museum for affording him every facility to inspect the objects mentioned both in this and in his other articles.

Bronze Lamp, with handle formed by the chrisma, and α and ω bearing the name of Nonius Atticus vir chrisianus et illustris (Bartoli.)

(2) Cross.—Handle formed by a cross, above which dove (Perret, u. s. t. v. fig. 5). Other handles are formed by crosses of various forms (British Museum). By a cross, on the top of a gryphon's head, a chrisma on the body of the lamp (Bartoli, t. 25). Same type, but lamp has two spouts, and no chrisma (British Museum; same type, but done above cross; Syracuse, recently found; Rev. S. S. Lewis). By a cross placed between and overshadowed by wings (British Museum). A cross placed in the middle of an ornamented handle, with three central discs (British Museum). A few of the above lamps are somewhat boat-shaped.

(3) Bird.—Body of lamp in the shape of a phoenix (British Museum, two specimens). Cf. Licetus, p. 871 (with figure). Others in British Museum in form of a peacock or a duck, probably Christian.

(4) Palm branches.—Placed near the nozzles (Bottari, u. s. t. ccviii).

(5) Boat, as a symbol of the Church (see Martigny, Dict. s. v. 'Navire').—(a) A bronze lamp in the form of a boat, is now in the cabinet of the Grand Duke of Tuscany (Bartoli, u. s. t. 31; Cahier et Martin, Mélanges Archéol. vol. iii. p. 15; Perret, u. s. t. 1). Two figures (Peter steering and Paul preaching) are at the ends of the boat, which bears an inscription on a label at the top of the mast in three lines:

DOMINVS LEGEM
DAT VALERIO SEVERO
EYTROIPI VIVAS.

This inscription has long been a puzzle for the learned. (See Bellori at the end of Bartoli, p. 11; also Martigny, Dict. p. 352.) De Rossi (Bull. de Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 28) seems to have hit on the true explanation, by suggesting that Eutropius is the praenomen of Valerius Severus; and that the acclamation congratulates him on having accepted the law of the Gospel, he having been previously a pagan.

Bronze Lamp, in form of a boat, in which are St. Peter and St. Paul. (Giniez in Cahier and Martin, whence Perret.)

This most interesting lamp was discovered during excavations of the Mons Coelius at Rome, in the 17th century, and appears to have been first published by De la Chausse in his Museum Romanum, Rom. 1690, and has since been repeatedly noticed, but only recently correctly drawn by M. Giniez. It is probably one of the earliest Christian bronze lamps known, being found along with other antiquities "of a good period of the empire" (Bellori).

Bronze Lamp (boat?), bearing chrisma, gryphon, and dolphin. (De Rossi.)

(6) Bronze lamp, perhaps intended for a boat, of very fine work, terminating at the poop in a gryphon's head, an apple in his mouth; the chrisma, on which a dove is perched, is between its ears; on the body of the lamp is another chrisma; at the other end (the prow) is a dolphin, with a loaf (?) in his mouth.

The dolphin, though not true fish, is here, as elsewhere, taken to be the symbol of Christ (as a fish). The apple in the dragon's mouth is interpreted by Monsignor Baillès to be the apple of Eve; while the loaf in the dolphin's mouth is regarded by him as the living bread of the Eucharist. [See DOLPHIN, FISH, GEMS.]

Probably (see De Rossi) of the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th century. Found in the excavations of Porto. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1868, p. 77, tav. 1, fig. 1, and for 1870, pp. 72-76.)

It should be added that lamps as well as candles were, from the 4th century onwards, placed in churches on candelabra suspended from the roof. These were of metal, bronze, silver, or even gold. Allusion is repeatedly made to them in the Liber pontificalis, and elsewhere; they were often of large size and elaborate ornamentation. They were commonly known by the name of Pharos (watch-tower) or Corona, indicative of their general shape. (See Ducange, Gloss. under each word; and Martigny, Dict. p. 153.) They were of various forms as respects details. (See Papias, quoted by Ducange, u. s. Pharus.) A representation of one which approaches our period is given in a MS. of about the 9th century by Spallart, Tabl. Hist. des Cost. et Moeurs, pl. xx. n. 4, referred to by Guenebault (see below). It is in the form of an architectural composition surrounded by towers. See CORONA LUCIS. (For copious references to the earlier and later literature of Christian lamps, see Fabricius, Bibl. Antiq. pp. 1035, 1036; Guenebault, Dict. Iconogr. des Monum. Chrét. p. 105, Paris, 1843. In M. Cahier's paper on the Couronne de lumière d'Aix-la-Chapelle is much information about early Christian lamps and chandeliers (Cahier et Martin, Mél. d'Archéol. vol. iii. pp. 1-61). There are also treatises by Fanciulli, De Lampadibus et Lucernis pensilibus in sacris aedibus Christianorum, 4to. (with plates); and Greppo, Sur l'usage des Cierges et des Lampes dans les premiers siècles de l'Eglise, Lyon, 8vo. 1842, which the writer has not seen.)^a [C. B.]

^a Since the above was written the Rev. S. S. Lewis has called the writer's attention to an able paper by M. de Villefosse in the Musée Archéologique for 1875, entitled "Lampes Chrétiennes inédites" (3), to which is added an enumeration of the Christian lamps (15) in the Museum of the Louvre. Most of them have the same general types as those named in this article; but the following from Algeria and Tunis are additional:—(1) The Three Children in the furnace, in Phrygian caps, accompanied by the Guardian Angel; (2) The Magi (in Phrygian caps) and the Star (imperfect); both these are figured; (3) Bust of St. Paul (?); (4) Daniel (?). All are of clay. Mr. W. R. Cooper, in a paper On the Horus Myth in Relation to Christianity, read before the Victoria Institute (March 6, 1876), mentions two terra-cotta lamps, shewing the influence of the Horus myth on Christian works of art. One in the Boston Museum, of which he gives a figure, bears "a large Greek cross, which completely divides it into four sections, in the two lower of which is placed the cruz ansata, or the mystical cross of life, which was

LAMPS, LIGHTING OF. Lamps in churches were in early Christian times lighted just before the beginning of vespers, which were originally appointed to be said at the twelfth hour, i.e. the last hour before sunset, whence the office itself is sometimes called duodecima. "Prima sic dici debet, pungentibus jam radiis solis, et vespere adhuc declinantibus radiis ejus." "In aestivo vero tempore adhuc altius stante sole Lucernaria inchoentur propter breves noctes" (Reg. S. Bened. cc. c. 34). The Benedictine practice in the last century is said to have been to say vespers in the winter at 3 P.M., in the summer at 3½ P.M. (Grancolas. Com. in Brev. cap. xxxviii.)

The lighting of the lamps was accompanied by certain prayers and psalms. These were known as psalmi and preces lucernales (St. Basil, ad Amphil.; St. Jerome, Ep. ad Laetum, &c.), and the office of vespers as lucernarium or lucernalis v. lucernaria hora (St. Aug. Sermo i. ad fratres in Er.). "Hora nona [i.e. as the context shews, after the ninth hour] lucernarium facimus," and the hours of prayer are thus enumerated: "hora tertia, sexta, nona, lucernarium, medio noctis, gallicantio, mane primo." [S. Jerome in Ps. 119 (120).] The apostolic constitutions also bid the faithful come together at eventide to sing psalms and offer prayers, and they call Ps. 140 (141) ἐπιλύχνιον (i. 59 and viii. 35).

These psalms and prayers were originally said separately from, and as introductory to, vespers properly so called; later they were incorporated into the office, the first part of which was known as Lucernarium, or in Greek τὸ λυχνικόν, and the whole office of vespers was sometimes, though less accurately, called by the same name. The directions for the "lychnic" in the Greek Euchology, for a solemn vigil (ἀγρυπνία), are as follows: The officer who put the lamps or candles in their places was called λαμπαδάριος; he who lighted them, καταγοριάρης (al. κατηγοριάρης, Goar, 272).

The priest, having vested in the sacristy (ιερατεῖον), comes out and censes the whole church and the icons, and, entering into the bema, censes the holy table, saying with a loud voice—"Glory be to the holy, and consubstantial, and life-giving and indivisible Trinity, in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages. R. Amen." Then the superior, or the appointed monk (ὁ προστάς ἢ ὁ ταχθεὶς μοναχός^b), sings the prooemiac psalm, i.e. Ps. 103 (104), the priest remaining within the bema, with the holy doors closed. At the verse, "When Thou openest Thy hand they are filled with good," he comes out with the canonarch (or precentor—μετὰ τοῦ Κανονάρχου^c), and, after a prescribed reverence, goes to his place: the canonarch remains standing in the centre, and recites the stichi, or versicles for the day. At the verse of the psalm, "In wisdom hast Thou made them all,"^d the priest removes, and, standing bare-headed, says the "prayers of the lychnic" before the holy doors. These prayers are seven prayers for pardon and protection during the night, each ending in the usual manner with the ascription of praise. After their conclusion the priest says the great "synapte" (τὴν μεγάλην συναπτήν). The appointed section (or Cathism—κάθισμα) of the Psalms is then said, and after that the deacon says the little "synapte."^e The office of vespers proper is then continued.

When there is no vigil, the rite is simple. The holy doors are not opened, but the priest, standing before them bare-headed and vested in a stole, says with a loud voice—"Blessed be our God in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages." Then the superior or the appointed monk recites the prooemiac psalm without modulation (χῆμα, i.e. "fusa voce sine cantu," &c., Goar), and the rest of the office is gone through as before.

In the Ambrosian office, the antiphon at the opening of vespers is still called "Lucernarium," and contains an obvious allusion to the name.

That for ordinary Saturdays and Sunday is:

"For Thou, O Lord, shalt light my candle; O Lord my God, make my darkness to be light.

"V. For in thee I shall discomfit a host of men [Lat. cripari a tentatione]; O Lord my God make my darkness to be light.

"Iterum. For Thou, O Lord," &c.

and that for other week days:

"The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom then shall I fear?

"V. The Lord is the strength of my life: of whom then shall I be afraid?

"Iterum. The Lord is my light," &c.

The Mozarabic vespers also begin (after the Kyrie Eleison and Paternoster, said secretly) with the salutation by the priest, "In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi lumen cum pace. R. Deo Gratia," and the "Lauda" which, with its prayer, immediately follows, has reference to the old rite, and is of precisely the same character as the Ambrosian "lucernarium."

The well-known hymn attributed by some to St. Ambrose, "Deus qui certis legibus noctem discernis ac diem," said in the Mozarabic

^c This word is interpreted by Goar (p. 29), "Canonum dux et incipitor," and may be sufficiently nearly represented by Precentor.

^d There is a difficulty in understanding these directions, as the verse, "In wisdom," &c., occurs earlier in the psalm than "When thou openest," &c.

^e The word synapte (συναπτή) is explained by Goar as "prayers compiled (compositas) for various persons and objects, and collected into one; whence the Greeks call it συναπτή, we (i.e. the Latins) collecta." Its form is that of a Litany, with Kyrie Eleison repeated after each clause. Of the two forms, here called great and small, one is fuller than the other. Prayers of this character are also called ἐκτενῆ, from their length, sometimes also εἰρηνικά, because the first petition they contain is for peace, or διακονικά, because said by the deacon. They are of varied form and contents, and occur very frequently in the Greek offices. The earliest form of a synapte is given in the Apostolic Constitution, viii. 9.

always held in the hands of the Egyptian gods and goddesses, and which the good spirit applied to the lips of the mummy to bring it again to life." (Catacombs of Alexandria.) He considers the adaptation of Egyptian sacred emblems to Christian purposes to be clear enough in these figures. Another from Denderah, which he figures after Denon, has the crux ansata for the principal cross, the looped postern of which surrounds the mouth of the lamp, and the central stem is extended upwards, so as to resemble a Greek cross also. No inscription on either lamp.

breviary on the second Sunday in Lent, is headed in a hymnary printed by Thomasius, vol. ii., "recedente sole, ac die cessante, hora incensi Lucernæ;" and the hymn of Prudentius, "Inventor rutili Dux bone fulminis," is called "Hymnus ad incensum Lucernæ." This is the ordinary opinion. Lesley, however, in the preface to the Mozarabic Missal, gives reasons derived from the composition of the hymn in favour of its having been composed, not for daily use, but for the lighting of the Paschal candle on Easter Eve. The hymn is said in the Mozarabic breviary on the Sunday after the Octave of the Epiphany, and, according to the Sarum and York rites, on Easter Eves at the benediction of the Paschal candle.

Reference to the Lucernarium may be seen in the following collects, which are the first collects (orations) at vespers in the Ambrosian rite on an ordinary Wednesday and Friday.

On Wednesday.—Vespertinum incensum nostrum quæsumus Domine, clementer intende, ut ignitum eloquium tuum credentium corda purificet. Per Dominum.

On Friday.—Gratias tibi agimus, omnipotens Deus, quod declinante jam die, nos vespertini luminis claritate circumdas: petimus immensam clementiam tuam: ut, sicut nos hujus luminis claritate circumvallas, ita Sancti Spiritus tui luce corda nostra illuminare digneris. Per Dominum. [H. J. H.]

LAMPSACUS, COUNCIL OF (Lampsacense concilium), held at Lampsaki on the Hellespont, A.D. 364, as Pagi shews. Orthodox bishops were invited to it; and it is described as a council of Homoousians by Sozomen (vi. 7) if the reading is correct. But those who directed it must have been really Semi-Arians; for they professed to be partisans of the Homoioian formula, and of the creed published at Antioch, besides siding with Macedonius by whom the godhead of the Holy Ghost was denied. What made Sozomen think well of them probably was that they were treated with marked favour by Valentinian; while they condemned the extreme party which Valens espoused, and which he ordered them into exile for dissenting from. On this too they seem to have despatched a still more orthodox account of themselves to Rome, which contented Liberius (Soc. iv. 12; comp. Mansi, iii. 378, and Roman Councils, 16). [E. S. Ff.]

LANCE, HOLY (ἁγία λόγχη, cultellus); a liturgical instrument of the Greek Church, in the shape of a small knife formed like a spear. The annexed representation from Goar gives its form. It is used in the common Greek rite in the preparatory office of prothesis to divide the Host from the holy loaf previous to consecration. This earlier fraction, the primitive antiquity of which is doubtful, is distinctly symbolical, and has no reference to the subsequent distribution, for which another fraction has always been made. The typical allusion to the circumstances of our Lord's Passion receives greater force and vividness in the Greek Church, from the use of the "holy spear" for the division of the loaf, as commemorative of the piercing of our Lord's body by the Roman soldier. The priest makes four cuts to separate the host from the oblation, and also stabs it more than once, accompanying every cut or stab with appropriate texts of Scripture, e.g. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter;" "One of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side," &c.

The use of the holy spear is not found in the purely Oriental liturgies, e.g. those of the Syrians and Egyptians, a fact which leads Renaudot to question whether the rite is of primitive antiquity, since these churches borrowed their discipline from the Greek Church in the earliest ages. It is entirely unknown in the Western Church.

LANDAFF, COUNCILS OF (Landavensia concilia). Three such are given in Mansi (ix. 763 sqq.) dated A.D. 560; but, even if genuine, they were simply meetings of the bishop, his three abbats, and his clergy, for excommunicating or absolving great offenders: in the 1st case Meuric, in the 2nd Morgan, kings of Glamorgan; in the 3rd Gwaedneth, king of Gwent; all of them under Oudoceus third bishop of Llandaff, and therefore scarcely before the 7th century. "The book, however, in which these records occur is a compilation of the 12th century" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, i., notes to pp. 125 and 147). [E. S. Ff.]

LANIPENDIA. In the Rule of Caesarius for Virgins (c. 27 in Acta SS. Jan. i. p. 732) the care of the wool from which the sisters' habits were to be made is committed to the care of the superior (praepositae) or the lanipendia, the sister appointed to take charge of the woollen manufacture. The word is used in a similar sense by Paulus, Digest. 24, 1, 38. [C.]

LANISTA. (1) A trainer of gladiators, who frequently contracted for the supply of swordsmen for Roman spectacles. The horror which the Christians felt for GLADIATORS [see the word] was of course intensified in the case of one who was regarded as a trader in man's flesh, and an accessory to murder. Thus Tertullian (de Idol. c. 11) says that if homicides are excluded from the church, lanistae are of course excluded. What they had done by the hands of others, they must be reputed to have done themselves.

Prudentius (c. Symmach. ii. 1095), speaking of the inhumanity of the vestals in going to the gladiatorial shows, seems to use lanista in the sense of a gladiator simply:

"sedet illa verendis
Vittarum insignis phaleris fruiturque lanistis."

(2) The word lanista was sometimes used contemptuously by Christian writers to designate a priest who actually slew victims with his hands. Thus Ennodius of Ticino († 521), in his sermon on the dedication of a church of the Apostles on the site of an idol's temple (Dict. ii.; in Migne, Patrol. 63, p. 268 C), speaks of the multitude of victims slain by the butcher-priests (per lanistas). He even speaks of the priest under the Mosaic law as "lanista Judaicus." (Bened. Cerei, Opusc. ix. 260 B.)

LANTERN. [IN ARCHITECTURE.] The elevated portion of the fabric covering the intersections of the nave and transepts of a church. In the earlier churches of the dromical or basilican plan the cruciform arrangement is not of frequent occurrence; where it is met with it is sometimes merely indicated by the position of the columns, no corresponding alteration being made in the roof. Sometimes the transept takes the form of another nave with its own continuous roof placed at right angles to the true nave, from which it is separated by the "arch of triumph." Neither of these arrangements allows of the introduction of a lantern. The earliest examples of this feature are met with in the Lombard churches, especially those of Pavia, in which a combination was attempted of the long nave and aisles of the old basilicas, and the dome of the Byzantine churches. The section of St. Michael's, at Pavia [GALLERY, I. 706], affords a very good example of this combination. We there see the centre of the cross elevated into a low octagonal tower, covered with a tiled roof containing a hemispherical cupola, supported on arched pendentives. We have a similar arrangement in the churches of San Pietro in cielo d'oro, built by king Luitprand, after A.D. 712, and San Teodoro, c. 750, in the same city. This novel feature speedily found general favour, and by the influence of the Carolingian kings of Italy, the Lombard style having passed into the Rhenish provinces and into France, the lantern was universally adopted in later churches. [E. V.]

LAODICEA, COUNCILS OF (Laodicea Concilia). (1) Held at Laodicea, in Phrygia, whither St. Paul, according to the inference drawn from Col. iv. 16, addressed a letter now lost (Westcott, Canon, p. 408, and App. E.), and St. John a remonstrance, as one of the churches named in the Apocalypse. Its date has been much canvassed. It was once thought contemporary with the council of Neo-Caesarea, and prior to that of Nicaea. Beveridge says the mention of the Photinians in the 7th canon negatives this, as there was no such sect then. But Ferrandus the deacon, in quoting this canon, omits the Photinians. The Isidorian version does the same. Besides, the classing of Photinians, who were fell heretics, between the Novatians and Quartodecimans, who were merely schismatics, in a canon where no others are named, seems more the act of a scribe than a council. Dionysius, however, bears out the Greek. On other grounds it may be said that these canons, having been from the earliest times placed after the canons of Antioch in the code of the church, we can hardly date them earlier than A.D. 341; and if their connexion with a council of Illyria, suggested by Beveridge (Annot. p. 193), and with the semi-Arian bishop Theodosius, suggested by Godfrey (ad Philostorg. viii. 3-4), be allowed, probably not earlier than A.D. 375 [ILLYRIAN COUNCIL, I. 813]. It would be thus a semi-Arian council, like that of Antioch, whose canons were received ultimately by the church for their intrinsic worth. We will consider the form in which they have come down to us further on. They were 59 in number, all on discipline: but the 59th, when given in full, is sometimes divided, so as to form a 60th.

By the 1st second marriages may be condoned after a time. By the 11th the appointment of female presbyters (πρεσβύτερες) is forbidden. Fourteen canons, beginning with the 14th, relate to services in church, and should all be studied, particularly the 19th, which is a locus classicus on the ordering of the liturgy. The 35th seems directed against the errors which St. Paul condemns (Col. ii. 18). The 45th forbids baptizing after the second week in Lent. The 46th appoints Maundy Thursday for the redditio symboli. The 50th forbids the breaking of the Lenten fast on that day. By the 52nd weddings and birthdays are not to be celebrated in Lent. By the 57th bishops are not to be ordained in future to villages and country places: and all who have been are to do nothing without leave from the city bishop. The presbyters destined to be their substitutes are to be similarly bound.

And now comes the 59th canon, of which there is a shorter and a longer form: the longer containing a catalogue of the books of the Old and New Testaments, specified as what ought to be read in church by this council. But this half of the canon is not found in the Latin version of these canons by Dionysius, nor in the Greek collection of John Scholasticus, any more than in the Latin collections of Martin or Cresconius all of which, however, exhibit the shorter form. Again, it is omitted in most Greek as well as Latin MSS. of these canons. On these grounds Professor Westcott, after considerable research, and with a praiseworthy desire to be impartial, has decided against its genuineness (Canon, pp. 382-90, and App. D. 1). But he has here deferred too much to his German authorities, and by so doing has missed more than one cardinal point in this inquiry. This is how the matter really stands. We seem to know of no Greek version of these canons earlier than the one represented by Dionysius in his translation. They form part of the 165 canons which he says he translated from the Greek. And this version could not have been known to the West much earlier than his own time, or these canons would not have been omitted entirely from the older Latin collection described as the Prisca Versio, of which the oldest MS. is in the Bodleian, and from other collections indicated by the Ballerini (de Ant. Coll. ii. 3).

Yet that there must have been another Greek version of them circulating in the West, coincidentally with, if not before, the Dionysian one, is clear, for this reason. The Isidorian version of these canons includes this catalogue: and among the canons attributed to the council of Agde, A.D. 506, by Hincmar and others (Mansi, viii. 323, with the note), no less than four of these Laodicean canons, the 20th, 21st, 30th, and 36th, are reproduced word for word, except where MSS. differ, in the Latin of the Isidorian version (ib. p. 366). Thus this catalogue must have been circulating in Spain and in the south of France, translated of course from the Greek when, or possibly before, Dionysius published his version in which it is wanting.

Another even more cardinal point remains. Anybody who will compare the form in which these canons are presented to us by Dionysius, with all the others translated by him, will see directly that it cannot have been the form in which they were passed, but that it is a mere abstract, identical with the form in which all canons are quoted in the Greek collection of John Scholasticus (περὶ τοῦ, &c.), and the Latin collections of Ferrandus and Martin. The abstract supplies merely the principle, not the details of each canon. Dionysius translated all the other canons in full, because the Greek contained them in full. Of the Laodicean he translated no more than a summary, because the Greek contained no more. The Greek from which the Isidorian version was made was likewise no less an abstract, except in this one case. Thus, except in this one case, the original canons have not been preserved, which accounts for their late appearance; and there is a reason both for this exception and also for its not having obtained general currency. Particular churches had their own catalogues of the Scriptures—their own use—which they would not have exchanged for another. Accordingly, Ferrandus and Martin have dispensed themselves from including any catalogue in their collections. Dionysius includes the African in his, because he was giving the African canons in full. Cresconius has it in his collection for the same reason, but omits it in his compendium, on grounds similar to those on which the Laodicean was omitted in the Greek copy which Dionysius and others had before them. John Scholasticus, patriarch of Constantinople, where probably there was no earlier use, gives that of the apostolic canons, as being most authoritative. Anyhow, he would have shrunk from borrowing on such a point from this synod, it being a semi-Arian synod. Professor Westcott has not failed to observe that the Laodicean Catalogue is identical with that of St. Cyril of Jerusalem. Just so, but was not St. Cyril connected at one time with the semi-Arians? Still further, may not its origin be thus held to account satisfactorily for its getting into the Spanish collection? In general the Latin-speaking churches were much attached to the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, of Tobit and Judith, which the African catalogue receives freely, but which this excludes, and to the Apocalypse, which this excludes also.

Let us now see which way intrinsic considerations point. The first half orders that no private psalms, nor uncanonical books, should be read in church. What were private psalms? There was just one such, at all events, that was popular in the Alexandrian church. It is called sometimes "a private psalm of David;" and sometimes "extra numerum." But it is reckoned the 151st psalm by St. Athanasius himself (Ep. ad Marcell. § 25); and it is also found as such in the Alexandrine Codex. Now, in the latter half, or catalogue, the Psalter is pointedly said to consist of 150 psalms, as if with the direct object of excluding this. Again, what is the one book of the New Testament which is not found in this catalogue? It is the Apocalypse—certainly not the least known in Asia Minor; yet when we recall the character of the special reference to the Laodicean church which it contains, its absence from the traditional list of books to be read in that church is surely natural.

But for this one omission in the New Testament, and saving that Baruch is coupled with Jeremiah in the old, and no reading of the Apocrypha tolerated in church at all, this Laodicean catalogue coincides with our own throughout: and it is identical with that of St. Cyril, as has been said, and embodies the mature judgment expressed by Eusebius, a still more pronounced partisan and contemporary. Thus its genuineness really presents no opening for attack on general grounds; while the special arguments in its favour, intrinsic as well as external, are full as strong as we could expect, always bearing in mind that these canons have come down to us through a collector, and not in the shape in which they passed (Mansi, iii. 563-600 with the notes; Hefele, § 93). The parallel case which occurs in Cresconius illustrates this to a nicety.

Possibly these canons had not been added to the code of the church when it was confirmed at Chalcedon; yet they must have formed part of it when Dionysius translated them, and as such been confirmed by the quinisext and 7th councils. But whether the 59th was confirmed in its longer or its shorter form, it was certainly not confirmed to the exclusion of the Apocalypse from the church catalogue.

LAPIDES SACRI. I. Bounds or landmarks, so called because originally consecrated to Jupiter by Numa Pompilius (FESTUS, s. v. Terminus).

They must be distinguished from the mile-stones or milliaria, which were also known as lapides. (DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANT. art. Milliare; Terminalia.)

The reverence for boundaries was, however, of far older growth. The Mosaic law forbade the removal of a landmark (Deut. xxvii. 17). Josephus (Antiq. Jud. lib. i. c. 2) attributes the first use of boundaries to Cain.

Among the Greeks landmarks were commonly put under the protection of some divinity (Plato, de Leg. viii.; Ulpian, Collet. Leg. Mosaic. xii.; Paulus, Sentent. i. 16, and v. 22, 2).

Caius Caesar (A.D. 37-41), in his agrarian law, imposed a fine on those who should remove landmarks, dolo malo, of fifty aurei, to go to the state (Digests, lib. xlvii.; tit. de Termino Moto, 22, n. 3).

Nero (A.D. 54-68) ordered the slave who should commit this offence to be put to death, unless his master would pay the penalty (ib. and see Callistratus, de Cognitionibus, lib. 3, 5).

Hadrian (A.D. 117-138) promulgated a law punishing the offence with various periods of imprisonment, with forced labour or with stripes, according to the position and age of the offender (ib. n. 2).

In the Corpus Juris Civilis a great mass of references has been collected by way of commentary on these laws, which may be consulted with advantage.

Later codes are much less distinct than the foregoing in their provisions, and less severe. In the code of Theodosius, A.D. 438 (lib. ix. tit. 1; de Accusatione, lib. 1), we have merely, "qui fines aliquos invaserit, publicis legibus subjurgetur."

Similarly in that of Justinian, A.D. 529 (lib. ix. tit. 2, de Accusationibus et Inscriptionibus), "eos qui terminos effoderunt, extraordinariâ animadversione coerceri deberi, praeses provinciae non ignorabit."

II. This phrase is also employed to censure the effacing of the ancient boundaries of dioceses, by bishops desirous of extending their jurisdiction. Pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417), in one of his letters (Ep. 8, ad Florentium), reminds the bishop to whom he wrote that the Scriptures forbade the removing of boundaries, and that therefore he should abstain from endeavouring to reduce others under his rule. In this sense we find pope Leo I. (A.D. 440-461) also writing to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ep. i. c. 8): "Suis igitur terminis contentus sit quisque, nec supra mensuram juris sui afflectet augeri."

Among the False Decretals are to be found many instances of the employment of the phrase in this symbolic sense, which is so far an evidence of usage at the time when they were concocted.

III. In the record of the proceedings of the second Nicene Council, A.D. 787, we find sacred images or statues referred to under this phraseology. [S. J. E.]

LAPSI. The term applied to Christians who in time of persecution denied their faith. In the early persecution under Domitian, A.D. 95-6, when it may be presumed that all who had been converted to Christianity had counted the cost of their profession, the name does not occur. But the severe onslaught on Christianity which was made a century later, in the reign of Severus, found the Christians less prepared to resist unto blood in behalf of their religion. Some bribed the soldiers and accusers to overlook them, others paid a sort of periodical tax to secure toleration. The exemption thus purchased, though stopping short of a positive lapse, was at best a compromise; and although the usage was permitted by some bishops, it, like flight in time of persecution, was abhorrent to the rigid Montanism of Tertullian (Tertull. de Fugâ in Persecutione, cc. 12, 13). The next persecution was that under the emperor Decius, A.D. 249-51. It was a systematic attempt to eradicate Christianity, not so much by putting its adherents to death, as by compelling them to recant. Participation in a heathen sacrifice was the test ordinarily applied. And the shameful eagerness with which Christians rushed to purge themselves by this test, and even carried their infants with them, is disclosed by Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 6, 7). Multitudes also only avoided the actual sacrifice by bringing certificates [LIBELLI] from the magistrates to the effect that they had offered. During the troubles of the church under Valerian, A.D. 258-60, instances of recantation were far more rare. But in the final persecution, which began under Diocletian, A.D. 303, and raged with intense severity until the edict of Constantine establishing religious equality, A.D. 313, the Christians were exposed to a new trial, to which numbers succumbed. An attempt was made to extirpate the sacred scriptures, and the lapsi who delivered up their books were branded with the name of TRADITORES.

The treatment of the lapsed who had polluted themselves with Paganism in the Decian persecution occupies a considerable part of the Epistles of Cyprian. His treatise de Lapsis, written immediately after the termination of the persecution, is an appeal to them to seek readmission into the church by penitence. The terms however on which they should be admitted were not easily decided. Cyprian himself had gone into concealment while the persecution was hottest, a course which somewhat compromised him in the eyes of the Roman clergy (Ep. viii.), but which he defended on the ground that he had received a divine direction (Ep. xvi. 3), and that his presence only exasperated the fury of the populace (Ep. xx. 1, de Lapsis, c. 8). From his concealment he had to determine how the lapsed should be treated. The matter was complicated by a practice which appears to have originated in the African church during the Severan persecution (Tertull. ad Martyr. c. 1), of confessors and martyrs giving letters of recommendation to penitents, requesting the bishops to shorten their penance. The practice was kept in some order by deacons visiting the martyrs in prison, and guiding and checking them in the distribution of their favours (Ep. xv. 1). On the cessation of the Decian persecution the privilege was greatly abused; for not only were letters given to any indiscriminately, but given in the name of martyrs who were dead (Ep. xxvii. 1, 2), and given in such a form as to include the friends of the petitioner (Ep. xv. 3). The custom afterwards led to such disorders as to call for the interference of councils (Conc. Eliber. c. 25, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 9). The holders of these letters demanded immediate communion, which some bishops, yielding to the popular clamour, granted (Ep. xxvii. 3). The decision of Cyprian was that the holders of letters of martyrs who were pressed by sickness, might be at once restored after confession, even before a deacon if death was imminent (Ep. xviii.) and after imposition of hands (Ep. xix.); but that the rest must wait till tranquillity was restored and "the bishops meeting with the clergy and in the presence of the laity who stood fast," could grant them the public peace of the church. If any meanwhile received the lapsed into communion, they should themselves be excommunicated (Ep. xxxiv. lv. 3). This decision was announced to the Roman clergy (Ep. xxvii.) and to the confessors at Rome (Ep. xxviii.), and met with the approval of the Roman church (Ep. xxx.).

In the spring of 251 Cyprian returned to Carthage, and, in a council with his bishops (Ep. lv. 4), made a formal investigation into the case of the lapsed. The conclusion announced was that libellatics were to be received at once (Ep. lv. 14); that some who had once sacrificed, but when put to the trial a second time, rather endured banishment and confiscation of goods, were likewise to be restored (Epp. xxiv. xxv.); that others who had at first confessed Christ, and when afterwards exposed to torture denied Him, and had been doing penance for three years, should no longer be excluded (Ep. lvi.); and that those who were sick should receive peace only at the point of death (Ep. lvii. 1). Of the remainder, the penance should be long protracted, but the hope of ultimate communion not denied (Ep. lv. 4). These decisions were also submitted to Rome, and accepted by Cornelius in a largely-attended synod (Ep. lv. 5). So matters remained till the following year, when Cyprian receiving, as he intimated, a divine warning of the renewal of the persecution, announced to Cornelius that a Carthaginian synod had resolved to receive into communion all the lapsed who desired to return (Ep. lvii.).

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

It was on the solution of these questions that Novatian broke away from the church. At the beginning of the difficulty two letters attributed to him (Epp. xxx. xxxvi. apud Cyp.) requested that the lapsed who were sick might be restored to communion. But afterwards, when his notions had become more rigid, he took up the position that the church had no power to restore them on any terms; he did not deny that they might personally repent, but that any repentance could ever lead to a re-admission to church communion. A lapsar by a unanimous decree of the Western church was debarred from ordination (Ep. lxvii. 6). And a priest who lapsed was restored only to lay communion. Cyprian indignantly repudiates the libel that the lapsing priest Trophimus was allowed after due penitence to resume his sacerdotal functions (Ep. lv. 8). But in troubled times these rules could not always be enforced (Bingham, Antiq. VI. ii. 4). [Compare LIBELLI.] [G. M.]

LARGIO, martyr at Augsburg, Aug. 12, Usuard (from Acts of St. Afra). He may be the same as the following, and Augsburg a mistake for August. [E. B. B.]

LARGUS, martyr on Salarian Way, translated to Ostian Way by pope Marcellus; commemorated March 16 (Mart. Rom. Gell., Bede, Ado, Usuard, Wand.); and Aug. 8 (Kal. Bucher; Mart. Hieron. D'Ach., Gell.; Mart. Ado, Usuard), (others do not name him this day); and (2) martyr in the East, Aug. 9 (Mart. Hieron.); and (3) at Aquileia, Mart. 16 (Usuard), 17 (Hieron. D'Ach.) are probably the same. Is the name Aquileia introduced from the martyrdom of Hilary? [E. B. B.]

LARNAX (λάρναξ) is sometimes used for a coffin. Thus the author of the life of St. Martina of Rome (Acta SS. Jan. i. p. 18) says that her body was placed in a coffin or shrine of onyx (onychinum larnacem). Compare Torigi de Cryptis Vaticanis, p. 551, 2nd ed. (Macri Hierolex. s. v. Larnax). [C.]

LASCO, martyr in Asia, Feb. 23 (cod. Usuard. Marchian.). D'Achery's edition of the Mart. Hieron. has Cosco. It may be the name of a place, or a confusion with Grisco. [E. B. B.]

LASREN, Lasrian, Laisrenn, Molaisi, Dolaisi, are forms of a name under which are distinguished or confounded—(1) son of Nadfraech, abbat of Devenesh, on Lough Erne, d. Sept. 12, 563, commemorated at Belach Ui Michen, Sept. 15. (2) or Lazarinus, abbat of Durrow, 3rd abbat of Iona, d. Sept. 16, A.D. 605. (3) at Men (in Queen's Co.?), Sept. 16. (4) on Lough Laoigh in Ulster, Oct. 25. (5), (6), (7), (8), Dec. 26, Jan. 17 and 19, March 8. (9) son of Caire, hermit at Lamlash, on coast of Arran, abbat of Rathkill and Leighlin, consecrated bishop at Rome † 639, commemorated April 18 (Mart. Donegal, p. 105, Bp. Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, p. 407 (who names him Molio, because a cave at Lamlash is called St. Molio's cave); Acta SS. Bolland. Apr. ii. 540). (10) abbat of Innis Murray, † Aug. 12, v. Reeves, Adamnan, p. 287. [E. B. B.]

LASREN, ORDER OF, or Molaisi, one of the eight orders of Irish monks. This Lasren was either (1) celebrated for love of a stone prison and of hospitality, or (2) "a flame of fire with his comely choristers." (Martyrology of Donegal, Dublin, 1864, pp. 245-247.) [E. B. B.]

LASSARA, virgin, Jan. 29 (Colgan, AA. SS. Hibern.). Thirteen others are commemorated in the Mart. Donegal, q. v. [E. B. B.]

LATERAN, COUNCIL OF (Lateranense Concilium), held A.D. 649, soon after the accession of pope Martin, in the church called Constantine's, at his palace on the Lateran, and chronologically the first of that name. Its deliberations were purely doctrinal and antimonothelite. Its acts have come down to us in Greek as well as in Latin, though Latin was, of course, the language employed. The Greek documents are said to have been translated into Latin in each case by one of the Roman notaries, before they were read out: letters from the African church, being in Latin, were read out as they stood. The number of bishops subscribing to it was 106, almost all Italians, including the pope; and of its sessions, or secretaries—so called from being held in the sacristy—five. The first was opened by a speech from the pope, followed by a letter to him from Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, to the same effect, which was read and approved. At the second, other orthodox documents addressed to himself or his predecessor were recited. At the third, writings of a contrary description, by Theodore, bishop of Pharan, and the patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople, Cyrus and Sergius, together with the Ecthesis of the emperor Heraclius, inspired by the latter, were produced and reflected upon. At the fourth, after some further comments on what had been read at the third, two more documents of the same kind were rehearsed:—1, a letter of Paul, actual patriarch of Constantinople, to the late pope Theodore; and 2, the Type of Constans, the reigning emperor. Both having been pronounced unsound, codices of the dogmatic rulings of each of the previous five general councils were produced from the papal archives and read out in answer to them all. Among these was the celebrated ordinance at the end of the definition of the fourth council, on the unalterableness of the creed. Attention was again directed in the last session to that subject, by reciting what the fifth council had said of its entire agreement with the other four, and with all the great fathers and doctors of the church: extracts from whom were then read, to shew their harmony with each other. Similarly, passages were produced afterwards from the works of earlier heretics, to expose their agreement with the errors that were now broached. Twenty canons followed in condemnation of Monothelism and its patrons in the East, who are several times mentioned by name; complete reserve being maintained about pope Honorius throughout. Letters to announce this result, or in connexion with this subject, were despatched by the pope to the emperor Constans, the metropolitans of Carthage and Philadelphia, and other churches of the East; besides an encyclical to the faithful in general. In all of them he styles himself "servus servorum Dei." Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, it should be added, in writing to him, arrogates the same style. (Mansi, x. 789-1188.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATERCULUS. A tile or earthenware tablet on which the times of the moveable festivals, or at least of Easter, were inscribed, with the view of giving public notice of them. Thus the 4th council of Orleans (A.D. 541) enacted (c. 1) that Easter should be celebrated according to the laterculus or cycle of bishop Victorius. That confusion arose in Spain at a somewhat later date from the difference of the Paschal-cycles in use (diversa observantia laterculorum) is evident from the 5th canon of the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633), which enjoins the several metropolitans, three months before Epiphany, to consult each other, and when they have ascertained the proper day for the celebration of Easter to signify it to their comprovincial bishops.

LATIN, USE OF [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE].

LATINA, martyr, June 2 (Mart. Hieron D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LATINUS, bishop of Brescia (2nd century), March 24 (Acta Sanctorum, March, iii. 473). [E. B. B.]

LATOPOLIS, COUNCIL OF (Latopolitanum Concilium), A.D. 347, at Latopolis, in Upper Egypt, at which St. Pachomius was put on his defence. (Mansi, iii. 141.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATROCINALIS is a name given to the synod which met at Ephesus A.D. 449 [EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF (6), I. 615]. It was also applied by pope Nicolas to the "conciliabulum" assembled by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 863. [C.]

LATUNUS, first bishop of Seix in Normandy, † June 20 (Acta SS. Jun. v. 10). The name is almost certainly Teutonic. [E. B. B.]

LAUDA. (1) A short antiphon which occurs after the gospel in the Mozarabic mass. In the Regula prefixed to the breviary, a lauda is thus distinguished from an antiphona—"Antiphona est, quae dicitur sine Alleluia; et Lauda quae cum Alleluia dicitur." But a lauda retains its name when Alleluia is omitted at the proper season. The Gospel is concluded with "Amen," and then after the salutation "The Lord be with you," R. "And with thy spirit," follows the Lauda. The normal form is a verse, usually, though not always, taken from the Psalms, preceded and followed by Alleluia. Thus the Lauda for Ascension Day is "Alleluia, V. God is gone up with a merry noise, and the Lord with the sound of the trumpet. Alleluia." After the first Sunday in Lent Alleluia is omitted till Easter Eve, when it is resumed; an additional lauda without Alleluia being said on that day after the Epistle. On the Thursday before Easter the Lauda is longer than usual, and consists of seven verses (not consecutive) of Ps. cviii. (cix. Eng. Ver.); and on Good Friday there is no Lauda, but Preces instead.

In the Ambrosian mass the corresponding antiphon is called Antiphona post Evangelium. In the Roman there is nothing which corresponds, and the Creed follows the Gospel immediately.

(2) An antiphon of the same character as the foregoing, but longer, and broken up into verse and response, several of which occur in the day-hours of the Mozarabic breviary. They vary with the office of the day. They are thus said:—

At Vespers, two; one at the beginning of the office, short, and usually with a reference to the time of day; the other before the hymn, somewhat longer, and with "Glory and honour," &c. (*), introduced before the last clause. Also at the close of the office after the benediction, additional laudae are found. Most frequently one, though often two or more (for instance, on the third Sunday in Lent there are as many as six), each followed by a short prayer (oratio), generally a reproduction of the sentiment of the Lauda. These correspond in some measure to the Commemorations of the Roman breviary.

At lauds two are said in the course of the office, and one, or sometimes more, each with its prayer at the end, as at vespers.

At each of the lesser hours, except compline, when there is none, a lauda is said before the hymn. This is the general arrangement, but there are of course exceptions. There is also a short "commemoration" (of the time of day) after vespers and lauds daily, which consists of a short lauda and a prayer.

As specimens of the ordinary form of lauda, those for the first vespers of the first Sunday in Advent may be given:—

Lauda at the beginning of the Office.—"From the rising up of the Sun, unto the going down of the same. P. The Lord's name be praised. V. Blessed be the name of the Lord, from this time forth for evermore."

[This Lauda never has "Alleluia."]

Before the Hymn.—"Alleluia. Send us help from the sanctuary; and strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord.^b P. When we call upon thee. Alleluia, Alleluia. V. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and triumph in the name of the Lord our God. P. And strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord. V. Glory and honour, &c. P. When we call upon thee."

LAUDACIA (Mart. Gell.); Laudaia (Hieron. D'Ach.); martyr, July 26. Probably a copyist's error for the place Laodicea.

[E. B. B.]

LAUDACUS. [LAUDICEUS.]

LAUDANA or LAUDUNA. In Anastasius Vitae Pontif. (s. v. Adrian, § 325, Migne), we read that pope Adrian made two "laudanas" of silver, weighing eight pounds each, which he placed over the RUGAE [probably doors or curtains] of the presbytery, where the silver arch is. Calepinus supposes these laudanae to have been rods or cornices of silver; but in fact their nature and use appear to be altogether matter of conjecture.

(Macri Hierolex.; Ducange, Gloss. s. v.) [C.]

^a The Mozarabic form of the Gloria Patri is "Gloria et Honor Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum." The word Honor was added at the fourth council of Toledo, the addition being justified by the words of Ps. 28 [E. V. 29] v. 2, "Afferte Domino gloriam et honorem," &c., and by the ascription of praise in Apoc. v. 12, "Dignus est Agnus . . . accipere honorem et gloriam et benedictionem" (Brevis Missae Mozarabum Explicatio, A. Lorenzana).

^b This "P" is explained by Arevalus as Psalmus. It has also been taken to stand for Presbyter.

LAUDEMIUM (also written Laudimium). The name which is given to the price which a farmer or a vassal paid to the owner or feudal lord of the and on being invested with the possession of a copyhold tenure [EMPHYTEUSIS], or on a renewal of the investiture; or for the right of alienating the fief to another. "Concessimus quod de feodis et retrofeodis in emphytheosin . . . datis . . . nulla financia debeatur, nisi seu fuerint castra, ville, seu loca alia . . . quo a nobis in feudum vel homagium, seu ad servitium aliud teneantur, de quibus alienationem fieri nolumus sine nostro Laudemio, aut nostra gratia speciali." (Præcep. Lud.: x. Fr. Reg., quoted by Ducange.) The amount of the Laudemium varies. In Germany it is stated to be 2 per cent. of the estimated value of the property at the time of entering or renewal: and in Bavaria, and practically in a large part of Germany, to amount to 5 per cent. of that value. The law of emphyteusis was derived from the Roman law, and introduced into ecclesiastical law with but slight modification of the civil procedure. The object of emphyteusis was always real property, usually land, but it might be a building. The owner of the property was called dominus emphyteusos; and the tenant, emphyteuticarius, or emphyteuta.

The word laudes is used in a similar sense for the price paid by a vassal to his feudal lord for the power of alienating his fief to another; and laudare in the sense of receiving such laudes. The words laudemium and laudes both imply the consent and approbation which the feudal lord gives to the translation. (v. Ducange in loco, Pichler, Jus Can. lib. ii. lit. xvii. 24, &c.)

LAUDICEUS, bishop, buried in the cemetery of Callistus, and perhaps after the time of Sixtus III. commemorated, with the other popes and bishops there buried, on Aug. 9 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. 33–46, 228, 229).

LAUDOMAR [v. LAUNOMARUS].

LAUDS (1), see HOURS; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

(2) Under the Lower Empire when public honour was done to a great personage the acclamations of the people, which took a conventional shape, were called Laudes (Gr. πολυχρόνιον). The customary formula under the heathen emperors may be learnt from the cries of the Roman army on an occasion mentioned by Lampridius (Vita Diadum.): "Jupiter Optime Maxime, Macrino et Antonino vitam. Tu scis, Jupiter, Macrinus vinci non potest. Tu scis, Jupiter, Antoninus vinci non potest" (Lindenbr. in Ammian. Hist. xvii. 13). After a speech of Constantius to his soldiers (A.D. 358) the whole assemblage of them, "vocibus festis in laudes imperatoris assurgens, Deumque ex usu testata non posse Constantium vinci, tentoria laeta repetit" (Ammian. u. s.). Whether they gave a Christian turn to the laudes or retained the old cry does not appear. The historian uses the word Deum in the case of Julian (363), whose soldiers would certainly appeal to Jupiter: "Principem superari non posse Deum usitato more testati" (xxiv. 1); and it is worthy of note that the soldiers of Valens, when deserting to Procopius at Mygdos in 365, called Jupiter to witness: "Testati Jovem invictum Procopium" fore" (ibid. xxvi. 6). The custom, however, at length assumed a Christian character, and was observed even in churches. When St. Augustine, in a synod held in the church of the Peace at Hippo, A.D. 426, proposed Eraclius as his coadjutor with right of succession, "a populo acclamatum est. Deo Gratus: Christo Laudes, dictum est vicies terties. Exaudi Christe, Augustino vita, dictum est sexies decies. Te patrem, te episcopum, dictum est octies" (August. Epist. 213, § 1). A similar instance occurs in the history of a synod held under Symmachus, who became pope in 498: "Exaudi, Christe. Symmacho papae vita sit," was repeated twelve times (Gratian, ii. xvi. 57). About the year 520 we read of the legates of the bishop of Rome being met by Justin the emperor and Vitalian the consul, "cum gloria et laudibus" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. R. n. 53; comp. nn. 84, 105; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 11). The portraits of the usurper Phocas and his wife were received with acclamations at Rome on April 25, 602, "in the basilic of Julius by all the clergy and senate," the cry being, "Exaudi, Christe. Phocae Augusto et Leontiae Augustae vita" (Relatio inter Epp. Greg. M. xi. 1; Labbe, Conc. v. 1509; comp. Vita Greg. auct. Joan. Diac. iv. 20). On one of Charlemagne's visits to Rome Hadrian, while "celebrating masses to Almighty God, caused lauds to be paid to the aforesaid Charles" (Anast. v. s. n. 97). When the same prince was crowned by Leo III. on St. Peter's Day, 800, the lauds were, "Carolo piissimo Augusto a Deo coronato, magno, pacifico imperatori" (ibid. 98). After anointing him the pope said mass, or more probably proceeded with it—the account being thus continued: "Et peractâ missâ . . . obtulit ipse," &c. From later authorities we learn that acclamations in a mass took place after the collect. See Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. iii. 13; Ordo Rom. xii. i. 2, xiii. 7, 10 (ante epistolam post orationem), xiv. 31; in Mus. Ital. ii. They were at length formed into litanies to Christ and the saints—e.g. the priest says thrice and the clerks respond, "Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat. Then the priest says, Exaudi Christe. The clerks answer, Nicolao summo Pontifici et universali papae vita. The litany follows. Salvator mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Petre, S. Paule, S. Andrea, &c. And the response to each is, Tu illum adjuva. Then follows, Exaudi Christe. Ludovico a Deo coronato, magno et pacifico regi vita et victoria. Redemptor mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Michael, S. Gabriel, S. Raphael, S. Joannes, &c., with the response to each, Tu illum adjuva;" and similarly for any number of persons, fresh saints being invoked for each (Bona, Rer. Lit. ii. v. 8, from Goldastus, Antiq. Alem. ii. 2). Compare a form in Martene u. s. from a Soissons MS. Durandus (Pontificale MS. cited by Sala on Bona u. s.) speaks of lauds which began like the foregoing (Christus vincit, etc), as said not after the collect, but "immediately after the Kyrie eleison."

LAURA. The small monastic communities in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, called Lauras, are a connecting link in the history of the rise and progress of monachism, between the solitary asceticism of the hermitage and the more organised, less self-dependent asceticism of the monastery. A laura was an aggregation of separate cells, under the not very strongly defined control of a superior, the inmates meeting together only on the first and last days, the old and new Sabbaths, of each week for their common meal in the refectory, and for their common worship in the chapel attached to each of these lauras. On the other days of the week they dwelt apart from one another, each in the silence and solitude of his cell, subsisting on bread and water, the ordinary fare of the primitive founders of monasticism. The cells, though separate, were in close proximity to one another, like the wigwams of an Indian encampment, and all clustering round the chapel of the community. (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. Menardi Comment. III. i.; Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s.v. Laura; Joan. Hierosol., Vit. Joan. Damasc. p. 693.) Usually each cell contained one inmate only; but under Pachomius, in Tabenna, three resided together in each cell (Sozom. H. E. iii. 14).

The origin of the word "Laura" is uncertain. By one account it is Ionic (Du Cange, Glossar. Gr. s.v.); by another, it is a contraction of the Greek for labyrinth (λαβύρινθος) and expressive of the narrow pathways winding in and out among the cells ("wynds"); more probably it is another form of "labra" (λάβρα), the popular term in Alexandria for an alley or small court. (Suicer, Thes. Eccles. s.v.; Epiphanius, Haeres. xlix.) The worst explanation of the word is that which derives it from "οἱ λαοὶ ῥέουσι," as if it were a thoroughfare, along which a crowd streams.

One of the most celebrated lauras was one founded by Chariton, a hermit, at Pharan, near Jerusalem (Bulbeau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoist, I. i.). Others are recorded to have been founded in the 5th century by Sabas, a celebrated desert-saint, Gerasimus, Euthymius and the empress Eudocia.

As the coenobitic life became more prevalent, young and inexperienced monks were discouraged generally from venturing on the solitary life without previous training with other monks, under the authority and supervision of an abbat. Thus Euthymius advised the youthful Sabas to quit his separate cell in the laura, and to join a coenobium for a time (Cyril. Scythopol. Vit. S. Sab.). Gerasimus is said to have established a coenobium in the midst of his laura (Cyril. Scythopol. Vit. S. Euthym.).

Obviously life in a laura incurred a twofold danger, being exposed at the same time to the temptations peculiar to solitude, and to those which are incidental to a number of persons living together under no strict rule, without much restraint of any kind, and without the necessity of constant occupation. The denizens of a laura are sometimes termed "lauretae" (Mosch. Prot. cc. 3, 4); they have been compared to the "inclusi" of Western monachism, but there are many points of difference. [See INCLUSI.]

his office of deacon. In the church of St. Laurence, in Agro Verano, at Rome, there is a mosaic of the 6th century, representing the martyr with an open book in his hand, on which may be read the words "dispersit, dedit pauperibus" (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxvi. 2), in allusion to his kindness to the poor.

St. Laurence. From Martigny.

Like other martyrs he bears a cross, frequently jewelled (Aringhi, ii. 354). In the basilica of Galla Placidia, at Ravenna, there is a mosaic shewing him standing before the heated gridiron, holding the cross and the Gospels (Vet. Mon. i. lxvii.). On the bottom of a glass cup the sacred monogram, with A on one side and ω on the other, is placed behind the head of the saint (Bottari, tab. cxcviii.). Sometimes we find him seated between St. Peter and St. Paul, as though the Apostles having introduced him into the heavenly city were giving him an honourable place therein (Buonarri. p. 104). Another glass cup has the figure of the saint, with the legend Victor Vivas, in nomine Lavreti (Buonarroti, xix. 2); this cup may very likely have been used at an AGAPE on the martyr's day, which was observed at Rome with much solemnity. Lupi (Dissert. e Lett. i. 192-197) describes two ancient representations of the martyrdom of St. Laurence; one, a cameo, shews the saint stretched upon a gridiron, while two executioners stir the fire beneath, and a third brings wood to replenish it; in the other, a leaden medallion, we see the martyr at the moment of death; his soul, personified by a female figure, ascending with clasped hands, receives a crown from the outstretched arm which symbolises the Almighty; the emperor, laurelled and sceptred, is seated in a curule chair, and seems by his attitude to be giving directions; a slave stands by his side. Arevalo (in Prudent. p. 936) gives a glass which represents the martyr face downwards on the gridiron, his name LAVRECIV being written above.

(Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

LAURENCE (Laurentius, Lorenzo, Laurent, Louwerijs), chief deacon of Rome, broiled to death Aug. 10, A.D. 258.

The fact is not mentioned by extant writers till the middle of the 4th century, and yet had an immediate and wide-spread influence (which it will be the object of this article to trace) on the life of the church.

It may be taken as a typical instance of martyrdom, so that under this head it will be possible to gather specimens of all the honours that were paid to martyrs.

I. As administrator of the charities of the metropolitan church, Laurence is celebrated in ancient liturgies almost as much as for his sufferings. "He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor," is quoted in the Greek cathisma, and is the introit in the Gregorian missal. The Mozarabic lessons, Ecclus. xxxi. 5-12; 2 Cor. ix. 7-13; Matt. vi. 19-34, apply rather to the deacon than to the martyr, and there is the same epistle in the Ambrosian liturgy (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). Nor did he only administer temporal relief, but the reading of the Gospel and the cup of the Lord. Hence the late legend of his connexion with the Holy Grail. However he had died, all the Christians and all the poor of Rome would have felt his loss.

II. When such a man was stretched naked ($\acute{\alpha}\pi\lambda\omega\theta\epsilon\iota\varsigma$, lit. 'simplified,' Menology of Basil) on an iron grating over a slow fire, and "his living limbs hissed over the coals" (the phrase is found alike in the Roman Sacramentaries of Leo and of Gelasius, in the Mozarabic and the Gothic), the grief, the horror, the admiration, and the awe, would make it an anniversary never to be forgotten. The death by torture of a Roman citizen was not a common thing. It was a deed intended to strike terror far and wide.

III. His anniversary is fixed to Aug. 10 by the Feriale of Liberius (A.D. 354), and the universal consent of Western and Byzantine calendars. Aug. 11, if ever found, is merely a slip. In the metrical martyrology of Bede, for 'bissenis,' read

"Bis binis victor superat Laurentius hostem."

The lectionary of Luxeuil and sacramentary of Bobbio are said to stand alone in the West in omitting Laurence (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). But as the same sacramentary commemorates Laurence daily in the ordinary mass, it is manifest that the omission only shews that Columban's monks had no special service for the day, not that they omitted the commemoration. He is found in the Feilire of Aengus the Culdee.

There does not seem to be the same general consent about any other festival of the church whatsoever.

IV. Prudentius, in his hymn for the day, declares that from that day forward the worship of the foul gods grew cold, that his death was the death of the temples ($\pi\epsilon\pi\lambda\iota\ \sigma\tau\epsilon\phi\acute{\alpha}\nu\omega\upsilon\varsigma$, iii. 497, 509). The canon in the Greek liturgy speaks of him (ode δ) as "finally plucking down the memorial of the impious conceit of the erring."

If this be so, it is important to fix the epoch of his death. Now this may be done with certainty, though from the close of the 5th century onwards there was a wide-spread error as to the date, which referred it to the persecution of Decius. We are, however, enabled to correct the error by the abundant evidence that Laurence suffered a few days after pope Xystus or Sixtus II. And we know, from the contemporary evidence of Cyprian, that Sixtus was executed on the 6th of August in the opening of the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 258 (Cypr. Ep. 82, ed. Migne). Cyprian himself suffered in the following month.

V. Now generally the Greek menologies, the Egyptian-Arabic menology (v. Acta SS. Aug. tom. li. 125 B), the Spanish-Gothic calendar (Migne, Patrol. lxxxv. 1051), and the Mozarabic missal and breviary, transfer Xystus from the 6th to be subordinated to and celebrated along with Laurence on the 10th. This is the more remarkable, as Xystus is said to have been of Greek extraction, and as the Mozarabic lessons are concerned with the diaconate of Laurence. The fact that while Ambrose has separate hymns (72, 73) for Sixtus and Laurence, Prudentius has only one for both, seems to shew that these were the primitive arrangements in Spain. They are quite peculiar to that country in the West. The Synaxarion in the menology of Basil makes Xystus say to Laurence, "To-morrow we are delivered up." But Prudentius (like Ambrose, de Off. i. 41) makes him predict the martyrdom of the latter after an interval of three days, c. 28.

VI. The canon in the Greek liturgy is addressed to Laurence alone, and consists of eight odes, 32 troparia on the ACROSTIC [see I. 14].

Λαυρέντιον κράτιστον ἡμῶν προφρόνως.

VII. In Ethiopia Laurence seems to be commemorated as Lavernius on Nahasse 15=Aug. 8 (v. Ludolf, Comm. Hist. Ethiop. p. 425). In the ancient Syrian martyrology, Sixtus is the only Roman martyr (see De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, ii. 376). Eusebius in his history seems ignorant of the martyrdom even of Sixtus. Cyprian does not mention Laurence. The calendar of Carthage, like the rest of the West, distinguishes the festivals of Xystus and Laurence.

VIII. There is another saint joined with Laurence in the Greek liturgy, his jailor and convert Hippolytus, whose name seems to have suggested that he should be dragged along the ground by wild horses till he died:

τὸν Ἰππόλυτον ἱπποδεσμίων λέγω ἐνάντιον πασχόντα τῇ κλήσει πάθος.

His death is clearly mentioned as subsequent to those of Laurence and Xystus. The calendar of Polemeus Silvius at Rome in A.D. 448, including nine only of the most popular festivals, omits Xystus, but inserts both Laurence and Hippolytus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 676).

IX. These two festivals were the great harvest home of the Roman church. St. Laurence's day is still the signal for burning the stubble in the Campagna (Knight, Latium, 3). So the rustics would perhaps be better able to resort to the city for the second festival, which is graphically described by Prudentius.

X. The Sacramentary of Leo has only one mass distinctly for Hippolytus's festival, but seven for Sixtus, and fourteen for Laurence. The 1st, 10th, and 12th of these seem to be for his vigil, for they speak of 'preventing' his day. There is also a mass for the vigil in the Sacramentaries of Gelasius and Gregory.

XI. In the Sacramentary of Gregory, two masses are given on the day itself, an early and a public mass. The Capitulare given in Martene (Thes. v. 76), which is referred by De Rossi to the opening year of Benedict II., gives the gospel for the vigil Matt. xvi. 24-28; for the early mass Matt. x. 37-42; for the public mass John xii. 24-26. One of Augustine's sermons for the festival (Sermon 305) is on the last-named gospel. Sermon 304 refers to Prov. xxiii. 1, 2 as the Old Testament lesson. Sermons 302 and 303 seem to refer to Matt. v. 12 and Luke xxi. 19 as read in the gospel for the day, but the references may really be to Matt. x. 42 and Matt. xvi. 25, in which case the arrangements would be the same in Africa as at Rome, and Sermon 303, in which he complains of the small attendance and great heat, would be preached at the vigil. In the modern Roman missal the gospel is John xii. 24-26 still, and the epistle is abridged from that in the Mozarabic and Ambrosian liturgies, Chrysologus of Ravenna, in his 135th sermon, quotes Phil. i. 29 as part of the epistle for the day. This would be very applicable to the deacon in the absence of his bishop. To Maximus of Turin three homilies (74-76) and four sermons (70-75) on this feast are ascribed. The 3rd of these sermons (72) is word for word the same as is ascribed to Leo. Three times in the other sermons he quotes Luke xii. 49, which may have been one of the gospels read at the festival in Turin.

XII. The Sacramentary of Gelasius, though it does not give a second mass to the day, gives vespers collects such as this:—"May his blessing be with us in Thy glory whose confession in Thy virtue has to-day been made our plea." Cf. 2 Pet. i. 3.

XIII. The Sacramentary of Gregory does not give a special service for the octave. No more does the modern missal, though the day is still observed. This, and the octave of Peter and Paul, are the only two in Usuard. The permanence of his felicity is made in Leo and Gelasius the ground for a repeated memorial of it.

XIV. The Gothic missal has neither vigil nor octave. From the absence of a triple benediction the feast would seem to have been less important in France than those of Andrew, Stephen, John, the Holy Innocents, Cecilia and Clement. Neither Boniface nor Charlemagne prescribe it as a holiday (sabbatizandum), only Chrodegang names it among those on which there is to be full service (Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, t. 5, pt. 1, p. 299). In this missal Sixtus and Hippolytus are not associated with Laurence on his day, but he is commemorated in the proper prefaces on theirs as well as on his own. The Sacramentary of Leo says much of Sixtus leading the way for his deacons, but it commemorates two others of them along with him. The Gothic missal applies the same thus: "He was an example to others, for Laurence followed." And on the 13th it says: "Who when Hippolytus was yet occupied in the tyrant's service of a sudden madest him the fellow of Laurence." So the Mart. Hieron., which belongs to Auxerre, names both Laurence and Hippolytus on the 6th, as well as on their own days.

XV. In the Greek church the triple festival falls within the octave of the Transfiguration, which is therefore commemorated on it. Hence in one échos the martyrdoms are viewed as themselves a theophany.

XVI. In the litany used at compline throughout Lent, in the Greek church, Laurence is named next to the Apostles and Stephen. He is invoked in the Breton Litany (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, ii. 82). Also in the Coronation Litany (Muratori, Lit. Rom. ii. 463).

XVII. He is commemorated in the ordinary canon of the mass, in the Gelasian, Frankish and Gregorian missals, and in that of Bobbio. He is put next to the early popes and Cyprian.

(For the Western liturgies in the above article we have used Muratori Liturgia Romana, t. i. 389-401, 658-662; t. ii. 108-113, 625-629; also t. i. 696; ii. 3, 693, 777. For the Eastern, Arcudius, Anthologica.)

CHURCHES OF ST. LAURENCE.

A. Rome, Foris Murum.

I. The Basilica di San Lorenzo fuori is said to have been founded by Constantine (Anastasius, Vita Silvestri).

II. Of Sixtus III. we are told, "Moreover he made a basilica to the blest martyr Laurence, which Valentinianus Augustus (the 3rd) granted, where also he offered gifts" (Anast. Vit. xlvi.). This was a new basilica beside the old. Rededication of it to Laurence, Sixtus and Hippolytus is mentioned in the Mart. Hieron., Nov. 2 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. 36). Hilary made beside the church of Laurence, monasteries and a bath and a praetorium of St. Stephen (Anast. Vit. xlviii.). Then after the one year's popedom of Anastasius, Symmachus in the days of Theodoric, "constructed beside the church of St. Laurence," as well as of St. Paul and St. Peter, "habitations for the poor" (Anast. Vit. liii.). We read in the time of Belisarius (A.D. 537), that "the churches and bodies of the martyrs were exterminated by the Goths" (Anast. Vit. lx. § 99).

Anastasius tells us that Pelagius II. (A.D. 577-590), who was made pope at a time when the Lombards were devastating Italy, and when there were such rains as threatened a deluge (and would therefore endanger a church built on a hillside), "made over the body of the blest martyr Laurence a basilica constructed from the foundation, and adorned his sepulchre with tablets of silver" (Anast. Vit. lxxv.). The mosaic inscription enables us to identify the presbytery or most ancient part of the present church as identical with this church of Pelagius. The old pavement, recently brought to light, dates from the 6th century.

For a discussion of this basilica De Rossi in the Bullettini for 1864 may be consulted.

B. Rome, within the Walls.

I. In Damaseo, parochia.—We are told by Anastasius that Pope "Damasus made two basilicas, one to St. Laurence near the theatre of Pompey, another outside the walls on the Aurelian Way, where he himself rests," †385.

II. In Fonte.—S. Lorenzo in Fonte is near the Forum of Trajan on the way to the Esquiline, and is said to contain the fountain that sprang up at his prayers to enable him to baptize Hippolytus. This church may also have been founded by Damasus: see an epigram in Migne (Patrol. xiii. 411 n.).

III. In Lucinae.—The church in Lucinae, which is on the site of the Horologium of Augustus, is said by Tillemont to be often mentioned in the time of Symmachus, A.D. 498-514 (Tillem. Mém. iv. 597).

IV. In Miranda, monasterium.—S. Lorenzo in Miranda is in the temple of Antoninus Pius, and Faustinae in the Forum, near the church of St.

Adriano, in the old temple of the Three Fates. There was a monastery that had long been in ruins and inhabited by seculars, that Adrian restored in the name of SS. Adriano and Lorenzo and richly endowed.

V. In regione tertia, parochia.—Simplicius (A.D. 468-483) constituted a hebdomada [OCTAVE] for the third region at St. Laurence, that presbyters should remain there for the sake of penitents and baptism. S. Lorenzo a' Monti may represent the parish, but not the site of the church.

VI. In Panis perna.—The church in Panis perna is said to be where Laurence was put to death in the baths of Olympias. There have been many conjectures as to the name, but it is simply explained by the fact that there was a temple of Silvanus or Pan at this place (see Venuti, Antichità di Roma, c. vi. p. 101).

VII. Ad Taurellum.—The roof of a church of Laurence ad Taurellum, "dum nimis vetustissimum inerat," was repaired by Adrian. Of S. Lorenzo in piscibus, de' PP. delle scuole, close to St. Peter's, I find no trace unless it be this.

VIII. In Formosa.—The church in Formosa was close to the church of St. Cyriacus, probably therefore on the Pincian (Anastasius, Vita Adriani Patr. xcvi. n. 95). This, and those in Lucina and in Damaseo, were the three important churches of Laurence in Rome in Charlemagne's time. Montfaucon (Diar. Ital. c. 14, p. 205) gives no reason for identifying it with Panis perna.

IX. In Palatinis, Monasterium.—There was a monastery of St. Laurence "on the Palatine in the deserts" that Adrian restored and joined with a monastery of Stephen, called Bajanda. It is often mentioned later, as a limit of floods. Mr. Burn (Rome, p. 177, see plan at p. 155) thinks he has identified the basilica of Jove, where Laurence was tried, as on the Palatine.

XI. Oratorium in the Lateran.—There was a chapel of Laurence in the Lateran where Toto was ordained, A.D. 768.

XII.—Stations in the Churches.—There were stations in the churches and basilica on LXX^{ma}. Sunday ad S. Laurentium; gospel, the labourers in the vineyard.

Foris Murum.

The Friday after the 1st Sunday in Lent.

The 3rd Sunday.

The Saturday before the 5th Sunday.

The Wednesday after Easter. John xxi.

In Lucinae; Friday after the 3rd Sunday in Lent.

In Damaseum; Tuesday after the 4th Sunday.

Those in italics are still observed.

C. Elsewhere.

I. In Constantinople.—The relics of St. STEPHEN are said to have been brought by Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius II., to Constantinople in A.D. 439, and laid in the church of St. Laurence there, which her husband's sister Pulcheria had built near her own palace, in a place called Petron or Blachernae, on the left of the Ceratine Gulf, in front of a church of the Virgin. Marcellinus Comes (in De la Bigne, vi. 1, 365); Theodorus Lector (ib. 505); Procopius (de Aedit. Justin. i. 6, 17). The union of the relics of Stephen, Laurence, and Agnes in this church is said to be commemorated Sept. 29, but is not in the Menology of Basil (Tillem. iv. 598).

II. At Ravenna.—There was in the beginning of the 5th century a church of St. Laurence at Ravenna.

III. At Milan.—The basilica of St. Lorenzo at Milan was originally the cathedral. There is an epigram on it by Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 505), poem lvi. (De la Bigne, Bibl. Vet. Patr. vi. 1, 301).

IV. At Tivoli and Porto.—There was also a church of Laurence at Tivoli, restored by Leo III. And at Porto he had both a church and a monastery on the island, with vineyards attached.

V. At Norcia there was a church destroyed by the Lombards, and rebuilt by Sanctulus, as we are told by Gregory the Great (Dial. 3, 36).

VI. In Switzerland.—At Brionum Castra (probably Brione, in the Val Verzasca) there was a church of St. Laurence burnt down by the Lombards, in the rebuilding of which a celebrated miracle occurred. See Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. i. 42).

VII. In Gaul.—The churches of St. Laurence traceable in Gaul are—a. At Vienne, built by St. Severus about A.D. 450, on a hill between four mountains above the town, with a treasure found on the spot (Acta SS. August, t. ii. p. 350).

b. To St. Laurence and St. Germain at Clermont, built by Eoricius, king of the Goths, where St. Gall was buried (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii.).

c. A monastery in Paris in the time of Clotaire, of which St. Domnolus was abbat before he was bishop of Le Mans. It is now a parish in the faubourgs (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 9, 25).

d. On Mont Lois, near Tours, built by Perpetuus, sixth bishop of that city (ibid. x. 6).

VIII. In Africa.—Relics of Laurence were deposited under an altar at Setif, in Africa, in A.D. 452 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 220).

(2) An earlier martyr named Laurentius is mentioned by Cyprian (Ep. 34), commending Celerinus: "His grandmother, Celerina, was long ago crowned with martyrdom; also his uncle on the father's side, Laurence, and on the mother's side Egnatius. Sacrifices for them, as ye remember, we offer as often as we celebrate in common the passions and anniversary days of the martyrs." Yet the Calendar of Carthage knows no other Laurence but the saint of Aug. 10. The little Roman martyrology celebrates him along with Celerinus on Feb. 3, but it appears by the Mart. Hieron. that this day properly belongs to Celerina, and that the African Laurence belongs to Sept. 24 or 28.

(3) Another is mentioned April 12. (Mart. Hieron.)

(4) Laurentinus and Pergentinus, boys, brothers, martyred at Arezzo under Decius, June 3. (Mart. Rom.) The Mart. Hieron. mentions Laurentius only.

(5) The martyrdom of Laurence and Hippolytus under Decius at Fossombrone (Forum Sempronianum), Feb. 2 (Mart. Hieron.) is very suspicious. St. Apronianus is commemorated the same day. The cathedral of Fossombrone is sacred to this St. Laurence. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 286.)

(6) The illuminator, bishop of Spoleto, Feb. 3. Seemingly an apocryphal personage. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 362.)

LAURENCE (7) On May 10, the Byzantine distich is,— συναλλαγή τις πρὸς Θεὸν Λαυρεντίῳ πόνους ἔδεμ λαβόντι τὴν πορρωπότην.

(Acta SS. May, ii. 389.)

(8) Presbyter of Novari, and ecclesiastical writer of the 4th century. Martyred, with the boys he taught, by the Arians on April 30. (Acta SS. April, iii. 763.)

(9) Archbishop of Milan, † July 19, A.D. 512.

(10) Bishop of Siponto in Apulia, † Feb. 7, A.D. 550. (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 57.)

(11) Archbishop of Canterbury. † Feb. 2, A.D. 619. Into Laurencekirk in Scotland no woman might enter. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 289.)

(12) Bishop of Naples, † July 19, A.D. 717.

LAURENTINUS. [LAURENCE (+).]

LAURIANUS, of Seville, killed July 4 (6th century). (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURINUS, martyr of Terni, April 14. (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURUS (1) and Florus, twins, sculptors, thrown into a well in Illyricum by Licinius. Their relics were revealed to Constantine, and brought by him to their native Byzantium, August 18. (Menology of Basil.)

(2) Of St. Malo, 7th century, † Sept. 30. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 692.) [E. B. B.]

LAUSTRANUS, died 640, commemorated Apr. 11 (Men. Scot.), as well as LASREN, Apr. 18. [E. B. B.]

LAUTO, bishop of Coutances, † Sept. 22, A.D. 568. [E. B. B.]

LAVABO. The description of the Eucharistic rite by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. v. 2, p. 325) begins with the deacon presenting water to the celebrant (τῷ ἱερεῖ), and the presbyters who encircle the altar, for the purpose of ablution. And this (Cyril continues) was not merely for the sake of personal cleanliness, it was a symbolic act, to which refer the words of David, "I will wash my hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to thine altar" (Ps. xxv. [E. V. xxvi.] 6.) It does not appear from this whether the verse was actually chanted during the ablution, though its appositeness is recognised. (Compare Dionys. Areop. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 3.) According to some MSS. of the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 330), the priest and deacon after vesting for the liturgy wash their hands in the prothesis, saying, "Νίψομαι ἐν ὕδατι," and the rest of the psalm. In the Roman rite, the washing of the hands occurs after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, and thus precedes the preface and the more solemn part of the office. After the censuring of the altar and the priest, while the deacon is censuring the other ministers, the priest washes his hands, saying, "Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas et circumdabo altare tuum, Domine," and the rest of the psalm. As Amalaricus of Metz († 837) does not mention this custom, it was probably introduced in the Roman office after he wrote his treatises de Ecclesiasticis Officiis and Eclogae de Officio Missae [C.]

LAVACRUM. [BAPTISM; FONT.]

LAVATORY [MONASTIC]. Monasticism has never been partial to frequent personal ablutions. On the contrary, it has from the first discouraged them, as a form of self-indulgence, and as inconsistent with bodily austerities. Probably this inherent antipathy to bathings and washings was in great measure a result of the reaction from the luxury and licentiousness of the Roman baths under the empire. Certainly the maxim which places cleanliness next to godliness has no place in the biographies of the saints and heroes of monasticism, even in climates where bathing would seem almost one of the necessities of life. Jerome warns ascetics against warm baths as morally enervating (Hieron. Ep. ad Rustic.); and in a letter to one of his female disciples denounces every sort of bathing for women (Id. Ep. ad Laet.). Augustine allows a bath* once a month only (Aug. Ep. 109). This aversion to bathing is one of the many indications of the tendency, which seems inseparable from monasticism, to the Manichean notion of matter being intrinsically evil.

The various monastic rules agree very closely in discouraging the use of baths. Even the tolerant rule of the great Benedict only permits them for those who are weak and delicate, forbidding them generally ("tardius concedatur") for the young and healthy (Bened. Reg. c. 36). Evidently he is speaking only of baths within the walls of a monastery; bathing in a river or lake, or in the sea, being of course out of the question (cf. Martene ad loc.). Hildemar interprets the expression "tardius" to mean only before the three great festivals—Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide. Other commentators restrict the phrase to Christmas and Easter only; others take it as a permission for the monks to bathe after doing any very dirty work, &c. (Martene ad loc.) Similarly, Isidorus Hispalensis orders baths to be used very sparingly, only as a remedy, never for gratification (Isidor. Reg. c. 20). The rule of Caesarius of Arles permits them only in cases where the doctor prescribes them, and without any regard to the inclination of the patient (Caesar. Reg. c. 39). The rule ascribed to Augustine is to the same effect (Reg. Aug. c. 29), and adds that no monk is to go alone to the baths, nor to choose his companions, but that two or three of the brethren are to be told off by the prior for this purpose. In the same way the council of Aachen in A.D. 817 enacts that the control and regulation of the baths is to belong to the prior (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 7). An anonymous rule, which has been ascribed to Columbanus, called Regula Cujusdam, orders delinquent monks, as a penance, to make the necessary preparations for the washing of their brethren's heads on Saturdays, and for their baths just before the great festivals, especially Christmas (Reg. Cuj. c. 12; cf. Columban. Poenitent.; ap. Ménard, Comment. ad loc.). Radegundis is said to have built baths for the use of the nuns in the convent (of Ste. Croix) which she founded at Poitiers; before long some irregularities occurred, which the abbess was accused of conniving at, in regard to the use of these baths (Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 16). See further Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiæ Ritibus. [I. G. S.]

LAW.

SYLLABUS.

- I. "Law" and "Law of Nature," and early Christian authorities upon.
- II. Positive Law of the State. Attitude of the earlier Christians to.
Law of the State as directly affecting the Christian Church before Constantine, and legislation of Constantine.
Legislation between time of Constantine and of Justinian.

Legislation of the Barbarian, Frank, and English kings.
Legislation of Charlemagne.
- III. Internal legislation of the Church.

The word Law has this in common with the Latin jus, the French droit, and the German recht, that it is at once abstract and concrete. It means both the idea of rules of conduct proceeding from a competent authority and also the rules themselves. The word and the various meanings conveyed by it have been submitted to searching criticism of late years in this country, especially by Bentham and writers more or less distinctly influenced by him. The only part of the controversies thus originating which is relevant here is that which relates to the use of the word law, in such expressions as "Law of Nature," "Natural Law," "Law of God," "Moral Law." It is not very satisfactory nor historically true to conclude, with Mr. Austin (Lectures on Jurisprudence), that the original use of the term Law is a political one, and that the ethical and theological uses are wholly metaphorical and derived. Sir H. S. Maine's review of the history of the expression "Law of Nature" (Ancient Law, chap. iv.), rather supports the doctrine that the expression was borrowed from quite another region than the political one, and that it was in the task of correcting and amending this one that it found its most worthy uses. There is no doubt that Hooker's opposition of "humane law," "that which men probably gathering it to be expedient they make it a law," to that other law which, "as it is laid up in the bosom of God, they call eternal, receiveth according to the different kinds of things which are subject unto it different and sundry kinds of names," certainly expresses a logical distribution of law as old as the Christian Church itself, and somewhat older. The constant references in Cicero's writings to the distribution of jus into natura and lex (see particularly De Leg. i. 15, 16, and Orat. partit. 37), are especially interesting from the attention which Lactantius (vi. 8) calls to them, in the celebrated passage in which, citing Cicero's panegyric on the "vera lex recta ratio naturæ congruens constans sempiterna," he speaks of "dei lex illa sancta illa coelestis quam Marcus Tullius in libro de Republicâ tertio poene divinâ voce depinxit." The expressions of St. Paul in reference to a law written in the hearts of the Gentiles (Rom. ii. 15) are quite in accordance with the doctrines of the leading Roman jurists a century after his time, when

* In his Confessions, where he describes his grief for the death of his mother, he speaks of bathing as recommended to him for his depression of spirits, and mentions an absurd derivation of the Greek word βαλανεῖον as meaning a relief to anxiety.

Roman law was at its climax; as for instance appears from the language of Paulus (47 Dig. iii. 1, § 3) about theft, "quod lege naturali prohibitum est admittere." The early Christian writers constantly allude to the law of nature, and often base elaborate arguments either on its existence or on its precepts. Thus Origen (c. Celsum, viii. 52) speaking of the persuasion he had of the salvation of the heathen whose lives had been good, and recalling noble practical maxims laid down even by the enemies of the faith, says, "you will find no men in whom the common notions of what is good and bad, just and unjust, have been wholly blotted out." So, again, Tertullian (adv. Jud. cap. v.) says he contended that "before the law of Moses was written on tables of stone, there was an unwritten law which was naturally understood and held in trust by the patriarchs." St. Ambrose (Epist. ad Rom. cap. v.) divides the "natural law" into three parts, one concerned with shewing honour to the Creator, another with leading a good life, and a third with making known God and the right way of life to others. St. Jerome (Epist. ad Galat. chap. iii.) says that by this "legem naturalem" Cain acknowledged his offence, and Pharaoh, before the law was given by Moses, confessed his misdeeds. St. Chrysostom builds an elaborate argument on the existence and import of a law of nature (Homil. xii. ad Pop. Ant.), and says that "at the beginning God made the knowledge of good and evil self-taught; for we stand in no need of learning that indulgence is evil and self-restraint good, but we know it from the first;" and "when He said 'thou shalt do no murder,' He did not add, 'for murder is doing wrong;' but He simply said, 'thou shalt do no murder,' thereby merely forbidding what was sinful without teaching why it was so." The general subject of the attitude of the earlier writers, Christian, Jewish, and Heathen, towards the law of nature, will be found discussed in such works as Selden, 'De Jure Naturae et Gentium secundum disciplinam Hebraeorum,' Pufendorf, 'Jus Gentium et Naturae,' and the Prolegomena to Grotius, 'De Jure Belli et Pacis.' From the above extracts it will sufficiently appear from what sources a knowledge of the law of nature was to be extracted, and what was the import of the assertion of the later canonists that no dispensation from it was obtainable.

As contrasted with the "Law of Nature," what is sometimes called "Positive Law" may be considered under three heads:—I. Such part of the general laws of the state as happened to affect Christians because of conflicts of allegiance to which it casually gave rise. II. Such special laws of the state as were enacted in different countries and at successive epochs for the purpose of regulating the Christian society, and determining the organisation of the Church; and III. Such internal regulations as were made by the church itself, either in pursuance of what it held to be an inherent legislative authority, or in the character of a subordinate legislature, exercising permissive powers in dependence on the state.

I. The attitude of Christians towards the general law of the state in the territory of which they found themselves, was broadly defined for them at the very opening of Christian history, in the words so much quoted in after times, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's," and in the part of the twelfth chapter of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, in which the Apostle discusses the relation of the members of the Church to the "powers that be." It would seem that during the whole of the first century no questions of seriously conflicting allegiance presented themselves, the only aspect in which the early church found itself in opposition to the laws of the empire being that it was not formally incorporated among the recognised cults, that is, it was not, like Judaism, a "religio licita." Nevertheless Tertullian intimates that it had slipped in as such, and that Tiberius had even proposed, on receiving the report of Pontius Pilate, to give Christ a place among the gods (Apol. c. 5, and 26). Pliny's letter to Trajan (about A.D. 111) describes the Christians in Bithynia as a law-abiding people, "bound together by no unlawful sacrament, but only under mutual obligations not to commit theft, robbery, adultery, or fraud." It was, however, when he submitted them to the test of adoration before the statues of the gods and of the emperors, and the malediction of Christ, that they were recalcitrant. The amount of subservience to customs bearing the semblance of idolatry which was justifiable in a Christian became the subject of serious perplexity between the period at which the Christians had grown to be numerous and important enough to attract public attention, and that at which the church secured its political victory over paganism. The difficulty was encountered at two points; one, where, owing to general suspicion on other grounds, a Christian was subjected to the test of sacrificing or doing an overt act of worship to the emperor; the other, where the common functions of a civil or military life involved what seemed to be idolatrous usages. It is a matter of some doubt how far the Christians of the 2nd and 3rd centuries consented to serve in the imperial armies, though the expressions of Christian writers, and the arguments of Tertullian with respect to the extent to which Christians might go in receiving military rewards, leave no doubt as to the prevalent opinion that service was not sinful in itself, nor as to the actual practice (Tertull. de Coronâ Milit. cap. xi.; see Milman's History, bk. ii. cap. vii. and Neander). Some of the Christian writers bestow great pains in solving fine casuistical problems as to how far conformity might go. Thus Tertullian (de Idololatriâ, cap. xvii.) thinks a Christian might walk simply in a procession but must not sacrifice, nor give the word for another to sacrifice, nor place the victims, nor bind their temples, nor pronounce any solemn words, nor make any adjuration. Then, again, he discusses the question as to what slaves and faithful freemen should do when their masters or patrons are officially engaged in sacrificing. He intimates, in another place (Apol. c. 34), that it might be allowable to call the emperor lord but not god.

With respect to the general duty of obeying the law of the state, the Christian writers are unanimous in upholding it. Indeed they habitually base their defence against imputations from without on their loyalty. Thus Justin Martyr

(Apol. i. 17) says that "wherever we are we pay the taxes and tribute imposed by you, as we were instructed to do by Him," and "while we worship God alone in all other matters, we cheerfully submit ourselves to you, confessing you to be the kings and rulers of men." Irenaeus (v. 24), speaking even more strongly, and alluding to the perpetual "calumny of the devil" to the contrary, says, "we ought to obey powers and earthly authorities, inasmuch as they are constituted not by the devil but God;" and "that kings are the ministers of God, and are put in authority by the command of that same One to whose command men owe their very existence." Tertullian (Apol. c. 42) presents a vivid picture of the complete implication of the life of the Christians with that of the pagans, in a passage which leaves no doubt that it was the persuasion of the church that conformity was a general duty, and nonconformity only a particular exception from it. "Itaque non sine foro non sine macello non sine balneis tabernis officiis tabulis nundinis vestris coeterisque commercii cohabitamus in hoc saeculo: navigamus et nos vobiscum et militamus et rusticamur et mercamur; proinde miscemus artes, opera nostra publicamus usui vestro."

Later Christian history, however, brought forward a wholly new class of problems arising out of the active interference of the secular government with the internal affairs of the church. This led to the question being mooted which has never been theoretically answered as to how far the church and its members are morally entitled to resist a law which indirectly affects, as they think perniciously, the interests of the church. The letter of Gregory the Great, addressed to the emperor Maurice (A.D. 582-602), who had interdicted all persons occupying civil functions from becoming clerks or entering a monastery, may be cited in order to shew what was probably a characteristic mode of solving such problems after the time that the church became an authority competing with the state. "As for me, submitting to thy order, I have sent this law to the various countries of the earth, and I have said to my serene lords in this paper whereon I have deposited my reflections, that this law goes against that of the all-powerful God. I have therefore fulfilled my duty upon each side; I have rendered obedience to Caesar, and I have not been silent as to what appeared to me to be against God." (Greg. M. Epist. lii. p. 65.)

II. The laws of the state specially affecting the Christian Church may affect it as a corporate society, or assemblage of corporate societies; or may affect its officers individually; or its members individually. And among the laws that affect the members of the church individually will properly be included all those which confer privileges or impose disabilities on any persons whatever on the ground of their not being members of the church. Thus the general purposes of the laws directly affecting the church may be arranged as those of (1) conferring privileges, or imposing disabilities on members of the church as such, or upon other persons not being such, as, e.g., Jews, pagans, heretics, and apostates; (2) prescribing and controlling the organisation of the church, personal and material; and, with this view conferring privileges or imposing disabilities on church officials of all classes; (3) regulating the property of the church, of its officers, and of its members; (4) determining questions of disputable jurisdiction in respect of ecclesiastical, civil, and criminal suits and offences; and (5) giving effect to the internal legislation of the church itself. It might be expected that at some periods of church history some of the classes of laws owing their origin to these different purposes would be found to be more prominent than the rest, and at other periods other classes of laws. Indeed, it is the case that for long periods together some of these classes of laws often seem to be wholly absent, either through the inactivity of the state, or from there being no materials recognisable by the state on which law could operate. For instance, in early days the whole of the civil law as affecting the church would be gathered up in the disabilities and penalties inflicted on its individual members. But between the time of Pliny's letter and the persecution at the beginning of the 4th century, under Galerius and Diocletian, the organisation of the church was becoming recognised, if not formally protected, and even the property of the church secured to it by law.

Thus it seems that about the time of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222), "Christian bishops were admitted at court in a recognised official character, and Christian churches began to rise in different parts of the empire, and to possess endowments in land" (Milman, ii. 231). "The Christians" (says Gibbon, writing of this period, c. xvi.) "were permitted to erect and consecrate convenient edifices for the purpose of religious worship; to purchase lands, even at Rome itself, for the use of the community; and to conduct the elections of their ecclesiastical ministers in so public, but at the same time in so exemplary, a manner, as to deserve the respectful attention of the Gentiles." But the history of a few years later shews upon what a frail foundation these privileges rested; and it was not till after Constantine's victory over Maxentius in A.D. 312 that the legal rights and duties of the Christian church, its officers, and its members, began to be ascertained with a constantly advancing precision. It is not necessary to distinguish here the successive steps by which Constantine first supported by his legislation paganism and Christianity impartially; then co-operated with the organisation of the church; and finally (as in his dealings with Arius) overbore that organisation by the weight of his personal authority. There are scarcely enough materials in existence to decide the question as to how far, at any time, Constantine went in suppressing the use of pagan rites by the general law. After reviewing all the authorities and the passages in Eusebius directly bearing on the point, Dean Milman is of opinion that Constantine only abolished two kinds of sacrifices, that is, private sacrifices connected with unlawful acts of theurgy or of magic; and the state sacrifices heretofore offered by the emperor himself, or by others in his name. The passage in the Theodosian Code (Cod. Th. xvi. 10, 2), from a law of Constans in which he cites an edict of his father, is distinctly in favour of an universal prohibition. "Cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum aboleatur insania. Nam quicumque contra legem divi Principis parentis nostri et hanc nostrae mansuetudinis jussuonem census fuerit sacrificia celebrare competens in eum vindicta et praesens sententia exseratur." We have in the Theodosian Code very clear indications of the legal measures by which Constantine (1) fenced round the Christian community, by inflicting disabilities on those outside, as in the law (Cod. Th. v. 1) to the effect that all privileges given in respect of religion attached only to "Catholicae legis observatoribus; haereticos autem atque schismaticos non tantum ab his privilegiis alienos esse sed etiam diversis muneribus constringi et subici;" (2) recognised the organisation of the church by allowing slaves to be manumitted "in gremio Ecclesiae," provided it was done "sub aspectu antistitum" (Cod. Th. iv. 71), and supported its institutions by allowing no other business than emancipations and manumissions to be performed on Sunday (Cod. Th. iii. 12, 1, 2, 3). Constantine also exempted the clergy from the burdensome liability to serve on town councils (Cod. Th. xvi. 2; 1, 2, 3). A provision was, however, introduced which throws light on the notion of ordination prevailing at the time, to the effect that if any one should, subsequently to the making of the law, become ordained solely in order to evade his civil obligations, he must be restored to his civil character (restitui et civilibus obsequiis inservire). The whole of this law may be instructively contrasted with the legislation of Justinian (Cod. i. 4, 26), by which he specially provides for bishops becoming an essentially constituent part of provincial town councils.

In the two hundred years which intervened between the time of Constantine and that of Justinian, legislation directly affecting the Christian church made rapid progress in all its departments. It was in the joint reign of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 380) that the formal law was passed which figures in the codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian, by which Christianity was constituted the exclusive religion of the Roman empire, both in the East and in the West. "We command all who read this law to embrace the name of Catholic Christians, deciding that all other idiots and madmen should bear the infamy attaching to their heretical opinions, and as they will first meet with the penalty of divine vengeance, so they will afterwards receive that condemnation at our hands which the Heavenly Judge has empowered us to administer." (Cod. Jus. I. i. 1.)

From this period laws begin to appear for determining questions of disputable jurisdiction, such as the law of Arcadius and Honorius A.D. 399 (Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 1), giving the bishops exclusive jurisdiction in "religious" matters, but in these only: "quotiens de religione agetur episcopos convenit judicare: coeteras vero causas quae ad ordinarios cognitores vel ad usum publici foris pertinent legibus oportet audiri." At the very end of the Theodosian Code appears what is called an "extravagant" law of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, "de episcopali judicio," prescribing that bishops be not occupied in trying ordinary matters, but whenever a matter presented itself relating to Christian authority (quae pertineat ad Christianam facultatem), it should be decided by the highest priestly functionary in the district (see AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS, I. 152). The special penalties imposed on immoral clergy belong also to the part of the law which regulates and supports the organisation of the church. Such were those imposed by the law of Valens and Valentinian (A.D. 370, Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 20) on ecclesiastics, or "ex ecclesiasticis vel qui continentium se volent nomine nuncupari viduarum ac pupillarum domos adeant;" they were "publicis exterminari judiciis," and were held incapable to take any benefit under a will of a woman to whom they had attached themselves under pretext of religion. The practice of requiring such laws as directly affect the church to be publicly read in the church, is an interesting token of the public recognition of these Christian buildings. The law just cited is said to have been read in the churches, "lecta in ecclesiis;" and Theodosius the younger had his law against the Nestorians, and Constantine his letter to the church of Alexandria, in absolution of Athanasius, read in the churches; and the practice was in use under the Visigoths at the close of the laws of which people we read, "Suprascriptas leges omnes lectas in ecclesiâ S. Mariae Toleti sub die xi. Kalend. Feb."

The laws affecting the Christians which were enacted between the time of Constantine and the publication of the Theodosian Code in A.D. 433, are mostly contained in the 16th book of that code, the code itself having been promulgated in the same year, both in the Eastern and Western empires. The next important legislative events occurred in the middle of the sixth century, in the reign of Justinian. The product of Justinian's legislative exertions in respect of the church appears in the first book of his code (the revised edition of which—the only one which has come down to us,—was published in A.D. 534), and his Novells which cover a period of legislation extending from A.D. 535 to A.D. 565. The first book of the code also contains the laws which had been passed by successive emperors since the publication of the Theodosian Code. Of this intermediate period between A.D. 438 and A.D. 534, there appear in Justinian's Code (Book 2) several important laws regulating the rights and liabilities of the clergy, confirming the claims of the church to have property transferred to it in life and on death (Cod. i. 2, 14), directing the clergy as to the administration of property left by will for the redemption of captives, and for the use of the poor (i. 3, 28), and determining the rights, duties, and general functions of those betaking themselves to a conventual and monastic life. The right of sanctuary as available in all parts of the empire is explicitly vindicated and defined by a law of Leo I. in A.D. 466. (Cod. i. 12, 6.)

The comprehensive legislation of Justinian, especially that which took place between A.D. 535 and A.D. 565, and is recorded in his Novells, extends to all the branches of law in which, according to the above classification, it is possible for the civil law directly to affect the Christian community. It will be convenient to review the general character of the laws passed in Justinian's reign in conformity with that classification.

(1.) Of laws conferring privileges or imposing disabilities on individual members of the church, or on other persons because they are not such members, the fifty-second constitution

(Novell. Auth.) is an instance, the effect of which was to exclude Jews, Samaritans, Montanists, and other heretics (aliter respuendos homines quos nondum hæcenus recta et immaculata fides illucet sed et in tenebris sedent animis vera non sentientes sacramenta) from the beneficial exemptions enjoyed by the orthodox in respect of service on town councils, and to allow their testimony in courts of law only in cases in which the interest of an orthodox suitor, or that of the state seemed to call for it. Another instance is supplied by the limitation of the newly conceded rights of intestate succession in accordance with natural, instead of the older civil relationship to those who belonged to the "Catholic Faith." (Nov. Authen. 114.) Yet a further instance is the law forbidding marriages between god-parent and god-child (Cod. v. 4, 26) on the ground that "nothing else could so surely introduce an affectionate paternal relationship, and thereby justly forbid marriage, as a tie of this sort by which souls are bound together through the mediation of God."

(2.) With laws regulating and protecting the organisation of the church Justinian's legislation is replete, and the 134th Novell is a small code in itself. Bishops and monks were absolutely forbidden to act as guardians, and priests and deacons were allowed to act only on their formal request, and they were all forbidden to undertake any civil function. The bishops were forbidden to move from place to place without the permission of the metropolitan or the emperor. The bishops, patriarchs, and archbishops in each province were to assemble once or twice a year, and to examine into all causes and offences. By the 59th Novell it is forbidden to introduce the "sacred mysteries" into private houses, unless certain of the clergy were especially invited with the approval of the bishop. The limitation of the number of the clergy, and of the expenses attending on ordination, were carefully provided for (Nov. Auth. 3, 5, 16).

(3.) Of laws regulating the property of the church the seventh constitution is an important specimen. It lays down the general principle that no church or church officer is entitled to part with, by gift, sale, exchange, or perpetual lease, any immovable property of the church, or the sacred vessels of the church, save only (in this last case) for the redemption of prisoners, the right of the Government to force a sale at a fair price being reserved. A later law (Nov. Auth. 43) permits the alienation of immovables in the case of inability to pay state dues, and if the income of the immovables does not suffice; and a still later law (Nov. Auth. 67) provides that lands and other immovables left to the church by will for the redemption of captives, or for the support of the poor, may be sold for the purpose should it appear that no certain income from the property can be relied upon otherwise [ALIENATION, I. 50]. To the same class of topics belong the legal restrictions upon building churches, monasteries, and houses of prayer without first making a preliminary grant of the property to provide for the services (Nov. Auth. 69, 2).

(4.) Laws regulating jurisdiction, of course, became increasingly precise at this period, and the final Novell, already cited, contains numerous provisions on the subject. By the 80th Novell, persons having any cause of action against monks, ascetics, or nuns, must bring the case before the bishop; by the 129th Novell, the bishop might, in case a judge deferred giving sentence, either press the judge to proceed or himself investigate the case afresh, pronounce sentence, and report the neglect to the emperor. Provision was also made for parties trying their case before a friendly tribunal composed of the judge and the bishop, so as to avoid the necessity of referring the case to the tribunal at the capital. Bishops administering justice with partiality were to be punished. In the 134th Novell important provisions are contained, by which all causes of complaint against a member of the clerical body are to be laid, in the first instance, before the bishop, and the sentence, if accepted by both parties within ten days, is to be carried out by the civil judge; if the sentence is not accepted the civil judge is to examine the case afresh, and if he differs from the bishop an appeal is allowed (see APPEAL, I. 126). In criminal cases, if the bishop condemns, the convicted clerk is first to be shorn of his "honour and grade" according to ecclesiastical rules, and is then tried by the civil judge. If the civil judge is approached first, and the prisoner is found to be a clerk, the case must go before the bishop, who, if he finds the clerk guilty, is to deprive him of his office and hand him back for sentence to the civil judge. If the bishop does not find him guilty he is to defer the deprivation, while security is taken and the case referred to the emperor for his decision.

(5.) As to laws enforcing the internal legislation of the church, the 120th Novell is important, the first chapter of it solemnly giving the force of law to the sacred ecclesiastical rules expounded or established by the four Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. Subsequently to the time of Justinian, the Iconoclastic controversy in the East (commencing A.D. 726) is interesting, in reference to the present subject as exhibiting the firm legislative control that the Eastern emperors either retained or assumed to themselves over the ritual of the church. The conquests of Justinian in Italy led to his complete body of laws being applied en masse to the subjects of his re-conquered provinces, for whose use the Novells, or such of them as originally appeared in the Greek language, were translated into Latin. But before the victories of Justinian in Italy the Theodosian Code had already been introduced in an almost complete shape into the code of the Visigoths issued in A.D. 506 by Alaric II. He was succeeded by Theodoric, his father-in-law, who united thereby the kingdoms of the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths. In this way it appears that in the early part of the sixth century the laws affecting the church, as they were embodied in the Theodosian Code and in the code and Novells of Justinian, were introduced into Italy almost simultaneously from the East and the West; and it may be conjectured that, in this way, the legislation of Justinian, as well as of his predecessors, became the basis of the legislation of the barbarian kings. There is reason, however, to suppose that the barbarian kings were less disposed to interfere with the internal order of the church than the Eastern emperors. They were mostly Arians, they were not gifted with the theological subtlety which seems to have distinguished some of the rulers in the East, and some of the most eminent of them are conspicuous either for toleration or for religious indifference (see Guizot's Civilisation in France, Lect. xii.). In an edict of Clothaire II. (A.D. 615) we have a distinct recognition of the principle that the clergy are, in the first instance, to be tried by an ecclesiastical and not by a civil court; and, for the case of suits between the clergy and other persons, a court is established composed of chiefs of the church sitting together with the ordinary secular judge. The law of the Riparian Franks (Lex Rip. xxxi. § 3, lviii. § 1) provides for the clergy being tried by the Roman law. The Salic law, in its oldest form, bears few marks of ecclesiastical legislation, and is almost exclusively occupied with defining the pecuniary penalties for civil and criminal offences. In its reformed shape it wears the impress of the mature ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne.

The laws of the Saxon kings in various English kingdoms afford instruction as to contemporaneous legislation in all the German kingdoms under the influence of the Roman church. The code of Ethelbert, who seems to have begun to reign about A.D. 561, contains a number of precise regulations on general matters, of which only the first touches the church, robbery from which is to be punished by a fine of twelve times the value stolen; robbery from the bishop, by a fine of eleven times the value; from a priest, or nine times; a deacon, of six times; and so on. In the code of Wihtraed, who seems to have begun to reign in A.D. 691, there is a fair amount of ecclesiastical legislation, including the principle that the church shall enjoy immunity from taxes, and sundry minute rules in respect of compensation for offences by and against the clergy. The celebrated laws of Ina, who came to the throne about A.D. 688, mark a distinct stage in social and political advance. While dealing largely with the common criminal offences, against which the previous codes were mainly directed, they also contain numerous specific laws directly affecting the church; as that, "the ministers of God shall observe their own proper laws"; that "children shall be brought to be baptized within thirty days, under a penalty of thirty solidi"; that "a slave doing work at his master's bidding on the Lord's day shall thereby become free"; and that "the right of sanctuary availed to save the life of a criminal, but he must make compensation" (Wilkins's Leges Anglo-Saxonicae Ecclesiasticae et Civiles). Some curious instances of the active co-operation of the church and the state in respect of punishing the offences of the clergy against the ordinary civil and criminal law in the earlier part of the seventh century in Britain appear in some very early works cited by Mr. Haddan and Professor Stubbs (Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 1869). The Liber Landavensis (a compilation of the twelfth century) records the excommunication by Oudaeus, bishop of Llandaff, at the beginning of the seventh century, of Mensig and of Morgan, kings of Glamorgan, for murder, after swearing amity upon relics in the bishop's presence, in each case lands being given to the see of Llandaff by the culprit when reconciled. The same work records similar proceedings in the case of a fratricide committed by Gwoednerth, king of Gwent; and in other cases Eddius, in his life of Wilfrid (A.D. 709), mention that the holy bishop, Wilfrid, on one occasion, standing before the altar, and turning to the people, "enumerated before the kings the lands which previous kings had granted and the sacred sites which the British clergy had deserted in flying before the enemy." This seems to imply a re-endowment by the Saxon kings with lands previously held by the British church.

The legislation of Charlemagne, which continued through his entire reign, that is, from A.D. 768 to A.D. 814, and which was reproduced over and over again in closely resembling forms in the different countries successively reduced under his rule, recalls that of Justinian by its comprehensiveness and its particularity. Nevertheless, the capitularies of Charlemagne not only mark the progress which the church had made during the past 200 years in internal organisation, but they also seem to bespeak the spontaneous energy of the church in legislating for itself, rather than the mere weight of imperial authority, to which so many of the earlier laws were due. Much of Charlemagne's legislation in respect of the church is identical with that of Justinian, and with that of the earlier Saxon codes, and this affords evidence that legislation of this sort was largely controlled by ecclesiastical usage and tradition, and by the direct influence exercised by the authorities of the church on the civil lawgiver.

It will be convenient to exemplify Charlemagne's legislation by reference to such of the main department of possible legislation in reference to the church as were above distinguished for the purpose of convenient arrangement, and are alone prominent at this date. They concern (1) the organisation and ritual of the church, (2) the property of the church, of its officials, and of its members, and (3) jurisdiction.

(1.) In respect of the organisation and ritual of the church, the laws of Charlemagne are extremely numerous and precise. Thus (Cap. A.D. 769) priests are to be subject to their bishops, and to give an exact account on the first day of Lent of their ministry, and of the rites they have performed; and to entertain the bishop on his visitations. No priest is to undertake the care of a church without the bishop's assent, nor to pass from one church to another. Priests are not to celebrate mass except in places dedicated to God, or, if upon a journey, in a tent and at a table consecrated by the bishop. The bishops and clergy were specially interdicted from engaging in battle or accompanying the armies, excepting a few bishops with their attending priests selected to perform sacred duties; also from hunting with dogs and keeping hawks and falcons. Every bishop was to visit his diocese (parochia) once a year, and put a stop to pagan rites and ceremonies (auguria, phylacteria, incantationes vel omnes spurcitas gentilium). Bishops were to have due authority over priests and other clerics within their diocese (Cap. A.D. 779), and to be themselves subject to the metropolitans. A bishop was not to receive a cleric attached to another diocese, nor to ordain him to a higher function. The faith and good life of candidates for ordination was to be investigated by the bishop, and fugitive clerics and strangers were not to be received or ordained without "literae commendaticiae" and the licence of their own bishop (Cap. A.D. 789). Bishops were precisely directed as to the subjects of their preaching, such as belief in the doctrines of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, and of the Resurrection, sins for which eternal punishment was due, love of God and one's neighbour, faith, hope, humility, patience, alms, confession, and the like. A number of general directions were given to the clergy as to conduct, such as in respect of swearing in the course of conversation (sed simpliciter cum puritate et veritate omnia decet), entering taverns, getting drunk, or making others so, and preaching the gospel to the people on festal and the Lord's days. Precise regulations are given as to the observance of the Lord's day. No servile work was to be done, or journeys undertaken, except for purposes of warfare, fetching food, and burying the dead. Everyone was to attend church, and the celebration of the mass, and praise God for all the good things He had done on that day. Official public meetings and the public administration of justice were not to take place on that day, except in circumstances of urgent necessity (Cap. A.D. 789, de partibus Saxoniae). The bodies of Christian Saxons were to be buried in the cemeteries of the church, and not in the "tumuli" of the pagans. Children were to be baptized within a year, or a fine was imposed on the person responsible for the neglect. The right of sanctuary was defined very much in the same language as in earlier laws. Homicides and other persons accused of committing crimes punishable with death would not be excused by taking refuge in a church, and no food must be given them there (Cap. A.D. 779). By a later capitulary of A.D. 789 none were to be violently expelled from a sanctuary, but they were to remain till a formal judicial inquiry could take place (dum placitum praesentetur); see also Cap. A.D. 803, 3. Breaking into a church was an offence punishable with death. A synod was to meet twice a year (Cap. A.D. 806). A province was never to be divided between two metropolitans. Lastly (Cap. A.D. 803), reading in church was to be distinct (lectiones in ecclesia distincte legantur).

(2.) As to the property of the church, a considerable part of Charlemagne's laws is concerned with regulating the right to tithes. The general principle of paying tithes is laid down in the capitulary of A.D. 789 ("De partibus Saxoniae"), that every one, noble as well as free born, should give the tenth part of his substance and his labour to the church and the priests." The principle is affirmed over and over again, and applied in detail to various kinds of property. The history of this part of Charlemagne's legislation is passed succinctly in review by Professor Brewer in an Appendix to his Endowment and Establishment of the Church of England, Part I., to which it is sufficient for the present purpose to refer. Bishops and abbats were cautioned as to bestowing a diligent custody on the treasures of the churches, lest by treachery or negligence any gems, vases, or other treasures be lost (Cap. A.D. 806, 3). It was specially provided (Cap. A.D. 804, 3) that if any one wishes to build a church on his own property, he must first have the bishop's assent and licence, and that the ancient tithes payable to the older churches must not be diverted to the new one.

(3.) With respect to jurisdiction, no judge was to punish a priest, deacon, or cleric, "without the consenting knowledge of the pontifex," under pain of separation from the church till he confesses and amends. Bishops were to administer justice to the clergy in their dioceses; and if an "abbat, priest, deacon, sub-deacon, does not obey the bishop, the metropolitan must interpose, and if he cannot settle the matter, the parties must come to the king "cum literis metropolitani" (Cap. A.D. 794). Priests accused of crimes were to be tried at a synod in accordance with a capitulary of pope Innocent's; if they were convicted, they were to be removed from the sacerdotal office. By Cap. A.D. 812, if bishops and abbats could not settle their disputes they must come before the king himself. All other officials were warned against presuming to try such high matters without special authorisation from the king. The decrees of the councils of Nicaea, Chalcedon, Antioch, and Sardica were incorporated in the legislation. From the preface to some of the capitularies, it seems that the laws were in fact passed as much by the authority of the church as by that of the state. Thus the capitulary of A.D. 779 opens "Anno feliciter undecimo, &c. qualiter congregatis in unum synodali concilio facto capitulare episcopis abbatibus virisque illustribus comitibus una cum Domino nostro se, &c." [See CAPITULARY.]

III. The laws made by the church itself, whether in pursuance of an inherent legislative faculty it holds itself to possess, or as a subordinate legislature dependent on the state, must be considered under the heads of (1) the modes by which the law has at different periods been made, and (2) the modes by which it has been enforced. (1.) It will have been seen from the preceding review to what an extent at different periods and from opposite causes, such as the complete preponderance of the state over the church at one period and the intimate implication of the state with the church at another, the same authority which enacted laws for the state also prescribed the most minute regulations for the internal order of the church, and often at the same moment and in the same document. So true is this, that in the case of some of the capitularies of Charlemagne, and of the legislative acts of the early Saxon kings in England, it is hard to say whether the law-making authority was a church synod or the king surrounded by his ordinary councillors, the bishops, abbats, and chief secular officials in the kingdom. Nevertheless, the church claimed from the earliest times the right of independent legislation, though the limits of this right became soon contested in practice through the interposition of the Eastern emperors, and in theory also as soon as the church of Rome assumed for itself the claim of being the chief, or even the exclusive organ of church legislation (see COUNCIL, I. 473; CANON LAW, I. 265; DECRETAL, I. 539), and thereby precipitated the inevitable controversy with the secular authority in different countries.

(2.) The modes by which the church has been enabled, or has attempted, to make her laws effective by applying suitable penalties for their infraction have always been in fact largely subject to the explicit or implicit control of the state, and the more so as the church and the state became co-extensive. Nevertheless, the church has also succeeded in herself punishing her own members and officers for breaches of her laws, and, in the times of her greatest strength, has done so even when the offender, as in the case of Theodosius the Great, was a crowned head. Apart from excommunication, partial or total, temporary or permanent, and public reproof or degradation of office, the most common forms that ecclesiastical penalties gradually took was the enforcement of some painful austerity or discipline [PENITENCE], subsequently commuted for, or admitting of, a regular substitute in a fine. [FINES, I. 671.] It is well-known by what gradual but certain steps this notion of accepting pecuniary compensation for some of the lighter offences gradually led to the principle of admitting for all but a very few "mortal" sins a like satisfaction; and then to the whole system of INDULGENCES [I. 834] by which ecclesiastical penalties were mitigated. An examination of the older Salic law and the Riparian law, already alluded to, will go far to explain how the notion of pecuniary compensation for sins so easily took root in the Western church. It was, in fact, the common form of all the civic legislation in the German kingdoms which was not directly borrowed from Rome. It has, however, been observed that Tertullian's education as a lawyer led him in his treatise De Poenitentia (c. 19), to regard the ecclesiastical fine exacted for "homicidium, idololatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia et fornicatio," rather as a "satisfactio" or temporary security for future good conduct than as a penalty for past transgressions. Probably both ideas coalesced in the late church law relative to penance.

The question naturally suggests itself how far, before the death of Charlemagne, the church was in a position to rely upon the co-operation of the state in enforcing her own laws and the procedure of her own courts; for instance, by imparting to a sentence of deprivation its appropriate civil consequences. The truth was that, from the times of the earlier Christian emperors, the jurisdiction of the bishops, in respect of certain matters and persons, was placed upon exactly the same level as the jurisdiction of a civil court (see especially the law of Honorius and Theodosius II., A.D. 408, giving the force of a civil judgment to the sentence of a bishop on a voluntary reference to his arbitration—a law often imputed to Constantine,—and Justinian's 134th Novell already cited). Again, under the municipal government of the empire, in all the later stages of its history, the bishop was intimately concerned in civic administration of the most secular kind in all the chief towns and especially at Rome (see 1 Cod. Jus. iv., and Guizot's Civilisation in Europe, Lect. ii. and Gibbon in reference to Gregory I. chap. xlv.). Lastly, Charlemagne, in constituting his itinerant magistracies, combined in one commission a Comes and a bishop, "ut uterque pleniter suum ministerium peragere possint" (Cap. A.D. 803, chap. iv.). It thus resulted that all the machinery was constantly at hand for enforcing the judgment of the bishop in strictly ecclesiastical matters in the same way as the judgment of a secular court.

But, furthermore, it is to be borne in mind that the canons by which ecclesiastical penalties were imposed were, up to the death of Charlemagne, scarcely distinguishable from the ordinary laws of the empire. The legislative body was, as often as not, constituted in exactly the same way whether engaged in secular or religious legislation, and frequently discharged both classes of business at the same sitting. Both Justinian and Charlemagne expressly incorporated among the published laws of the realm the canons of four general councils (not the same ones); an incessant control and supervision is exercised by the civil ruler over the sitting of councils, and provision is made for the time being fairly distributed between secular and religious business. Thus king Sigibert, in addressing Desiderius, the bishop of Cahors (A.D. 650), directs that no "synodale concilium" be held in his kingdom without his knowledge. The seventeenth council of Toledo in A.D. 694 decreed that in the first three days of every such assembly ecclesiastical affairs should be debated, and then—but not till then—the affairs of the state; and Charlemagne (Cap. A.D. 811, chap. iv.) directs that the abbats, bishops, and counts are to be distributed into different chambers with a view to laymen not interfering with ecclesiastical affairs. Again, while it is probable enough that during the period here concerned excommunication was felt to be a heavier punishment than any ordinary punishment known to the secular laws, and therefore needed no supplement from these, there are signal instances on record of specific legislation for the purpose of moderating or increasing the effect of an ecclesiastical sentence. Thus, in A.D. 595, Childebert makes a decree against those who, on being excommunicated for murder, still continue obstinate. Pepin (Cap. A.D. 755) makes a similar decree: "Si aliquis ista omnia contemserit et episcopus emendare minime poterit regis iudicio exilio condemnatur;" and, lastly, Charlemagne, in redressing a curious abuse which followed from persons excommunicated for murder wandering about the country and presenting scandalous exhibitions of distress, decrees (A.D. 789) "nec isti nudi cum ferro sinantur vagari qui dicunt se data sibi poenitentia ire vagantes. Melius videtur ut si aliquid inusuetum et capitale crimen commiserint in loco permaneant laborantes et servientes et poenitentiam agentes secundum quod sibi canonice impositum est."

It may be said, generally, that up to the epoch at which the legal organisation of the church was distinct and complete enough to enable the pope to contend on equal terms with the emperor, either the necessities for secular aid in support of ecclesiastical discipline were too rare to attract general attention, or such general harmony of spirit and such a use of common judicial machinery prevailed, as to disguise the real character and amount of the secular interference, or the extreme ecclesiastical penalties were in practice more potent than any civil ones, and therefore stood in no need of support from these.

LAWSUITS. [LITIGATION.]

LAWYERS. The attitude of the church towards lawyers, as towards all persons holding anything like official positions, was, during the era of persecutions, that of suspicion and almost dislike. In some churches they could not be ordained; for we find in a letter of pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-417) (Ep. 23, ad Conc. Tolet. c. 2) that he complained of the custom existing in the Spanish church of admitting such to ordination, and proposed "that no one should be admitted to the clerical order who had pleaded causes after he was baptized." That this represents the practice of the Roman church there can be little doubt, nor that the rule was soon extended over the French and Spanish churches. And he orders that for the future such persons, if ordained, should be deposed, together with those who ordained them: "ut quicumque tales ordinati fuerint, cum ordinatoribus suis deponantur." We find the council of Sardica (A.D. 347) enacting in its thirteenth canon that a lawyer (σχολαστικός ἀπο τῆς ἀγορᾶς) might proceed through the grades of reader, deacon, and priest, even to the episcopate, if he were a suitable man. But as Du Pin observes (Cent. iv. p. 261), the Sardican canons were never received by the whole church, nor embodied in the collection authorised by the council of Chalcedon.

We find that such legal assistance as was required by a church or diocese was in the East often, perhaps usually, rendered by a clergyman. The record of the council of Ephesus shews us Asphalius, a presbyter of Antioch, managing the law business (τὰ πράγματα τῆς αὐτῆς ἐκκλησίας) of that church. Similarly John, who appears in the account of the Constantinopolitan council held under Flavian A.D. 448), and ecclesiastical history affords many other instances.

And in the course of another hundred years, this state of things had so far developed that it was necessary for Justinian to prohibit (Novell. cxliii. c. 6) the clergy from practising in the courts, or discharging the official function of bail or surety: "Sed neque procuratorem litis, aut fidejussorem pro talibus causis episcopum, aut alium clericum, cujuslibet gradus, aut monachum proprio nomine, aut ecclesiae, aut monasterii sinimus;" and the reason assigned is that they would be thereby hindered in their sacred ministry. In earlier times, the apostolic canons (can. 6) had briefly forbidden bishop, priest, or deacon, to undertake any secular cares, on pain of deposition. The Theodosian code has many provisions against the oppressions practised by those holding legal offices; excessive and illegal exactions, maintenance for themselves while on their circuits, and such like, which do not immediately concern us here.

The quotation given above from the Novellae of Justinian shews that a need was actually experienced by churches and religious houses for the aid of men learned in the law in the management of their property and the defence of suits at law. The need grew with the growth of ecclesiastical possessions; and a tendency shewed itself among the clergy and monasteries even in the West, to find the men required out of the members of their own body, in spite of the canonical prohibitions, which seem to have been in a great degree arbitrary from the first, or which at best rested on a tradition descending from the period of the persecutions. Pope Gelasius (492-496) admitted these officers to the minor orders: "Continuo Lector, aut Notarius, aut certe Defensor effectus, post tres menses existat Acolythus." The formula with which the defensores were admitted is curious: "Si nulli conditioni vel corpori teneris obnoxius, nec fuisti clericus alterius civitatis, aut in nullo canonum obviant statuta, officium Ecclesiae Defensorum accipias," &c. We may, perhaps, conclude from a letter of pope Gregory the Great (590-604) that the notaries of the church of Rome were usually subdeacons (lib. vii. Ep. 17).

But by the time we come to the latter part of the 7th century, we find that these legal offices were for the most part in the hands of laymen, at all events in Gaul. The second council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) had a canon forbidding lawyers to prosecute suits on the Lord's Day, under pain of being disbarred (can. 1). And we find among the Decreta of pope Eugenius II. (A.D. 824) one forbidding "advocati," evidently laymen, to usurp or seize by force any recompense beyond what they were entitled to by ancient right and custom. [S. J. E.]

LAY BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 80, I. 167; LAITY, § 3.]

LAY COMMUNION. Offences which in a layman were punished by ἀφορισμός, segregation or suspension of the right to communicate, were in the clergy punished by reduction to "lay communion." That is to say, they were reduced to the condition of laymen, deprived of office, and forbidden to exercise their clerical functions. When a clerk was said to be denied lay communion, it meant that he was excommunicated as well as deprived. As two erroneous opinions have been maintained respecting lay communion, one that it meant communion in one kind, the other that it was reception of the sacrament with the laity, i.e. without the bema or the chancel, it is desirable to illustrate the subject by an ample chain of testimony. The 15th Apostolical canon orders that any clergyman staying in another diocese against the will of his own bishop, shall not be allowed to celebrate, "but may nevertheless communicate there as a layman." By the 62nd, a clerk who had denied Christ, or his own office, in a time of persecution, was "after penance to be received as a layman." Cornelius of Rome writing to Fabius of Antioch, about 251, says of one of the bishops who had consecrated Novatian, but afterwards confessed his fault, "All the people present entreating for him, we communicated with him as a layman" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 43). When Rufinus translates this, about the year 490, he says, "He was received into lay communion," that phrase having sprung up in the interval. Cyprian, writing in 252, says of Trophimus, who is supposed to be the bishop mentioned by Cornelius, "He was so admitted that he communicates as a layman" (Epist. 55 ad Anton.). Two years later the same father says that Basilides, another offending bishop, on his repentance, "thought himself sufficiently happy, if it were granted him to communicate even as a layman" (Ep. 67 ad Felicem, &c.). Again, in a letter to Stephen of Rome, A.D. 256, St. Cyprian declares that it had been decided at Carthage "by consent and common authority" that presbyters and deacons, who had fallen into heresy or schism, should "on their return be received on this condition, that they should communicate as laymen" (Epist. 72 ad Steph.). There is extant an account of a council held in that city in the same year, at which a bishop delivered it as his opinion, that "all schismatics and heretics who had turned to the church should be rebaptized, but that those who seemed to have been ordained should also be received among the laity" (sent. 4). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, orders that a deacon who had committed a great crime before ordination, and did not come forward as his own accuser, should be five years in penance, and then "receive lay communion" (can. 76). This is the earliest instance of the use of that expression. At the council convened at Cologne to consider the case of the Arian bishop of that city, one of the bishops present expressed himself thus: "Because Euphrates denies that Christ is God, I agree that he cannot be a bishop, who ought not to receive even lay communion" (Synod. Agripp. sent. 2). This council is assigned with some doubt to the year 346. We may observe that in the last two instances there is a probable reference to the Eucharist, the reception of which was the chief privilege and sign of communion in the other sense. In 347 the council of Sardica decreed that if two bishops whom it deposed "asked for lay communion, it should not be denied them" (can. 19). St. Athanasius, writing in 349 or the year following, says that it was "notorious, and a thing beyond doubt with every one, that Colluthus (who had affected the title and performed the acts of a bishop) had died a presbyter, and that every ordination by him had been annulled, and all ordained by him in the schism had been made laymen, and so came to synaxis" (Apol. contra Arianos). St. Basil A.D. 370: "Those clerks who sin a sin unto death are deposed from their order, but not kept from the communion of laymen. For thou shalt not punish the same offence twice" (ad Amphiloch. c. 32). Siricius of Rome, A.D. 385: "Let any clerk who shall have married either a widow, or at all events a second wife, be at once stripped of every privilege of ecclesiastical dignity, lay communion only being conceded to him" (Epist. ad Himer. c. 11). At a general African council assembled at Hippo in 393, it was decreed that the Donatist clergy should on their return to the church be "received into the number of the laity" (can. 41). The council of Toledo, A.D. 400 (can. 4) decreed that a subdeacon who married for the third time should, after suspension from communion for two years, "being reconciled by penance, communicate among laymen." A Roman council under Felix, A.D. 487, of bishops who had been rebaptized among heretics: "It will be proper that they lie under penance (should they repent) to the last day of their life; and that they be not on any account present at the prayers, not of the faithful only, but even of the catechumens, to whom lay communion only is to be restored at their death" (can. 2). The council of Agde, in France, A.D. 506, of clergymen guilty of crime: "Deposed from the honour of office let such a one be thrust into a monastery, and there let him receive lay communion only as long as he lives" (can. 50). The council of Lerida, in Spain, A.D. 524, of clergymen who, after professing repentance, had fallen again into gross sin: "Let them not only be deprived of the dignity of office, but not even receive the holy communion, except when dying" (can. 5). Here the sacrament is distinctly meant, by the reception of which they might have been consigned to "lay communion" in its true and proper sense. The council of Orleans, A.D. 538, orders that any clerk, from a subdeacon upwards, who shall cohabit with his wife, be "deposed from office according to the decrees of former canons, and be content with lay communion" (can. 2). By two other canons of this council, the offenders are to be reduced to lay communion, but that phrase is not employed. In one case, "deposed from office, communion being granted to him, he is to be thrust into a monastery for the whole period of his life" (can. 7); in the other, "communion being granted to him, he is to be degraded from his order" (can. 26). That "lay communion" was used as a punishment to the end of our period and later appears from the following chapter out of the 6th book of the Capitularies of the French Kings collected by Benedict the deacon, A.D. 845: "If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or subdeacon shall go to the war, and put on warlike arms for fighting, let him be deposed from every office, so that he have not even lay communion" (c. lxi. Comp. Canones, Isaac Episc. Lingon. tit. xi. c. x.).

From the foregoing extracts it will be inferred that the expression "lay communion" had generally no immediate reference to the reception of the Eucharist. It merely denoted the whole position of a layman in full communion with the church. But as that sacrament was only given to persons in full communion with the church, it came to the same thing whether a deposed clerk were said to be allowed lay communion, or to receive the sacrament of the holy communion. One who passed out of penance into lay communion would of course be formally absolved by the bishop, before he could receive the sacrament; but there is no reason to believe that any form of admission was generally employed, when a disqualified clerk passed, without performing penance, into the position of a lay communicant. There appears, however, to have been one exception in the church of Rome, if we may trust to an Epistle ascribed to Innocent I., about 404, but believed on good grounds to be spurious: "It is the law of our church to grant lay communion only to those who come over from the heretics (who however have been baptized among them) by the imposition of hands" (Ep. ad Epist. Maced. c. 4).

A criminal clerk fell into lay communion by the application of a principle laid down by many councils and writers; viz. that one who had been under public penance was incapable of orders. Thus St. Augustine: "It hath been most strictly decreed that after penance performed for crime liable to condemnation no one should be a clergyman" (Epist. 185, ad Bonif. c. x. § 45). [See PENITENCE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

Heretics returning to the church were always subjected to this discipline. St. Augustine represents the Donatists arguing thus: "If, say they, it behoves that we do penance for having been out of the church, and against the church, that we may be capable of salvation, how is it that we remain clerks or even bishops after that penance?" (ibid. § 44). Replying to this, St. Augustine says in effect that their recognition was not good in itself for the church, but was permitted in order to end a worse evil, the continuance of the schism. When the Nicene council, A.D. 325, admitted the Novatian clergy to communion, it imposed no penance, and even allowed them to retain their rank and exercise their functions, if they live in places where there was room for it (can. 8). When Cornelius of Rome, 251, received the Novatian presbyter Maximus to communion, he also permitted him to continue in his office (Epist. 49, inter Epp. Cypr.).

II. There was another punishment for offending clerks, of which we read in a few canons under the name of communio peregrina, the communion of travellers, or, as it has been less properly rendered, of strangers. The 3rd canon of Riez, A.D. 439, directs that a schismatical bishop shall on his return to the church either be "encouraged by the title of chorepiscopus, as the 8th canon of Nicaea speaks, or by peregrine communion, as they say." The council of Agde orders that contumacious and neglectful clerks shall have "peregrine communion assigned to them, but so that when penance shall have corrected them, they may be again enrolled and reassume their order and dignity" (can. 2). Here we observe in passing that the penitential of which this canon speaks must be repentance or private penance; because, as we have seen, no one could exercise any clerical function who had ever been subject to public penance. The same council says: "If any clerk shall have stolen from a church, let peregrine communion be assigned to him" (can. 5). The 16th canon of Lerida directs that a clerk who, on the death of his bishop, had stolen anything from his house, or fraudulently concealed anything, shall be condemned with the longer anathema, as guilty of sacrilege, and that the communion of travellers be hardly granted to him." The 2nd and 5th canons of Agde appear in the code of Charlemagne and his successors compiled by Angelus and Benedict in the 9th century (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 1075, 1094, 1225).

Peregrine communion has been supposed by several writers to be identical with lay communion. That they differed, and how, will appear from the following considerations. (1.) There would otherwise be no propriety in the name, travellers having no more to do with lay communion than residents. (2.) The council of Agde in one canon (50) imposes lay communion on clerks guilty of capital offences, forgery, and false witness: while others inflict peregrine communion on contumacy (c. 2) and theft from a church (c. 5). From this we infer that the latter penalty was something less severe than the former. (3.) Again, the 2nd canon of Agde shows that a clerk reduced to peregrine communion might be restored; whereas we have seen that lay communion was for life. (4.) The name suggests the nature of the punishment. It appears to intimate that the clerk on whom it was inflicted was placed in the position of a traveller who came to a strange church without bringing letters of communion. [See KOINONIKON.] Such a visitor was admissible to the less sacred offices of religion, but not permitted to receive the Eucharist until a letter, vouching for him, arrived from his own bishop. Hence we see that peregrine communion involved abstinence from the sacrament for a time, which lay communion did not. [W. E. S.]

LAZARUS (1). In Ethiopia his first death is commemorated March 13, his resurrection March 16, his second rest, in Cyprus, of which he was bishop, May 22. From Citium in Cyprus his relics were brought to Constantinople, Oct. 17, A.D. 890, by Leo the Wise (Tillem. ii. 36). Before that time he had no fixed day among the Greeks, unless he be meant by Lycarion, Feb. 8 (Menol. Basil.), but was celebrated on the vigil of Palm Sunday (Tillem. ii. 37). At Rome in the 7th century he was commemorated with Martha only, Dec. 17—a custom seemingly taken from their convent near Bethany (Mart. Rom.; Usuard).

LAZARUS (IN ART). The Resurrection of Lazarus is naturally a subject very frequently represented in Christian Art. We find it in catacombs, churches, and cemeteries, in paintings, sculptures, and mosaics, on simple slabs, and on sarcophagi (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. 97). In some cases, where no such painting, mosaic, and sculpture exists, either outside or inside the tomb, we find small statues of Lazarus, in metal or ivory, affixed to the exterior. In early representations of this great event, Lazarus appears as a small mummy-like figure swathed in bandages, the head is bound with a napkin, which surrounds the face, leaving it uncovered (Buonarroti, Vetri, tab. vii. 1). The Lord stands before this figure, which is placed upright at the entrance to a small temple, and in most instances He touches it with a rod. Sometimes He extends His right hand, whilst in the left He holds a half-opened volume (Bottari, tab. xxviii.-xlii. etc.). In some examples the right hand is free, and raised in the act of benediction according to the Latin form (Airinghi, ii. 121), sometimes His hand is laid upon the head of Lazarus (id. ii. 183). An example in the cemetery of Callixtus (id. i. 565) shews us an exact representation of a chrysalis instead of the swathed figure; possibly allusion to the resurrection may be here intended. On some Gallican sarcophagi, Lazarus appears extended on the ground, no tomb being visible, as in an example in the "Musée Lapidaire" of Lyons (No. 764; Millin, Midi de la France, Atlas, pl. lxxv.). On glass cups, where the greater portion of the design is, as usual, in gold, the graveclothes are in silver (Buonarroti, vii. 2; Perret, iv. pl. xxxii. 97). Disregarding the sacred text, we find some artists giving folding-doors to the tomb of Lazarus (Buonarroti, vii.

3), though it was in fact closed with a stone. Sometimes it is hewn out of the natural rock, without any attempt at architecture (Airinghi, ii. 331), and shrubs are placed upon the two steps at the entrance.

Some artists, who probably had but a slight acquaintance with Jewish customs, have placed the body of Lazarus in a sarcophagus (Bottari, tab. lxxxix.), adorned with lions' heads, and even supported by sphinxes, subjects of very rare occurrence in early Christian Art (ib. tab. exciii.). The diminutive, even infantine, proportions of the body of Lazarus, as represented by ancient artists, cannot fail to excite attention. It may be that the beginning of a new life is thus symbolized; but more probably this is only an instance of a custom frequent in other representations of the Lord's miracles, of making the object of the miracle small in comparison with the Lord Himself [BLIND, HEALING OF, I. 241]. A curious fresco in the cemetery of Rennes (Airinghi, ii. 329), shews the swathed figure standing on the flat without any support, and without the usual temple. In paintings and on glass [GLASS, I. 730], the two essential figures—the Lord and Lazarus—are alone represented. A fragment of a mosaic given by Marchi (Monum. tab. xlvii.) furnishes perhaps the only exception to this rule. In this, a female figure, presumably one of the sisters of Lazarus, kneels at the feet of the Lord, and extends her hands towards him.

Lazarus. From Martigny.

This is of much more frequent occurrence in the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi. These are of more recent date, and always complete the scene with the figures of Martha and Mary (Airinghi, i. 335), or at least the latter, prostrate or kneeling, at the feet of the Saviour (ib. i. 323, etc.), or sometimes devoutly kissing his hand (ib. i. 423). A curious sepulchral stone, unfortunately broken, shews two hands behind the Lord, all that remains of a figure, probably that of Mary, which formerly stood there (Perret, iv. 13). Sometimes the scene is completed and enlarged by the figures of two or more disciples, towards whom the Lord turns as if to draw their attention to the miracle (Airinghi, i. 427).

The Christian artists of these early times frequently connect Old and New Testament subjects, between which any real or fancied analogy is traceable. Thus, in many instances, particularly on sarcophagi, we have Moses striking the rock, introduced as a pendant to the resurrection of Lazarus. We even find the two subjects united, as in the fresco of an arcosolium given by Airinghi (ii. 123). In another fresco in the cemetery of Rennes, the figures of the Lord and Moses are nearly identical in dress, in attitude, and even in countenance (ib. 329). Even on simple sepulchral slabs we find the two subjects associated in a similar manner (Perret, v. pl. lxiii. 29).

The tomb of Lazarus was guarded with religious care by the faithful, and visited by them with the other sacred and memorable places in Palestine (Jerome, Epist. ii.). We learn from Jerome also (De Loc. Heb. s. v. Bethania) that a church was built upon the site. This is also mentioned by Bede, but it seems certain that there was no church there in the time of Constantine, as the itinerary of Jerusalem made in that emperor's reign contains no allusion to it. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.)

LECTERN (lectorium, lectoria). A standing desk in a church, from which certain portions of service were read. It appears to have been of later introduction than the Ambo [AMBO], and to have differed from that by being placed in the centre of the choir instead of at the side. Lectoria are very frequently mentioned in the "liber pontificalis" of Anastasius among the gifts made by the popes to the basilicas. They are described as being of large size, often made of, or coated with, the precious metals, and richly moulded and embossed. They were usually provided with candelabra (cerostata) standing on either side, lighted on Sundays and festivals (Anastas. pp. 397, 419, 546). Leo III. (A.D. 795, 816) gave a lectorium "of purest silver of wondrous size" with candelabra to St. Peter's (Anastas. p. 399). Leo IV. (A.D. 847-855) also gave to the same basilica one of silver, chased, standing on four feet, surmounted by a lion's head, with four candelabra plated with silver (ib. 552). St. Eligius is stated to have plated a lectorium with gold (Audoenus, lib. S. Elig. apud Ducange). Mariusculus (apud Ducange) speaks also of lectoria constructed of marble, silver and gold.

The cloth that covered a lectorium was termed lectorinus. (Annal. Mediolan. apud Muratori, tom. xvi. col. 810.)

LECTION (Lectio; ἀνάγνωσις; Leçon; Eng. Lesson). The words ἀνάγνωσις and Lectio may be taken in a wider sense to include all readings which formed part of Divine Service. [EPISTLE; GOSPEL; PROPHECY.] The word Lection is here however taken in a narrower sense, to denote the readings of selected passages during the ordinary daily office. Such readings were of three kinds.

1. Passages of Holy Scripture.

2. Passages from comments or homilies of the Fathers.

3. Acts of Martyrs or other saints.

The readings from Holy Scripture, of which Justin Martyr speaks, were connected with the administration of the Eucharist, and are therefore to be regarded rather as corresponding to the Epistle, Gospel, and Prophecy of later times, than to the lections with which we are now concerned. It is not until a later date that we find distinct indications of the mingling of lections with Psalmody, as in the Hour-Offices of the present day.

There are in the Eastern Daily Offices no lections from Scripture. The scheme of service given in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57-62) contains none, and even to this day the ordinary Greek offices are entirely devoid of them. In the morning office on Sundays and Festivals the Gospel is read. That lections from Scripture were in use in the province or district represented at the council of Laodicea, in the fourth century, we have distinct evidence in the canon quoted below, though ultimately another system prevailed in the East generally. This system was that of the intermixture of ODES with psalms; and Archdeacon Freeman regards these odes as the equivalents of the Western lections, which, with their long responsories, came to be in fact, "a long and elaborate piece of music interrupted at intervals by a very brief recitative out of Holy Scripture" (Divine Service, i. 70, 125, 345). We may perhaps regard this absence of lections from the Eastern offices as an indication of their connection with the synagogue, where Moses appears to have been read "every Sabbath day" only.

The council of Laodicea, about A.D. 360, enjoined (c. 17) that in the assemblies for worship (συνάξεις) the psalms should not be said in continuous series, but that between each psalm there should be a lection (ἀνάγνωσις); and this only from Canonical Scripture [CANONICAL BOOKS, I. 279]. At a somewhat later date, John Cassian tells us (De Coenob. Inst. ii. 4) that throughout all Egypt the custom was to divide the psalms into groups of twelve; after the saying of each twelve there followed two lections, of the Old and the New Testament. This very ancient custom is observed (he says) the more religiously in all the monasteries of that district, because it was reputed to be no invention of man, but to have been brought from heaven by an angel. The third council of Carthage (c. 47) forbade anything but canonical Scripture to be read in churches. St. Augustine also (Epist. 64, c. 3) speaks of the danger of reading in the church other writings than those contained in the canon received by the church. Isidore of Seville (Regula, c. 7) says that in the office the lections were taken generally from the Old and New Testament, but on Saturdays and Sundays from the New only.

The Rule of Caesarius ad Monachos (c. 20) prescribes that in vigils from the month of October to Easter there should be two Nocturns and three "Missae" [i.e. lections, whether from the Bible or from Passions]; also (c. 25) that on every Sabbath, every Lord's day, and every Festival, there should be twelve psalms, three antiphons, and three lections; one from the Prophets, one from the Apostle, and a third from the Gospel. The Rule of Aurelian (Migne, Patrol. vol. 68, p. 304) orders in the nocturns on ordinary days two lections of the Apostle or the Prophets, and Capitulum in Paschal nocturns three, from the Acts, the Apocalypse, and the Gospels. It also (c. 14) enjoins that the ordinary course of the lections be interrupted and proper lections substituted, on festivals.

St. Benedict's Rule (c. 9) prescribes that in the winter half of the year, when the long nights permitted prolonged nocturns, after the saying of six psalms and the abbat's benediction, while all sat on benches there should be read in turns by the brothers from the book on the lectern three lections, with a responsory at the end of each, the last responsory followed by a Gloria. These lections are to be not only from the Old and New Testament, but also from the expositions of Scripture by orthodox doctors and Catholic Fathers of the highest repute (nominatissimis). After these three lections come the remaining six psalms, with Alleluia; then the lection of the Apostle (i.e. the Capitulum) said by heart, the verse and the Kyrie Eleison. Who are to be reckoned "nominatissimi doctores" is matter of some doubt; some only reckon Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory to belong to this class; others add such writers as Basil, Hilary, John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, and Bede. See the note on c. 9 in the Regula Commentata (Migne, Patrol. vol. 66, p. 272).

We learn from the Miracula S. Stephani (ii. 2; in Martene, iv. v. 2) that a letter of bishop Severus was read after the canonical lections. And it appears from a letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. x. 22) that in some cases at least comments of distinguished doctors were read in his time; for he disapproved the conduct of Marinianus, bishop of Ravenna, who had ordered his (Gregory's) comments on the Book of Job to be read at vigils; "bid him," he writes to John the sub-deacon, "cause comments on the Psalms to be read at vigils, as being especially adapted to promote good dispositions among the seculars; for while I am yet in the flesh, I will not have anything which I may chance to have written published at once to all men." From which it appears that there was no objection to the reading of comments on Scripture in the offices—which, indeed, seems to have been a recognised practice—but only to reading comments of the then living pope.

In the life of St. Stephen the younger, A.D. 767 (Migne, Patrol. Ser. Graec. vol. 100, p. 410), we read that the saint while yet a boy, instead of sitting down, as was the custom during the reading of the lections, stood close to the chancel rails and listened to the reader, and so learned to repeat what was read, whether a martyrdom, or a life, or a sermon of some pious Father, especially St. John Chrysostom.

The council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, Hadan and Stubbs, iii. 367), forbids the clergy to sing or read in their offices anything not sanctioned by common usage; that is, they are to use only what is sanctioned by Holy Scripture and what the practice of the Roman church permits (tantum quod ex S. Scripturarum auctoritate descendit et quod Romanae Ecclesiae usus permittit). This canon shows that lections were taken not only from Holy Scripture, but from other books sanctioned by the Roman church.

In the lections used in the daily office, which were not wholly scriptural, many defects and errors had been introduced before the eighth century, especially in the Gallican lectionaries. This led Charlemagne, in a Constitutio de Emendatione Librorum et Officiorum Ecclesiasticorum of the year 788 (Baluze, Capitul. i. 203), to make the following provision for their amendment: "Whereas we have found many of the lections compiled, with however good intent, for use in the nocturnal office, unfit for their purpose, as having no name of an author appended and being full of innumerable blunders; we do not allow in our days inharmonious solecisms to be heard in divine lections in the sacred offices, and have given our mind to bring the same lections into a better way. And we laid the perfecting of that work upon Paul the deacon, one of our household, namely, that carefully going through the sayings of the Catholic Fathers, he might (as it were) gather certain flowers out of their exquisite meads, and weave those which are most profitable into one garland. Who, desiring to yield devoted obedience to our Highness, after reading through the tracts and sermons of divers of the Catholic Fathers and choosing the best, has presented to us in two volumes a series of lections, cleared of errors, suitable for each festival throughout the circle of the year. Of all which pondering the text with our sagacity, we sanction the same volumes with our authority, and deliver over to you, religious readers, to read in the churches of Christ."

That the practice of reading Acts of Martyrs on their festivals had begun before the time of St. Augustine is evident from a sermon of his on St. Stephen (Sermo 315, c. 1), in which he lays stress on the fact that the passion of the first martyr was contained in a canonical book, while acts of other martyrs to be recited at their commemorations could scarcely be found at all. And again he says (Sermo 273, c. 2), "You heard the questions of the persecutors and the answers of the confessors when the passion of the saints was read." Nor was this a custom peculiar to Africa. Various old monastic rules (e.g. Aurelian de Ordine Psallendi, Migne's Patrol. tom. 68, p. 396) prove that the reading of lives of the saints or acts of martyrs in the offices was also a custom of the Gallican church. A lectionary of Luxeuil, which Martene believed to be of the seventh or eighth century, contains lections from the acts of SS. Juliana and Basilica. Avitus of Vienne († 523) in a fragment of a homily (Fr. vi.; Migne, Patrol. 59, p. 297) mentions that the passion of the martyrs of Agaune was read "according to custom"; and Caesarius of Arles (Sermo 300 in Augustine's Works, v. v. p. 2319, Migne) speaks of the long readings from passions (passiones prolixae) in the church. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Martyrum, i. 86) states that the Passion of Polycarp was publicly read.

In the church of Lyons it seems that none but Scripture lessons were anciently read, even on the vigil of a saint. The bishops who were present at the Collatio Episcoporum before king Gundebald in the year 499 (D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii. 304 ff. Paris, 1723), unanimously determined to hold vigil at the tomb of St. Justus, whose festival happened to occur at that time. In this office we find that the lections were wholly from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament; no acts of St. Justus were read even in the vigil of his own festival. Nor was the church of Rome by any means ready to admit Acts of Martyrs into the public offices. The Decretal of Gelasius I. (Gratiani Decret. Dist. xv. c. 3, § 17)^a states that such acts are, in accordance with ancient custom, not read in the Roman church, out of caution, for in many cases the names of the writers are unknown, and they are sometimes written by infidels or unskilful persons in a manner altogether unworthy of the subject. And even at a comparatively late date Acts of Martyrs seem to have been excluded from the offices in some districts, for Martene (iv. v. 4) states that in many MS. lectionaries of the Cistercian order in Maine, about five hundred years old in his time (i.e. so late as the twelfth century), no lections are found, but passages of Scripture and homilies of the Fathers.

And the same distrust of the numerous acts of martyrs which were current in the church, appears in the sixty-third canon of the Trullan Council, at the end of the seventh century. "We decree," runs the canon, "that Martyrologies falsely composed by enemies of the truth, with the view of dishonouring the martyrs of Christ, and bringing those who hear them into unbelief, should not be published in the churches, but delivered to the fire; and we anathematize those who receive them or give heed to them as true." In the same spirit pope Hadrian writes (Epist. ad Car. Magn.): "Lives of the Fathers not resting on authority (sine probabilibus auctoribus) are not read in the church. Those which bear the names of orthodox writers are both received and read. For the canons of the church sanction the reading of the Passions of the Martyrs in the church when their anniversaries are celebrated."

In the time of St. Augustine, if not earlier, the practice had established itself of assigning certain lections to certain days; these, says the saint in the opening of his exposition of the first epistle of St. John, were so fixed in their courses that no others could be read. To the same effect, the first [Mansi's second] council of Braga [c. A.D. 563], decreed (c. 2) that in the vigils or "missae"^b of festivals, all [the clergy of the province] should read the same and not different lections.

^a The copies of this document vary greatly, and it is difficult to say how much is interpolated.

^b It must be borne in mind that this word was not limited to altar-offices. [MISSA.]

It does not appear however, even when certain lections were assigned to certain days, that their extent was limited in the same exact manner as in modern Breviaries; the reader continued to read the passage of Scripture, or of a Father, or the Passion, as the case might be, until the chief person in the choir signed to him to stop. A common practice in monastic churches was for the presiding brother to clap his hands; in the church of St. Martin, at Tours, he called out "fac finem," words which Martene (iv. v. 6) found written at the end of the lections in an old lectionary. Charles the Great, when he was present at the office, used to stop the reader by some kind of cough or grunt (sono gutturis); and in a church where the emperor was present it was useless to "get up" a portion beforehand; every one in the choir had to be prepared to read, if called upon, any portion of the lections of the day (De Eccl. Cura Car. Mag., quoted by Martene, iv. v. 6). In the Roman church it was an ancient custom for the deacons to sing the first words of Tu autem Domine at the end of lections (Ordines Rom. pp. 123 and 174). It was not uncommon for the end of the lections to be marked beforehand in the book with a piece of wax, such as Martene (u.s.) says that he has often seen in ancient lectionaries still adhering to the spot.

As to the extent of each lection it is ordered in the rule of Aurelian that three or four pages be read, according as the copy used was written in larger or smaller characters.

The practice of reading a certain series of passages in the offices having once grown up, it was natural that books should be formed containing the requisite extracts. This took place in fact at a comparatively early period. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 2) mentions among the good deeds of Claudian († 470), brother of Mamerthus of Vienne, that he drew up a lectionary:

"Hic solemnibus annuis paravit Quae quo tempore lecta convenirent."

Gennadius (De Scriptt. Eccl. c. 79) says of Musaeus, a Gallican writer contemporary with Claudian, that he extracted from Holy Scripture the lections for the festivals of the whole year, with responsories and capitula adapted to the lections and the season.

The Liber Pontificalis (c. 218, p. 1055, Migne) relates of pope Zacharias († 752) that he placed in charge of the armarius or librarian of St. Peter's church at Rome all the codices belonging to his own house, which are read throughout the year at matins (qui in circulo anni leguntur ad matutinum). It is, however, not quite clear in this case whether the books in question were lectionaries, or whether they were not rather the works from which lections were taken. The work described under INSTRUCTION (I. 862) was a lectionary, though of limited extent.

Lections were generally said not by persons in major orders, but by sub-deacons or persons in minor orders. Gregory the Great (Epist. iv. 44; App. n. 5, p. 1334, Migne) laid down on this point that the saying of Psalms and other lections was to be performed by sub-deacons, or, in case of necessity, by yet lower orders; a decree which seems to exclude mere laymen from this office altogether. To the same effect the second [third] council of Braga (c. 45) decreed that no one should act as singer or reader in the choir without regular ordination to such office (non liceat in pulpito psallere aut legere nisi qui a presbytero [al. episcopo] lectores sunt ordinati; compare Conc. Laod. c. 15). The second Council of Nicaea also (c. 14) censures the practice of young persons, who had received no imposition of hands from the bishop, reading on the ambo, whether in monastic or other churches. The first [second] Council of Braga (c. 11) ordered that readers should not perform their office in the church in their secular dress. [LAITY, II. 914.]

Silence was proclaimed before a lection. "What trouble is there," says St. Ambrose (Enarr. in Ps. i. c. 9, p. 741), "to obtain silence in the church when lections are read!" And it was usual for the bishop or the principal person present in choir to give his benediction and sign to the reader to begin. The reader coming in with his book, says Gregory of Tours (De Mirac. S. Martini, i. 5), was not allowed to begin to read until the saint [Ambrose] gave him permission by a nod. This, however, relates to an altar-lection.

It is evident from several passages quoted above that the lections were read on the ambo or pulpitum, by which we are to understand in many cases not merely a pulpit or lectern, but the whole of the raised stage or foot-pace in a church on which the choir was stationed. The church of the monastery of Bec had, in Martene's time (IV. v. 11), at the top of the steps of the ambo a pulpit for lections.

For the congregation to sit during the reading of lections was regarded in early times as a concession to infirmity; "when long Passions or other lessons are read," says Caesarius of Arles (Serm. 300, u.s.), "let those who are unable to stand, humbly sit in silence, and with attentive ears listen to what is read." Sitting afterwards became the usual posture. St. Benedict in his rule (c. 9) expressly permitted the brothers to sit during lections; and at a later period (about 1060) Peter Damian (Opusc. 39) speaks of sitting during lections as a universal custom of his time.

With the reading of lections was connected from ancient times the use of RESPONSORIES (see the article).

(Martene, de Ritibus Antiquis; Grancolas, Traité de l'Office Divin; Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, vol. i.) [C.]

LECTIONARY.—I. Proofs of early Use.—Those who refer the use of a formal table of stated lessons taken from Holy Scripture to the Church of the 3rd century [Vol. I. p. 622] can plead in favour of their opinion that, before the close of the 4th century, such a practice was both universal and regarded as already ancient. Chrysostom devotes a whole homily to explain the reason why the Acts of the Apostles are publicly read throughout the festal season between Easter-day and Whitsun-day, and elsewhere states that the rule of the fathers (τῶν πατέρων ὁ νόμος) directs that book to be laid aside after Pentecost. Even such a purely arbitrary arrangement as the reading of the book of Genesis in Lent had become so inveterate in his time (ταῦτα γὰρ ἡμῖν ἀνεγνώσθη σήμερον), that after having gone through the first part of that book in his discourses at Constantinople in the Lent of A.D. 400, he defers the remainder until the season came round again the following year: the offering up of Isaac alone, as Augustine tells us, "ideo in ordine suo, diebus quadragesimae, non recitatur," as being reserved for the services of Holy Week. Chrysostom also advises his hearers to read at home during the week-days such Saturday and Sunday lessons as they knew would be expounded in course on the next Lord's day, and Bingham (Antiquities, book xiv. ch. iii. s. 3) adds to these well-known passages others to the same purport gathered from Origen, Augustine, and Ambrose, vouching for the custom (de more) of reading Job and Jonah during the Holy Week. Cyril of Jerusalem also (A.D. 348), having to speak of the Ascension, remarks that on the previous day, being a Sunday (τῇ χθὲς ἡμέρα κατὰ τὴν κυριακὴν), that event had formed the subject of the appointed lesson (ἐν τῇ συνάξει τῆς τῶν ἀναγνωσμάτων ἀκολουθίας). Since in all these scattered notices we meet with nothing to contradict, but everything to correspond with the established order of later times, Dean Burgon is fully justified in his conclusion that, "although there happens to be extant neither Synaxarium (i. e. Table of proper lessons of the Greek Church), nor Evangelistarium (i. e. Book containing the ecclesiastical lections in extenso), of higher antiquity than the 8th century,—yet that the scheme itself, as exhibited by those monuments—certainly in every essential particular—is older than any known Greek manuscript which contains it by at least four, in fact by full five hundred years" (Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark, p. 195). Yet even the oldest Greek manuscripts (for to the Greek calendar of lessons we are for the present confining ourselves) bear distinct traces of having been used for liturgical purposes. Without insisting upon more doubtful instances, it is thus that we can best explain the omission of the confessedly genuine verses (Luke xxii. 43, 44) from four of our chief uncial MSS. (A, B, R, T) of the 4th and 5th centuries; the sacred words not having been publicly read in their proper place, but after Matth. xxvi. 40, as a part of the service for the vigil of Good Friday, where they occur in every extant lectionary, and even in one cursive copy of the Gospels (Cod. 69), which, though itself as late as the 14th century, is known to follow a very ancient text. The double insertion of the noble doxology, Rom. xvi. 25–27, after ch. xiv., as well as in its proper place at the end of the epistle, by the Codex Alexandrinus of the 5th century, is best accounted for by its being so set in lectionaries as part of the proper lesson for the Saturday before Quinquagesima. Codex Bezae (D), again, of about the 5th century, prefixes to Luke xvi. 19 the formula εἶπεν δὲ καὶ ἑτέραν παραβολήν, which is the liturgical introduction to the Gospel for the 5th Sunday of St. Luke. Another of Cod. D's prefixes, καὶ εἶπεν τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, John xiv. 1, is almost identical with that in the English Prayer Book for St. Philip and St. James's Day. But the strongest case of all is perhaps Mark xiv. 41, where after ἀπέχει is read in Cod. D and a few of later date (e.g. Cod. 69), the senseless interpolation τὸ τέλος or τέλος, "the end," which manifestly came into the text from the margin of ver. 42, where it indicates in the usual manner the close of the Gospel for the third day of the carnival week. Since in this last case the patent transcriptional error is met with also in the Peshito Syriac, and in some forms of the Old Latin version, which together will probably carry us back to the 2nd century, it is hard to resist the inference "that the lessons of the Eastern church were settled at a period long anterior to the date of the oldest manuscript of the Gospels extant" (Burgon, p. 226).

II. Greek Liturgical Books.—The earliest known Synaxaria, or tables of ecclesiastical lessons throughout the year, are found in two copies of the Gospels now at Paris, C. dd. Cypricus (K) and Campianus (M). These, together with fragments of Menologia, or tables of saints'-day lessons, annexed to them, were published by Scholz at the end of the first volume of his Greek Testament, in 1830. The margins of both these manuscripts, and of their contemporary, Cod. L, also at Paris, all three being of the 8th or 9th century, are covered with liturgical notes either by the original scribe or by a hand of the same period, which indicate, mostly in red ink, the beginnings and ends of the lessons (APXH, TEAOC), the days on which they are to be used, and often the initial words whereby they are to be introduced. After this date quite a majority of manuscripts of the Gospels proper are furnished with marginal notes of this kind, and very many with synaxaria and menologia, full of crabbed abbreviations and sometimes added in a later age. Perhaps no known evangelistarium, or book containing the ecclesiastical lessons in full, like those English church lectionaries which have recently come into use, can be ascribed with confidence to an earlier period than the 9th century. A fragment at St. Petersburg, described by Tischendorf, contains some Arabic writing decidedly more modern, yet dated A.D. 1011. A noble and complete copy at Parham (No. 18), written at Ciscissa in Cappadocia, bears the date of A.D. 980, and Harl. 5598 in the British Museum is only fifteen years later. A few others, e.g. Cod. Numanian 171, in the Grand Ducal Library at Venice, and Arundel 547 in the British Museum, are probably anterior to the dated copies just mentioned, which, however, we are safest in taking as the groundwork of our conjectural estimates in regard to others which are not dated. Evangelistaria of the 10th and 11th centuries are almost always large folios, written (as was convenient for the purpose they were intended to serve) in bold characters of the uncial form, a fashion which in other books had almost entirely given place to the cursive or running hand. Their material is a coarse thick parchment, quite inferior to the fine vellum employed a few centuries before, though the leaves of a few, such as Parham 18, are still thin, white, and delicate. The lectionaries are almost always written with two columns on a page, and the headings and initial letters are often illuminated in gold and colours. Musical tones, in red ink, above and below the text, must have been designed to guide the reader's voice. Uncial codices of lessons from the Gospels number about seventy, those of the Acts and Epistles are less than ten; but indeed copies of the latter (commonly called the Apostolos or Præapostolos) of any age scarcely amount to eighty, while of those of the Gospels about three hundred survive in various libraries, public and private. Some of the cursive or more recent lectionaries are sumptuously bound, the covers being adorned with enamel and silver gilt ornaments, in rare cases forming single figures or groups, of much artistic merit. Tables of the Greek church lessons were printed at Venice in 1615-24 in two volumes which do not range together (Cambridge Univ. Library, ii. 288), and again, at the same place, in 1851. The following lists, however, are derived from manuscripts which in the menologia differ widely from each other. While the great church festivals are common to them all, different generations and provinces, and even dioceses, had their favourite worthies whose memory they specially cherished; so that the character of the menology (which sometimes formed a considerable, sometimes but a small, portion of a whole lectionary) will help to direct us to discover the district in which the volume itself was written. The lectionaries we have chiefly used for our present purpose, are, in the Gospels, Arundel 547, Parham 18, Harl. 5598 (all described above), Christ's College, Cambridge, F. I, 8, of the 11th century; Burney 22, in the British Museum, presenting a very remarkable text, with a subscription dated A.D. 1319; Dean Gale's O. iv. 22, of the 12th century, now at Trinity College, Cambridge; but this last contains the full lessons from Easter to Pentecost, with those of the Saturdays and Sundays, only (σαββατοκυριακά) for the rest of the year. Wake 12, of the 11th century, at Christ Church, is not an evangelistarium, but replete with notes. For the Apostolos we have used but one copy, unfortunately imperfect, the week-day lessons of which are unusually full, viz. MS. No. iii. 24 (of about the 12th century) in the library of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. In some service-books will be found a few (in B-C. iii. 42 they are many) lessons taken from either division of the New Testament, which were read in connection with the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.

III. The Greek Ecclesiastical Year.—The Greek church seasonably begins its ecclesiastical year with the highest of our festivals, being Easter Day (ἡ ἁγία καὶ μεγάλη κυριακή τοῦ πάσχα), reckoning the seven weeks onward from Easter week (ἡ διακινήσιμος) and Low Sunday (ἀντί-πασχα) to Whitsun-day (ἡ κυριακή τῆς πεντηκοστῆς). The Gospels from St. John (except a few proper lessons) and the Epistles from the Acts run on successively throughout these seven weeks, and evidently form one continuous scheme for every day in each week. Beyond this season, for the rest of the year, the Saturday and Sunday lessons stand apart from those of the five ordinary week days, which indeed seem to have been selected at a later period than the rest. On the morrow of the Pentecost (ἡ ἐπαύριον τῆς πεντηκοστῆς), St. John's Gospel having been exhausted, that of St. Matthew begins, and is read for eleven weeks without interruption, the Sunday after Whitsuntide not being kept as Trinity Sunday, as it has been in the Western church since the 12th century, but as the Greek All Saints' Day. The Greeks commemorate the Council of Nice on the Sunday before Pentecost. On the second day of the eleventh week after Whitsun-day St. Mark's Gospel is taken up, and read from the Monday to the Friday (παρασκευῇ) inclusive, for seven or at least for five weeks, the Saturday and Sunday lessons being still derived from St. Matthew. At this point comes in the difficulty, arising from the yearly variation of Easter Day in the calendar, which the Western church provides against by varying the number of its Sundays after Trinity. By the time that fifteen Sundays have elapsed after Pentecost, the Greek civil new year may have begun (Sept. 1) and with it the new indiction, when the Gospel of St. Luke was opened (ἀρχὴ τῆς ἰνδικτοῦ τοῦ νέου ἔτους, ἡγουν τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ Λουκᾶ, Arundel 547, Parham, 18). The ecclesiastical lessons from St. Matthew and St. Mark, however, from the 7th century downwards, would seem to have gone on until after the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, Sept. 14 (which is still used in England to fix our autumnal Ember week), by way of doing special honour to a festival recently instituted. (Δέον γινώσκειν ὅτι ἄρχεται ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκεισθαι ἀπὸ τῆς κυριακῆς μετὰ τὴν ὕψωσιν· τότε γὰρ καὶ ἡ ἰσημερία γίνεται καλεῖται νέον ἔτος. "Ἡ ὅτι ἀπὸ τῆς κγ' τοῦ σептемβρίου ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκειται, Burney 22, p. 191.) From whichever period the reading of St. Luke commenced, it proceeded without any break for eleven weeks, and, varied with the lessons from St. Mark for the five middle days of the week, for five or at least for three weeks more, when, if the Easter of the new year was early, the fast of Lent would be approaching. After reading as many of the lessons from St. Luke as were necessary, that for the seventeenth Sunday of St. Matthew (ch. xv. 21-28), called from its subject the Cananites, was always resumed (whether it had been read in its proper place or not), for the Sunday preceding that before the carnival (πρὸ τῆς ἀποκρέω), our Septuagesima, called by the Greeks the Prodigal, from the subject of its Gospel (Luke xv. 11-32). Then follow the Sunday of the carnival (τῆς ἀποκρέω), our Sexagesima, and that of the Cheese-eater (τῆς τυροφάγου), corresponding to our Quinquagesima. Next come the vigil of the fast of Lent, its six Sundays (the last being τῶν βατῶν, Palm Sunday), and the very full services of the Holy Week, the ecclesiastical year ending of course on Easter Even. Since the whole number of Sundays thus enumerated (even when the Cananites is reckoned twice) would amount to but fifty-three, a number which might easily of itself be insufficient to fill up the interval between two consecutive Easter Days, we must bear in mind that the menology supplies lessons for the Sundays before and after Christmas and Sept. 14, and for a Sunday after Epiphany, which could either be added to or substituted for the ordinary Gospels, as occasion required. The system of lessons from the Acts and Epistles is much simpler than that of the Gospels. Except between Easter and Pentecost they are not found at all for common week days, except in a very few lectionaries. The book of Genesis, it will be remembered, was read on such week days during Lent.

N.B.—The Gospel for the Sunday preceding that which the Western church calls Septuagesima is always that of the Canaanitess (Matth. xv. 21-28), which would sometimes displace one or two of those immediately preceding, as in the case of our Sunday next before Advent. Two weeks' lessons from the Epistles are also kept in reserve, to be used here if necessary. They are numbered from the weeks after Pentecost, as indeed are all the Epistles in the Greek lectionaries, viz.—

V. Syriac Lectionaries.—A valuable evangelistarium, written in a peculiar dialect of the Syriac language, called for the sake of distinction the Jerusalem Syriac, was first used by Adler in the Vatican (MS. Syr. 19), and has lately been published in full by Count F. Miniscalchi Erezzo (Verona, 1861-64). This book enables us to see that the ordinary lessons of the Syriac church at the period that it bears date (A.D. 1030), and probably long before, were identical with those of the Greek church as described above. In fact the Jerusalem Lectionary differs from the Greek for the portions which it contains little more than the various Greek copies do from each other. It does not supply the ordinary week-day lessons except from Easter to Pentecost and those of the Holy Week: the Menology also, as might have been expected (p. 51), is widely different in the two churches. Modern Syrian manuscripts and editions, however (such as that published by Professor Lee in 1816), are constructed on other principles; and agree with the Greek only on the occasion of such high festivals as hardly admitted a choice in their selection.

VI. The Coptic Lectionary.—For the Coptic, the other great branch of ancient Christianity in the East, we depend for the present mainly on a Coptic and Arabic manuscript, translated by Prebendary Malan in his Original Documents of the Coptic Church, No. IV. (1874), which he believes to agree very well with what is known elsewhere of Il-Cotmarus, the volume of lessons for the whole year. It contains only the Sunday and feast-day Gospels throughout the year, with the appropriate versicles and greetings annexed to each at full length; although we have the express testimony of Cassian (Institut. iii. 2) for the 5th century, that the Egyptians read both Epistle and Gospel every Saturday as well as every Sunday in their public services. The Sundays are arranged according to the months of the Coptic ecclesiastical year, which began August 29. The vigil or eve was always regarded as the commencement of each day. The manuscript being defective, the lessons for the first three Sundays, and some few others, cannot be given.

Thus the Coptic Christians agree with the Greeks in commemorating the Lord's baptism only on Jan. 6, and not the visit of the Magi, which was principally regarded in the Western church [EPIPHANY]. Yet the Gospels relating to the baptism (Matth. iii. 13-17, Luke iii. 23) appear in the old lectionary of the Gallican church, which had early and close communion with the East (p. 60); and Luke iii. 15-23 is still the English second lesson for the morning service.

A comparison of the lessons for the other festivals pertaining to our Lord suggests the same conclusions as those for the Christmas season.

In contrast with these resemblances it is well to note that in the services for the 7th century festival, that of the Elevation of the Cross, which has such influence on the later forms of the Greek lectionaries (p. 52), there is but a single passage in common between the two nations, and that one (John viii. 28-30) too obvious to be overlooked by either.

VIII. Lectionaries of the Western Church.—The tables of lessons we have hitherto examined have little in common with the Epistles and Gospels of the English church, and were evidently constructed on a different principle. The season of Advent, which is purely a Western institution, being regarded as a prelude to the high festival of Christmas, has appropriately opened the ecclesiastical year through western Christendom, at least from the 7th century downwards. The yearly changes rendered necessary by the variation of the Easter season were henceforward made by fixing the proper positions for Advent and Septuagesima Sundays, as in our Book of Common Prayer. The Western lectionaries, however, while they agree with each other in their general character and arrangements, present considerable differences in detail, which well deserve the student's attention. Although the Comes or Lectionary ascribed to St. Jerome by its editor Pamelius (Liturgica, Colon. 1571), and by others [EPISTLE], may not safely be regarded as a work of the 4th century, and is probably three or four centuries later, yet as regards the Epistles and Gospels it corresponds closely with the Roman service-book, whose selection, having been long familiar to Englishmen through the Use of Sarum (circa A.D. 1078), was wisely retained in all important particulars by those who compiled the two Prayer Books of Edward VIth's reign. Besides the Comes, and widely departing from it, exist lectionaries of the Gallican and Spanish churches, the former rendered accessible by the labours of Cardinal Bona (De rebus liturgicis, Paris, 1672), of Thomasius (Liber Sacramentorum, Rome, 1680), and of Mabillon (De liturgia Gallicana, Paris, 1685, &c.) [GOSPELS]. There can be little doubt that the peculiar features of the Gallican service-book were derived from that close intercourse which subsisted between the churches of Asia and of Southern Gaul, commencing with the mission of Pothinus in the middle of the 2nd century. Its variations from the Roman standard attracted the notice of our St. Augustine at the end of the 6th century (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. 27), and held their ground for nearly two centuries later, when Pepin and Charlemagne gradually brought in the Roman missal. The Spanish or Mozarabic liturgy seems originally to have been the same as the Gallican, but in course of time considerable divergences arose between them. It had not to yield to the Roman Use before the end of the 11th century, and its memory was long cherished by reason of the proud national feeling of the Spanish clergy and people (Palmer, Origines Liturgicæ, sect. x.) In this Mozarabic Use from Easter to Pentecost, in the Gallican during Easter week, and in the Comes on the octave of Pentecost, the Apocalypse, which we have not yet met with, is read as a kind of third lesson, and before the Epistle. Again, in Greek lectionaries, portions taken from the Old Testament are of rare occurrence, as in Christ's College Evangelistarium, where passages from the Septuagint version (Isa. iii. 9-13; lii. 13-liv. 1; Jer. xi. 18-xii. 15; Zech. xi. 10-14) are included in the services for the Holy Week. In the Latin books, however, they are found to a far greater extent, nor ought any argument for a more modern date be drawn from their presence in the Comes. St. Ambrose expressly testifies that in his time the book of Jonah was read in the Holy Week, and the first chapter of that prophet is found in the Gallican and the Spanish, as well as in the Comes, as part of the course for Easter Even. The book of Job, on the other hand, is not met with there, although the language of Jerome as well as of Ambrose might lead us to expect it (Bingham, Antiquities, book xiv. ch. iii. 3). Reserving for a separate article [PROPHETS] much further notice of the lessons from the Old Testament (which were chiefly taken from Genesis, the Proverbs, and Isaiah), we subjoin the table of Western Epistles and Gospels for the Sundays and greater feasts throughout the year, according to the three most ancient authorities.

Sunday next before Advent	..	Jer. xxiii. 5-8 (for the Epistle) John vi. 5-14

The Roman service-books do not contain the lessons for the 26th Sunday after Pentecost, though, like the Comes, they appoint Jer. xxiii. 5-8 and John vi. 5-14 for the Sunday next before Advent. The Sarum missal adopts the modern method of reckoning by Sundays after Trinity, and even in the Comes the extra lesson from the Apocalypse, and perhaps the Gospel also, bear upon the mystery now commemorated on the octave of Pentecost. Thus in the Roman use, as in our modern books, the Sundays of the year provided with Epistles and Gospels are fifty-four, in the Comes fifty-five, since the service for the octave of Epiphany could be taken for the first Sunday after Epiphany, if six Sundays should intervene between Jan. 6 and Septuagesima. It also deserves notice that in the Ambrosian liturgy, which has not yet been displaced by the Roman in the province of Milan, as also in the Mozarabic use, there are six Sundays in Advent, which commences on the first Sunday after St. Martin's day (Nov. 11), not on the Sunday nearest to St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30), as in the rest.

X. Menologies, or Calendars of Saints' Days, with their proper Lessons.—The several schemes for ordering the Epistles and Gospels throughout the year, as adopted by the ancient church in its various branches, bear so little resemblance to each other that it seemed advisable to keep the Greek Synaxaria separate from the corresponding tables of the Coptic and Western communions. The menologies, on the other hand, wherein the lesser festivals and saints' day services are arranged according to their respective places in the ecclesiastical year, may very well be comprised in a single table. We select from the mass of such days those which have been widely celebrated or are in any other way characteristic or remarkable. The italic letters, c, g, m, r, s, will suffice to indicate what belongs to the Coptic, Gallican, Mozarabic, Roman (Comes), or Jerusalem Syriac books respectively. The lessons to which no such letter is annexed are of Greek origin, and we commence with the beginning of the Eastern ecclesiastical year, being Aug. 29 with the Copts, Sept. 1 with the Greeks. The variations noted (e.g. Sept. 2 infra) are those of Greek manuscripts adapted to church reading.

XI. Relation of Lectionaries to the Chapters-divisions of the New Testament.—Since lectionaries exhibit the text of the New Testament piece-meal, and in an order peculiar to themselves, the usual divisions into larger chapters (κεφάλαια), and, in the Gospels, into the so-called Ammonian sections, have no place in them. At the end of certain ordinary manuscripts of the Gospels, however, we find stated the number of lections (ἀναγνώσματα) which each contains, not without some variation in the several amounts. Wake 25 at Christ Church, and [5] II. A. 5 at Modena agree in reckoning the ἀναγνώσματα in St. Matthew at 116, in St. Mark at 71, in St. Luke at 114, in St. John at 67. Euthalius, bishop of Sulci, in the latter part of the 5th century, divided the Acts into 16 ἀναγνώσεις or ἀναγνώσματα, St. Paul's Epistles into 31; but these must have been long paragraphs, and can have had no connection with the much shorter lessons in the Praxapostolos which we have enumerated above.

LECTOR. [READER.]

LEGACY. [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH].

LEGATE. The words πρεσβευτής, legatus, legatarius (Bede, E. H. i. 29, etc.) are used in ecclesiastical documents for agents or emissaries of ecclesiastical authorities.

I. Various instances of the employment of legates or deputies.—Sometimes they were sent by councils. Two bishops, Epigonius and Vincentius, were sent by the 6th council of Carthage on an embassy to procure from the emperor the right of asylum for criminals in all churches. (Cod. Eccl. Afric. can. 56.) Legates were sent from the same council to the bishops of Rome and Milan (c. 56) and to the Donatists (c. 69). It is also probable that after the time of Constantine legates were sent from the great councils to announce their decisions to the emperor. (Vales. Annot. in Theodoret. H. E. iv. 8.) Legates were also sent to councils as the representatives of provinces. (Cod. Eccl. Afric., præfat. et cc. 90-96.) At the same council (c. 90) some of the bishops of Numidia explained that they were present as individuals, as a formal legation could not be sent on account of the troubles in the province [compare COUNCIL, I. 482]. Sometimes they were sent as representatives of individual bishops. Lucifer of Cagliari (for instance) sent his deacon to represent him (εἰς τὸν αὐτοῦ τόπον) at an Alexandrian synod, with power to accept its decrees on his behalf (Socrates, H. E. iii. 6). So at the council of Hertford, it is said that Wilfrid of Northumberland was present in the persons of his legates, “per proprios legatarios adfuit.” (Bede, H. E. iv. 5, p. 147; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 119.) They were also sent by bishops to transact their business with other sees. Such were the legates (πρεσβευτάς) sent by Flavian, bishop of Antioch to Rome, A.D. 381 (Theodoret. H. E. v. 23). Bede (H. E. i. 33, p. 74) speaks of a certain abbat Peter, who being sent as a legate to Gaul, was drowned on his passage at Arnfleet, and also (H. E. ii. 20, p. 102) of a bishop of Rochester, who was sent by Archbishop Justus as his legate to Honorius, bishop of Rome, and drowned in the Mediterranean.

II. Legates of the Roman See.—In the Roman empire, the officials through whom the emperor governed his provinces were called Legati [DICT. OF GREEK AND ROM. ANTIQ. s.v.] As the extent of the ecclesiastical dominion claimed by the Roman see was, from a comparatively early period, too wide to admit of the personal superintendence and administration of the pope, he appointed representatives (probably following the imperial precedent) to exercise some portion of his authority, in cases where he could neither be present himself, nor regulate the business in hand by letter. Such representatives, though we may include them all under the general term “Legates,” were known by various names, according to the office which they discharged. They were sometimes sent for a special occasion, as to represent the pope at a council. These were legati missi, sometimes said to be a latere. At the court of Constantinople, and sometimes elsewhere, the pope was always represented by a permanent official, called an Apocrisarius or Responsalis, corresponding nearly to the Nuncio of modern times. And again, when appeals to Rome became frequent, the pope constituted vicars apostolic in the most distant regions of his dominions; that is, he empowered a local prelate to decide such appeals in his name, reserving only the most important for the decision of the Roman see itself. Such a commission was at first given to a particular bishop personally; but when it had been conferred on several successive incumbents of the same see, it naturally came to be regarded as a privilege of that see. Legates of this kind were called in the Middle Ages Legati nati.

It is confessed that during the first three centuries of the church there are but faint traces of the exercise of papal authority through legates; though it is sometimes assumed that the three persons whom Clement sent to Corinth with his letter (Epist. ad Cor. c. 59), Claudius Ephebus, Valerius Bito, and Fortunatus, were not mere messengers, but plenipotentiaries of the apostolic see (Binterim, III. i. 166). With the accession of Constantine a new period begins in this respect for the church.

1. The term “de latere” is an ancient one, and seems to imply one from the household or familiar friends of the sender, with the implication that he carried with him, as it were, a portion of his principal's personality. So Leo I. (Epist. 67), speaking of his legate at Constantinople, asserts that the people of Constantinople possessed a certain portion of himself, "quandam mei portionem." The council of Sardica (c. 7) desired the bishop of Rome, in case of need, to send "presbyters from his own side" (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰδίου πλεuroῦ πρεσβυτέρους, de latere suo presbyteros) into the provinces in order to determine appeals from bishops who had been forced to abdicate by provincial councils [APPEAL, I. 127]. Legates of this kind were sent on various occasional missions. Thus Leo I. sent Julian of Cos to the emperor Marcian after the council of Chalcedon for the purpose of opposing the progress of the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies, and invested him for this particular duty with the full power of the papal see (Leo Mag. Epist. 113 [al. 56]), and in an epistle to Pulcheria states that he has constituted him his full representative that he might be a pledge and hostage of his own loyalty (Id. Epist. 112 [al. 58]). Sometimes the legates were to act in conjunction with the bishops of the province to which they were sent. So Leo I. sent Lucentius (a bishop) and Basilus (a priest) to Constantinople, joined in commission with Anatolius, then bishop, after the pseudo-synod of Ephesus, with power to receive into communion those who should repudiate their share in the council, the case of Dioscorus alone being reserved for the judgment of Rome (Leo I. Epist. 85 [al. 46]). Sometimes they were sent merely to inquire and report. So Leo I. sent Prudentius, a bishop, to Africa to ascertain the truth concerning certain alleged irregularities connected with the ordination of bishops. In this case he was to possess the authority of the papal see as far as inquiry went, but only to report to Rome the result of his inquiries (Leo I. Epist. 12 [al. 87]).

The great missionaries of early times, who have gone forth under the authority of the Roman see, are frequently spoken of as papal legates. Thus Augustine of Canterbury, who was sent by pope Gregory the Great, is sometimes spoken of as his legate, though it does not appear that when he became archbishop of the English greater powers were conferred on him than on other archbishops who received the pall from Rome (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 6). Of Boniface, the great apostle of Germany, Hincmar says (Epist. 30, c. 20, p. 201) that popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. constituted him "legatum Apostolicæ sedis," for the reformation of the Christian religion in the parts where he laboured. His commission, which was a peculiar one, empowered him to ordain presbyters and afterwards bishops, without assigning him any particular see. It was not until the year 751 that pope Zacharias, the successor of Gregory III., made him bishop of Mentz and metropolitan of Germany and part of Gaul (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 1-5).

The COUNCILS of the church have from the first afforded a field from the claims of papal legates. At Nicaea the representatives of the Roman see were the two presbyters, Victor [or Vitus] and Vincentius, who would have accompanied the pope, if he had been able to make the long journey from Rome to Bithynia. Who were the presidents in this famous assembly has been matter of endless dispute. Eusebius (Vita Const. iii. 13) simply says that the emperor, after his opening speech, gave place to the presidents of the assembly (παρεδίδου τὸν λόγον τοῖς τῆς συνόδου προέδροις): but who were these? Athanasius (Apol. de Fuga, c. 5, quoted by Theodoret, E. H. ii. 15) speaks of the venerable Hosius as a man who, from his weight of character, of course took a leading part in any synod where he was present (πολλὰ γὰρ οὐχ ἡγήσατο συνόδου); but he gives no hint that he derived any precedence from papal delegation. There can, in fact, be little doubt that Hosius and Eusebius of Caesarea were the real presidents at Nicaea, and that mainly through the favour of the emperor. Gelasius of Cyzicus (Labbe, ii. 155), writing towards the end of the fifth century, is the first to assert that Hosius appeared at Nicaea as a delegate of Rome, and the same authority (ib. 267), in the confessedly imperfect list of subscriptions, makes Hosius sign first, followed by the Roman presbyters Victor (or Vito) and Vincentius. Perhaps Gelasius, who was evidently a wholly uncritical reporter, has transferred to Nicaea the practice of his own age. For by the fifth century it had become a common practice for the popes to send representatives to councils.

In what capacity Hosius presided at the Council of Sardica has been much discussed; it seems probable that he owed his pre-eminence rather to his personal merits and the favour of the emperor than to any appointment of the see of Rome.

The African bishops in council at Carthage, A.D. 419, protested against the presence of the legates from Rome, declaring that sanction for sending such legates could be found in none of the councils, and entreating him to withdraw them for the sake of peace (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 138; Bruns, Canones, i. 200). The legates, however, Faustinus, bishop of Potentia, and two presbyters named Philippus and Asellus, were received at the council, the place of Faustinus being second to Aurelius the president, in conjunction with Valentinus, bishop of Numidia. (Cod. Eccl. Afric. Praefat., in Bruns, Canones, i. 156.)

In the council of Constantinople of the year 381, neither Damasus of Rome nor any other Western prelate took any share, either personally or by legate.

Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, was locumtenens or legate of Rome in the Nestorian controversy; "vicem nostram propter marina et terrena spatia ipsi sancto fratri meo Cyrillo delegavimus," says Celestinus in the document by which he professes to excommunicate Nestorius (Labbe, iii. 373). To the council of Ephesus the pope had sent two bishops, Arcadius and Projectus, and a presbyter, Philip, with instructions to regulate their conduct by the advice of Cyril, but in all things to uphold the authority of the see of Rome. They were not to press their attendance upon the assembly; when they were present, they were to take notes of what passed, without joining in the debates; at the close of the council, they were to report to the pope himself, and afterwards accompany Cyril to Constantinople, to lay the conclusions of the Fathers before the emperor (Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, i. 335). Great pains were taken on this occasion to make the vindication of orthodoxy at Ephesus appear the work of the pope, acting through Cyril and the legates; their instructions were read in the council and recorded in its minutes; the legate Philip then declared its proceedings to have been in conformity with them, and in the name of the see of Rome pronounced the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius, "according to the formula which the holy pope Celestinus had committed to his care." Arcadius and Projectus signified their assent. Cyril then caused the papal ratification to be recorded in the terms in which it had been conveyed to them (Greenwood, p. 339 f.).

These may suffice as instances of the employment of legates to represent the Roman see in the great councils. One or two examples may be given of legates sent from Rome to England, as having a special interest of their own.

At the council of Hatfield (A.D. 680) John the Roman precentor was present, having come from Rome under the guidance of the English Benedict Biscop, to introduce the Roman manner of saying the offices in his new monastery at Wearmouth. It is said of him that he joined with the rest in confirming the decrees of the Catholic faith (pariter Catholicae fidei decreta firmabat), i.e. in receiving the decrees of the first five general councils, and declaring the orthodoxy of the English church in respect of the Monothelites; but nothing is said of any precedence granted to him; the council was summoned by command of the English kings, and presided over by the English archbishop Theodore (Bede, H. E. iv. 17, 18; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141 ff.).

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ad an. 785) relates that in that year there was a contentious synod at Calcyth [probably Chelsea], and also that in that year messengers were sent from Rome by pope Adrian to England, to renew the faith and the peace which St. Gregory had sent us by Augustine the bishop, and they were worshipfully received. The head of this legation was George, bishop of Ostia. These legates, in fact, were present at two councils, one in the north and one in the south of England, probably at Finchale and Chelsea respectively, but as to the extent of the authority they claimed we know nothing, except that they made application to the Mercian and Northumbrian kings respectively for the assembling of the councils. Their names do not appear among the subscriptions (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 443-461).

The bearers of the letters sent by pope John IV. (A.D. 640) to the Irish bishops and abbats about the Pelagian heresy were in some sort legates, as two of them at least—Hilary, the arch-priester, and John, the primicerius—are described as vicegerents of the apostolic see (servans locum sanctae sedis apostolicae). (Bede, H. E. ii. 19, p. 100.)

And it may be observed generally that in the earlier ages of the church papal legates in councils by no means took the position which a later age assigned to them, after Gregory VII.'s vigorous assertion of the privileges of his see. Thus the legate Faustinus, at the council of Carthage, took his place below the bishop of that see, Aurelius; Eusebius of Vercelli, legate as he was, yielded precedence at Alexandria to Athanasius. At CHALCEDON [I. 334] the lay dignitaries occupied the place of honour, and controlled the proceedings of the council throughout; on their left were the Roman legates, on their right Dioscorus of Alexandria and Juvenal of Jerusalem. Julianus, who was rather a legate to the emperor than to the council, took his place after the first twenty bishops. Cyril took the first place among the bishops in the third general council at Ephesus, but this precedence was probably due as much to his rank as patriarch of Alexandria, as to the fact that on this occasion he was vicegerent of the pope [EPHESUS, I. 615]. Moreover, legates did not (in the period with which we are concerned) attempt to set themselves above the sovereign power, but addressed themselves to kings and emperors respecting the summoning of councils and other ecclesiastical business. As the claims of papal legates simply represent the claims of the papacy, the further account of them must be referred to the article POPE.

2. The Apocrisarii or Responsales were so called, as being the persons through whom the Responsa or judgments of their principal were communicated to the court to which they were accredited. Hincmar says that Apocrisarii were instituted when Constantine removed the seat of empire from Rome to Byzantium, from which time agents (responsales) both of Rome and of other chief sees were maintained at the imperial court; a statement probable in itself, though the authority is late. Hosius, bishop of Cordova, certainly acted as a kind of ecclesiastical minister at the court of Constantine, but there is no evidence whatever that he represented the see of Rome there, or that he held any definite office under Constantine (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 112, 3rd edition). Petrus de Marca (De Concord. Sacerd. et Imp. v. 16) places the formal institution of Apocrisarii at a later date. Referring to the letter of Leo the Great to Julianus, bishop of Cos (Epist. 86), in which the pope gives him a general commission to act on behalf of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople in the repression of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, he says, "this gave occasion to the sending of agents or apocrisarii (responsales) of the apostolic see to the capital city, especially after the time of Justinian; . . . for at that time there were constantly in the court disconi responsales, who both took charge before the emperor of cases in which the Roman church was peculiarly interested, and kept watch over matters of faith and discipline. At the same time they were as it were hostages of the public faith, guaranteeing the obedience due to princes."

Several legates of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople are known to history. Thus Liberatus records (Breviarium, c. 22) that pope Agapetus made the deacon Pelagius his apocrisary at the imperial court; and Gregory the Great relates that he himself, when a deacon, acted as apocrisary of Pelagius II. with the emperor, using the expression, "tempore quo exhibendis responsis ad Principem ipse transmissus sum" (Dialogus, iii. 23). Justinian (Novel. 6, c. 2; 123, c. 25) desires bishops not to come in person to court, but to transact their business there by the agency of apocrisarii.

After the 6th Oecumenical Council we find Constantine Pogonatus writing to Leo II. to send him an apocrisary, who in all ecclesiastical matters should not only represent his person but actually possess his power, "in emergentibus sive dogmaticis sive canonicis et prorsus in omnibus ecclesiasticis negotiis vestrae sanctitatis exprimat ac gerat personam." (Conc. vi. Act. 18, Labbe.) Leo in consequence sent the subdeacon Constantine, who had been one of his legates at the council, and requested the emperor to receive him as his minister, "ut ministerium digne suscipiat." Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 108, §§ 27, 28) thinks that this was an evasion of the request to send a legate with full powers, lest he should be induced by the power of the emperor to commit himself to acts for which the papal see would be responsible.

3. The popes of Rome have frequently granted special privileges, such as may be called legatine or vicarial, to certain distinguished sees. The first of these was that of Thessalonica. In the year 379 the great prefecture of Illyricum Orientale was assigned to the Eastern emperor. But the see of Rome had probably for a long time claimed patriarchal authority over this division of the empire, and Damasus, the then pope, was unwilling to allow a mere political severance to affect his spiritual authority, and therefore appointed Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica, metropolitan of that prefecture, his representative or vicar for the diocese of Illyricum Orientale (Greenwood, Cathed. Pet. i. 259). From the scantiness of our information as to this transaction we know little or nothing of the exact nature of the powers conferred on this legate. Leo the Great (Epist. ad Anitium Thess.) confirms to the archbishop of Thessalonica powers over Illyricum which (he says) had been conferred under his predecessors Damasus, Siricius, and Anastasius. See the Responsio Pii VI. ad Metropolitanos Mogunt. etc. super Nuntiaturis Apost. Romae 1790. Vicarial or legatine powers were also conferred on the see of Arles, the "Gallican Rome." Thus Zosimus (A.D. 418) made Patroclus, bishop of Arles, his vicegerent; Hilary gave the same office to Leontius; Gelasius I. to Aeonius; Symmachus to Caesarius; Vigilius to Auxonius; and at length, the same privilege having been continued to a series of bishops, it was definitely granted and assigned to the see of Arles (Gregorii Epist. iv. 50, 52, 54). See also Gregory's seventh response to Augustine of Canterbury, in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 22. And the same thing took place also with regard to other sees.

(Petrus de Marca, de Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. v.; Böhmer, Jus Ecclesiasticum, lib. iii., tit. 37, c. 36; Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum; Thomassin, Nova et Vet. Eccl. Discipl.; Walther, Kirchenrecht; Jacobson in Herzog, Real-Encyclop., s. v. Legaten.) [P. O. and C.]

LEGATION (Legatio, πρεσβεία). A body of legates entrusted with any commission, e.g. Soc. H. E. iv. 12; Soz. H. B. vi. 11. When the legates were not a mere deputation, but had full power to act on their own authority, it was called a free legation, "legatio libera" (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 94, 97; see Ducange, Gloss.). The commission given to the legates was called a letter of legation, "litterae legationis." At the 6th council of Carthage the various legates presented their credentials, which were read to the council, "offerentibus legationis literis et recitatis" (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 90). Sometimes it appears to have been used for the duty entrusted to a legate. Thus Leo I. (Epist. 26) speaks of a commission given to the empress Pulcheria to procure the summoning of a fresh council after the Pseudo-Synod of Ephesus as a legation, hâc sibi specialiter a beatissimo Petro Apostolo legatione commissâ. But the word for the most part is convertible with LEGATE.

[P. O.]

LEGENDA. This word properly denotes whatever is appointed to be read to the congregation during public worship. It has however acquired the restricted sense of the records of the lives and acts of the saints and martyrs, which were appointed to be thus read. Collections of these records date from the 2nd century, and were known as Acta (i.e. the registers containing the official records), Sanctorum, or Acta Martyrum. They contained the most important sayings and deeds of the saints, both martyrs and confessors. The earliest reputed compiler of the acts of martyrs is St. Clement of Rome, who is said to have employed scribes "notarios," to collect the acts of martyrs throughout the different districts of the city. The practice appears to have spread into the African church. St. Cyprian (Ep. 37, ad Clerum) writes: "Denique et dies eorum quibus excedunt, annotate, ut commemorationes eorum inter memorias Martyrum celebrare possimus."

Eusebius also (Hist. v. 4) speaks of such a collection, "Whoever cares to do so, may easily obtain the fullest information on this subject by reading the epistle itself," which, as I have already said, I have inserted in the collection of the Acts of Martyrs [τῇ τῶν μαρτυρίων συναγωγῇ]. He gives at length the account of the martyrdom of Polycarp and his companions (iv. 15. See also vii. 41-42).

Hence Eusebius has been often looked upon as the first to compile a martyrology. St. Jerome made a compendium of the acts as compiled by Eusebius.

Any further question as to the growth of martyrologies belongs more properly to another place [MARTYROLOGY]. It is sufficient here to point out their origin and antiquity.

In the persecution of Diocletian many authentic records of this nature perished, in consequence of a general edict to burn them (Gregor. Turon. de Gloria Martyr.). Gelasius (A.D. 492) rejected as spurious writings of this nature then in circulation, and forbade them to be read in churches.

The third council of Carthage (A.D. 397), Can. 47, after ruling that besides the canonical scriptures nothing should be read publicly in the church under the name of Holy Scripture, adds that the passions of the martyrs may be read on their anniversaries. "Liceat etiam legi passiones martyrum, quum anniversarii eorum dies celebrantur." And it appears from various sermons of St. Augustine (Ser. xlvii. de Sanctis, &c.) that the practice was general in his day. Cassiodorus, in the 6th century, writing to certain abbats says (Instit. div. Lect. c. 32), "Passiones martyrum legitæ constanter."

The practice was to read the "acts" of those saints and martyrs who were to be commemorated in the liturgy on the day following, in order that the faithful might join in the commemoration with memories refreshed. When the daily services were reduced to order, the martyrology was appointed to be read in choir, at the end of Prime, after the Orison (Oratio) which is followed by the usual "Benedicamus Domino," R. Deo gratias; the lection which contains the memorials of the saints for the next day being read. The lection is followed by the Verse and Response. V. Pretiosa in conspectu Domini. R. Mors sanctorum ejus; and a few prayers.

* I.e. from the martyrs of Lyons to Eleutherus.

From a MS. appendix to the Roman Responsorial and Antiphony, which is considered to be of the 9th century, it appears that the passion and acts of a saint were only read in the churches dedicated to that saint (ubi ipsius titulus erat) until the time of pope Adrian I. A.D. 772.

This reading of the martyrology with the prayers which follow it is usually considered a distinct office from Prime, and known as officium capitulare. In many churches it was said in a different place. Thus in the old statutes of the church of Paris: "Thence (i.e. from the choir after Prime) they go into the chapter house, [or possibly another chapel in the church], where, after the reading of the acts of the saints, and the diptychs of the deceased, let prayers be made for their repose." [Inde in capitulum^b progrediuntur, ubi gestis sanctorum et diptychis defunctorum perfectis, fiant preces pro eorum requiem.] Again in the rite of Avranches: "Prime ended, let the brothers assemble in the chapter house, and let the lection of the Martyrology be read, lest any festival of a saint which should be celebrated on the morrow be omitted through inadvertence." [Primâ finitâ, in capitulum convenient fratres, Martyrologii lectio legatur; ne aliqua sancti festività in crastino celebranda negligenter omittatur.] So also the old ritual of St. Martin at Tours. Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, A.D. 742, introduced the practice into his chapter among his reforms. On the other hand the martyrology was often read in choir, not in chapter. This was directed by the old ordinarium of Senlis, which, after directions for the office of Prime, proceeds: "After the aforesaid orison the calendar^c (calenda) is read by one of the boys, and terminates thus: and of all the many other holy martyrs and confessors and virgins. Then the anniversary which is contained in the Martyrology is announced." So also the ordinarium of the Cathedral of Tours. "Then follows the lection from the martyrology, read in choir with a sufficiently loud voice A boy says 'Jube, Domine, benedicere.' The priest gives the benediction,^d and after the reading of the lection is to say "Pretiosa in conspectu," &c. After this a boy is to announce the anniversary which is to be celebrated on the following day. The reading of the Martyrology in chapter appears to have been limited to the more important monastic houses and colleges of canons, and usually in connexion with the reading of the rule of the house, which by the council of Aix la Chapelle (A.D. 817) was directed to be bound in one volume with the martyrology. The custom gradually died out (it had ceased at St. Martin's at Tours in the 15th century); and in the printed breviaries, monastic as well as secular, the officium capitulare is printed so as to form part of Prime without any break.

In a decree of the Congregation of Rites (10 Jun. 1690. Meratus in Ind. Decr. Brev. 163) we find the following ruling:—

"After what has been said, the hour of Prime is terminated when 'Benedicamus Domino' is said, and what follows is only a sort of appendix; whence it appears, that in the same manner as the church here inserts daily the reading of the Martyrology, and Prime of the Blessed Virgin, when this is to be said, so anything else may be inserted; though we do not recommend that this should be done, because what is now supplemented is considered to complete Prime as it were [Primam veluti integrare],^e or to be an additional part of it."

In addition to the readings at Prime, on festivals with three nocturns, the lessons of the second nocturn are as a rule taken from the acts of the saint of the day.

The custom of reading at nocturns such acts as were worthy of credit is thought to have grown up in the 8th century; that of reading them in the liturgy much earlier, as has been already stated. They were read before the epistle and briefly recapitulated in the preface. In the course of the liturgy, the bishop ascended the chair (cathedram conscendente) and gave an explanation of them, which was the origin of the sermons of the Fathers in honour of the martyrs (see, inter alia, S. August. Sermo 2, de S. Steph.). This custom was kept up in France till the 9th century, and in Spain till beyond the 10th; and the acts were inserted in the sacramentaries and missals of both countries.^f They were never inserted in the Roman, as appears from the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries and missals, which make but spare and cautious mention of the martyrs and their sufferings in the preface alone.

Among Latin martyrologies, those compiled by Bede, and by the Benedictine monk Usuardus, in the 9th century, may be mentioned.

The Greek equivalent to the martyrology is the menology (μηνολόγιον), so called because its contents are arranged according to months. The lection for the day is called the "synaxarion" (συναξαριον), and is inserted at full length in the menaeae (which contains the variable parts of the office, and so in some measure correspond to the proprium Sanctorum of the Latin breviaries) after the sixth ode of the canon for the day said at Lauds. It is introduced by its proper stichos, nearly always two iambic lines, containing some allusion to the saint or play upon his name, followed by a hexameter line, of the nature of a "memoria technica" of the date.^a There is usually more than one synaxarion to a day, each in commemoration of a different saint; in which case, with few exceptions, each has its own iambic stichos; but the first alone the hexameter line. Other saints of the day are commemorated by the simple reciting of their names and death, stating usually its manner, followed by a stichos, but with no synaxarion. These readings and commemorations are concluded with the clause—"By their holy intercessions, O God, have mercy upon us. Amen" (ταῖς αὐτῶν ἀγλαῖς προσβείαις, ὁ θεὸς, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. Ἀμήν).^b There are great variations in different menologies. The emperor Basil the Macedonian directed one to be compiled, A.D. 886, which may be taken as a type of others.

LEGER, ST. [LEODEGARIUS.]

LENEY, COUNCIL OF (Leniense Concilium), held at Loney in Ireland, A.D. 630, or thereabouts, respecting Easter, which was kept differently then in Scotland and Ireland from what it was in Rome. In other words, if the fourteenth day of the moon fell on a Sunday, it was kept on that Sunday, and not the following. St. Fintan here prevailed with his countrymen in favour of the old rule; but it was unfair of contemporaries to call them 'Quartodecimans' on that account. (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. c. 17; comp. Mansi, x. 611.)

[E. S. Ff.]

LENT (τεσσαρακοστή, Quadragesima). The English name is derived from the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, spring; with which may be compared the German Lenz, and the Dutch Lente. The titles for this season in languages of Latin derivation are merely corruptions of the name Quadragesima, as the French Carême, Italian Quaresima, etc. So also in the Celtic languages, as the Welsh Garawys, Manx Kargys, Breton Corayz, etc. In Teutonic and allied languages, the name for the season merely indicates the fast, as the German Fastenzeit, Dutch Vaste, etc. So also in the Calendar of the Greek church it is ἡ νήστεια).

1. History of the observance.—We can trace up to very early times the existence of a preparatory fast to Easter, for it is mentioned definitely by Irenaeus and Tertullian. While, however, the fast seems to have been one universally kept, there seems to have been very great latitude as to the duration of the fast. Thus Irenaeus writing to Victor, bishop of Rome, and referring to the disputes as to the time of keeping Easter, adds that there is the same dispute as to the length of the preliminary fast. "For," he says, "some think they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, and others even for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their day" (οἱ δὲ τεσσαράκοντα ὥρας ἡμερινὰς τε καὶ νυκτερινὰς συμμετροῦσι τὴν ἡμέραν αὐτῶν). Irenaeus then goes on to say that this variety is not merely a thing of his own time, but of much older date (πολὺ πρότερον); an important statement, as carrying back the existence of the fast practically up to apostolic times (Irenaeus, Ep. ad Vict.; apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24).

Before, however, we pass on to consider the references in Tertullian, it must be noted that much discussion has arisen as to the punctuation of the above passage; for the translation of Rufinus puts a full stop after τεσσαράκοντα, a plan which is adopted by some, as by Stieren and Harvey, the most recent editors of Irenaeus. We must remark, however, that not only are the MSS. said to be unanimous in giving the first-mentioned reading, but as Valesius (not. in loc.) justly points out, the general run of the Greek is palpably in favour of the same way.^b (For a defence of the opposite theory, see Massuet, Diss. in Iren. ii. 23.)

We pass on next to consider the evidence furnished by Tertullian, who in one place speaks of the fast "die Paschae," as "communis et quasi publica jejunii religio" (De Orat. c. 18). This, of course, would be a fast on Good Friday. That the fast, however, was not confined to this day only, we learn from another place, where writing as a Montanist he says of the Catholics that they considered that the only fasts which Christians should observe were those "in which the bridegroom was taken away from them" (De Jejunio, c. 2; cf. also c. 13, where he draws a distinction between the obligation of the fast of the above-mentioned days and other fasts, especially the Stations, so called). Here then we have a fast for the period during which our Saviour was under the power of death.

Thus far it would appear that there was in any case a fast, whether on the day of our Lord's death, or for the above longer period; but in some cases extra days were added, varying in different churches. At a later period the same kind of variation prevailed, as we find, e.g. from Socrates and Sozomen. Thus the former (Hist. Eccles. v. 22) speaks of those in Rome as fasting for three

^a For ἡμέραν, Valesius (not. in loc.) conjectured that νηστείαν should be read, on account of the difficulty of understanding the expression "day," as applied in any sense to a period of 40 hours. There is, however, no MS. authority for this, and it cuts the knot of the difficulty rather than solves it.

^b Thus a climax seems indicated in the καὶ οἱ δὲ καὶ πλείονας, and we should look for some connecting particle with the ὥρας. The Latin of Rufinus is "nonnulli etiam quadragesima, ita ut horas diurnas . . .": the etc has a decidedly suspicious appearance after the termination of the preceding word. Moreover, the fact introduced by ita ut, as to the fast being observed during the hours both of day and night, is simply inexplicable when taken in connexion with the preceding "nonnulli etiam quadragesima."

^c The following, for St. Polycarp (Feb. 23), may serve as a specimen:

Στίχοι. σοὶ Πολύκαρπος ὠλοκαυτῶθι Λόγε, καρπὸν πολλὸν δοὺς ἐκ πυρὸς ξενोटρώσι.

εἰκάδι ἐν τριτάτῃ κατὰ φλόξ Πολύκαρπον ἔκαυσεν.

^h This is the usual form of words and the invariable purport of the clause. Sometimes it runs "By the prayers of thy martyrs, O Lord Christ, have mercy upon us and save us. Amen" (ταῖς τῶν σῶν μαρτύρων εὐχαῖς, Χριστὲ ὁ Θεός, ἐλέησον καὶ σώσον. Ἀμήν).

weeks before Easter, except on Saturdays and Sundays.^c In Illyria, through all Greece, and in Alexandria [those of Illyria, the West (οἱ πρὸς δύσιν), throughout all Libya, in Egypt and Palestine (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 19)], a fast of six weeks' duration was observed. Others again continued it for seven weeks: these are spoken of vaguely by Socrates as ἄλλοι, and more specifically by Sozomen as those of Constantinople, and the countries round about as far as Phoenicia.^d Socrates, however, states that these, while beginning the fast seven weeks before Easter, only fasted for fifteen days by intervals (τρεῖς μὲν πενθήμερους ἐκ διαληγμάτων); and Sozomen speaks of some who fasted three weeks by intervals (σποράδην) out of the six or seven weeks. Lastly, some fasted for two weeks, as the Monitans did.

Gregory the Great (Hom. in Evang. i. 16. 5; vol. i. 1494, ed. Bened.) speaks of the fast as of thirty-six days' duration, that is to say, of six weeks, not counting in the six Sundays. It will have been noticed above that Sozomen speaks of six weeks as the period observed by the Westerns, whereas it lasted through seven weeks in Constantinople and the East. Now in the East, Saturday as well as Sunday partook of a festal character,^e and thus the number of actual fasting days would be in either case thirty-six. Of course those Eastern churches which only took six weeks would have but thirty-one days' fast. [The Saturday which was Easter Eve was of course in all cases excepted from the general rule of Saturdays.] In any case thirty-six was the maximum number of days' fast^f (cf. Cassian, Collat. xxi. 24, 25; Patrol. xlix. 1200).

By whom the remaining four days were added, that is Ash-Wednesday and the three days following it, does not clearly appear. Gregory the Great (ob. A.D. 604) has often been credited with it (see e.g. the Micrologus, c. 49; Patrol. cli. 1013), but his remark which we have referred to above seems conclusive against this. The evidence also derivable from the Gregorian sacramentary, into which we must enter in detail when we come to speak of the liturgical part of our subject, points the same way. Thus the headings for these first four days never include the term Quadragesima, which occurs for the first time on the Sunday; and there seems ground for omitting the words caput jejunii in the heading to Ash-Wednesday. Martene (De Ant. Eccles. Rit. iii. 58, ed. Venice, 1783) shews that even after the time of Gregory the Great, the four additional days cannot for some time have been observed, at any rate at all universally, for the Regula Magistri, a writing apparently of the 7th century, orders that from Sexagesima the monks should fast till the evening on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, but that on other days up to Quadragesima they should take their meal at the ninth hour. Thus by the addition of these six days, the diminution caused in Lent by the taking out of the six Sundays was exactly counterbalanced (c. 28, Patrol. lxxxviii. 997). Clearly, therefore, this writer can in no way have viewed Lent as definitely beginning with Ash-Wednesday, and indeed the following day is not reckoned as part of the fast at all. On the other hand, the addition is certainly not to be fixed later than the time of Charlemagne, for (Martene, l. c.) the title "feria quarta in capite jejunii" occurs in MSS. of sacramentaries of and perhaps before his time. Similar evidence is furnished by the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, in the latter part of the 8th century (c. 30, Patrol. lxxxix. 1071), and apparently in the Penitential of Egbert, archbishop of York from A.D. 732 to 766 (l. i. 37, Patrol. lxxxix. 410).

Others have referred the addition to Gregory II. (ob. A.D. 731), but the matter seems quite doubtful.^g It may be remarked here in connexion with this latter prelate, that the Micrologus (c. 50, supra) states that it was he who first required the Thursdays throughout Lent to be kept as fasts, contrary to the ancient Roman usage. It is to Melchisedes that the appointment of Thursdays as exceptions to the law of fasting in Lent is referred. This, however, is very doubtful, when viewed in connexion with the words of Gregory the Great already quoted.

Considering the diversity which we have found to prevail as to the duration of Lent, it is curious to see how persistently the word τεσσαρακοστή is adhered to, a point which puzzled Socrates (l. c.) in the 5th century. Although the origin of this name is by no means clear, there are at any rate some reasonable grounds for connecting it with the period during which our Lord yielded to the power of death, which was estimated at forty hours [e.g. from noon on Friday till 4 A.M. on Sunday]; and we have seen that Tertullian twice refers to the fast as continuing for the days "in quibus ablatus est sponsus." We must also not lose sight of the forty days' fasts of Moses, Elijah, and our Lord, as being especially suggestive of the number of forty. It will have been noticed that when the duration of the fast was considerably lengthened, in the majority of cases the number of days of actual fasting was still approximately forty.

2. Object and purport of Lent.—We may inquire in the next place what was the primary idea in the institution of such a fast, and what other reasons were subversive in the maintenance of it.

(a) From a passage of Tertullian already cited (de Jejuniis, c. 13) it is clear that the fast primarily lasted for the time during which our Lord was under the power of death, to mark the mourning of the church when the bridegroom

^c There is some difficulty here in the remark as to the Roman fast not holding on the Saturday. See Valesius's not. in loc.

^d In illustration of the longer period of the fast observed in the East, we may refer to the case mentioned by Photius (Biblioth. 107; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 377).

^e For an illustration of this, see e.g. Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Gen. 2; vol. iv. 101, ed. Gaume), who speaks of the relaxation afforded in Lent by the cessation of the fast on Saturday and Sunday. As regards the West an exception must be made in the case of Milan, where Saturday was viewed as in the East (see Ambrose, de Elia et jejuniis, infra), also for Gaul (see Aurelian, infra).

^f We may refer here to the notion that, since thirty-six days was one-tenth of the year, therefore in Lent was fulfilled the Mosaic precept of paying tithes (Cassian, l. c.).

^g It is clear that in some parts the additional four days cannot have been accepted for a long time, for Martene (p. 59) speaks of the end of the 11th century as the period when they were recognised in Scotland.

was taken away. Of this mourning then, Lent is the perpetual commemoration. It is interesting to note here that the Montanists who observed three Lents in the course of the year (Jerome, Epist. 41, ad Marcellam, § 3; vol. i. 189, ed. Vallarsi), and kept one of them after Pentecost (Jerome, Comm. in Matt. ix. 15; vol. vii. 51), still agreed with the Catholics in viewing it as the mourning for the absent bridegroom, in accordance with our Lord's declaration.

(β) This primary reason having been fixed, we need not dwell on that reason for its maintenance drawn from its use as a means of quickening zeal, and as an aid to devotion generally, since this is applicable to any fast and has no exclusive reference to Lent. This particular fast, however, served as a special preparation for several important events directly connected with Easter. Chief among these was the Easter communion, which, even in the earlier days of the church, when Christians ordinarily communicated every Sunday, must have had an exceptional prominence; much more in later times when this frequency of communion had greatly diminished, and we find for example canons of councils ordering that all Christians should communicate at least three times a year, of which Easter should be one. (See e.g. Concil. Agathense [A.D. 506], cann. 63, 64; Labbe, iv. 1393.) This idea is dwelt upon by Chrysostom (in eos qui primo pascha jejuniunt, § 4; vol. i. 746, ed. Gaume; also Hom. i, § 4, vol. iv. 10), and by Jerome (Comm. in Jonam, iii. 4; vol. vi. 416).

(γ) Easter again was the special time for the administration of baptism, which was necessarily preceded by a solemn preparation and fasting. The importance of the Lent fast to those about to be baptized is dwelt upon by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. i. 5; p. 18, ed. Touttée). The names of those who sought baptism had to be given in some time before (ὀνομαστογραφία, Pro-catech. c. 1, p. 2; cf. c. 4, p. 4). A council of Carthage ordains that this shall be done a long time (diu) before the baptism (Conc. Carth. iv. [A.D. 398] can. 85; Labbe, ii. 1206), but a canon of Siricius, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 399) defines the time as not less than forty days (Ep. i. ad Himerium, c. 2; Labbe, ii. 1018).

(δ) Lent was also a special time of preparation for penitents who looked forward to readmission for the following Easter. (See Cyprian, Epist. 56, § 3; Ambrose, Epist. 20 ad Marcellinam sororem, c. 26; Patrol. xvi. 1044; Jerome, Comm. in Jonam, l.c.: Greg. Nyss. Epist. Cuvon. ad Letoium, Patrol. Gr. xiv. 222; Petr. Alexandr. can. 1, Labbe, i. 955; Concil. Ancyranum [A.D. 314], can. 6, ib. 1457.)

3. Manner of observance of Lent.—The special characteristics of Lent consisted in various forms of abstinence from food, the cessation of various ordinary forms of rejoicings, the merciful interference with legal pains and penalties, and the like.

(a) First of all must be noted the actual fast, which was generally a total abstinence from all food till the evening, except on Sundays, and in some cases on Saturdays. (Ambrose, de Elia et Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. xiv. 743; Serm. 8 in Psal. 118; Patrol. xv. 1383; Basil, Hom. i. de Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. Gr. xxxi. 181; Chrysostom, Hom. iv. in Gen. c. 7, vol. iv. 36; Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 58; Hom. viii. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 76.)

As to the particular kinds of food made use of when the fast was broken for the day, there would appear to have been in early times the utmost latitude. This may be gathered, for example, from the passage of Socrates already quoted (Hist. Eccles. v. 22). "Now we may notice," he says, "that men differ not only with respect to the number of the days, but also in the character of the abstinence from food, which they practise. For some abstain altogether from animal food, while others partake of no animal food but fish only. Others again eat of birds as well as fishes, saying that according to Moses they also were produced from water. Others abstain also from fruits (ἀκρόδρυα) and eggs, while some partake only of dry bread, and others not even of that. Another sort fast till the ninth hour, and then have their meal of various sorts of food" (διαφορὸν ἔχουσι τὴν ἑστίασιν).^b He then goes on to argue that since no rule of Scripture can be produced for this observance, therefore the apostles left the decision of the matter to every man's judgment. It will thus be seen that though the fast was to be kept throughout the day, there was as yet an absence of any restriction as to the character of the food taken in the evening; it being, of course, assumed that great moderation was shewn, and that luxuries were avoided, in fact that the fast was not to be a technical matter of abstaining from this or that food, merely to enjoy a greater luxury of a different kind. The abstaining from flesh as any absolute and fundamental rule of the church was not yet insisted on, but still remained to some extent a matter of private judgment. An example, which illustrates a transitional state of things, is found in the incident related by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. i. 11) of Spyridon, bishop of Trimythus, in Cyprus. He, when once visited by a stranger at the beginning of Lent, offered him some swine's flesh, which was the only food he had in the house. The latter refused to partake of it, saying that he was a Christian. "All the more therefore," said the bishop, "should it not be refused, for that all things are pure to the pure is declared by the word of God." Bingham (Orig. xxi. 1. 17), who cites the above instance, has strangely omitted to add that before acting thus, the bishop besought the Divine indulgence (εὐξάμενος καὶ συγγνώμην αἰτήσας), as though he were straining a point in doing as he did, though, on the other hand, such straining had not yet become a violation of a universally recognised law. We find a somewhat parallel illustration in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), where a certain Christian prisoner named Alcibiades, who had lived on bread and water all his life, received a divine monition through Attalus, one of his fellow prisoners, that he did not well in thus refusing the good gifts of God.

On the other hand, we continually find protests being made against the conduct of those who, so long as the technical rules were observed, thought themselves at liberty to indulge in every luxury, instead of devoting the money saved by the fast to the relief of the poor.¹ (Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2, vol. v. 1337, ed. Gaume; Serm. 207, § 2, ib. 1341; Serm. 210, § 10, ib. 1353; Leo, Serm. 3, de Jejunio Pentecostes, vol. i. 319, ed. Ballerini.)

The same kind of reaction of feeling manifested itself in the indulging in special enjoyments in the days before the fast, and of this the carnival may serve as an illustration.²

It is not, however, to be supposed from all this, that there is an absence of positive enactments on the subject.¹ Thus one of the so-called apostolical canons orders that all clerics shall fast in Lent under penalty of deposition, unless they can plead bodily infirmity; a layman to be excommunicated (can. 69). The fourth council of Orleans (A.D. 541) also enjoins the observance of Lent, adding a rule that the Saturdays are to be included in the fast. (Concil. Aurel. iv. can. 2; Labbe, v. 382; cf. Concil. Toletanum viii. [A.D. 653], can. 9; Labbe, vi. 407.) It may be noted that Aurelian, bishop of Arles (app. A.D. 545) in laying down the rule for monks, orders that the fast shall be observed every day from Epiphany to Easter, save upon Saturdays and Sundays and greater festivals (Patrol. lxxviii. 396). It was evidently considered that there should be a stricter rule for such than for Christians generally. The last part of the order refers to an increased severity of the fast during the last week; see e. g. Epiphanius, Expos. Fidei c. 22; vol. i. 1105, ed. Petavius. On this part of the subject reference may be made to the special article. [HOLY WEEK.]

(B) A second point which characterised the season was the forbidding of all things which were of a festal character. Thus the Council of Laodicea (circa A.D. 365) ordered that the oblation of bread and wine in the Eucharist should be confined to Saturdays and Sundays during Lent (can. 49, Labbe, i. 1505). A later council, that in Trullo (A.D. 692) ordains that on days other than the above two and the day of the Annunciation, there may be a communion of the presanctified elements (can. 52; Labbe, vi. 1165). Again, the Council of Laodicea forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, except upon Saturdays and Sundays (can. 51); and the following canon forbids the celebration of marriages and of birthday festivals in Lent, without any reservation. This last, however, perhaps only gradually came to be observed, for in the collection of Eastern canons by Martin, bishop of Braga in Spain, he cites no other canon for this use but that of the Council of Laodicea. Cf. also as to this point Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2 (vol. v. 1336); Egbert, Penitential, i. 21 (Patrol. lxxxix. 406); Theodulfus of Orleans, Capitul. 43 (Patrol. cv. 205); Nicolaus I. Resp. ad consult. Bulg. c. 48; (Patrol. cxix. 1000).

A fortiori all public games, theatrical shows, and the like, were forbidden at this season.

Gregory of Nazianzum reproves one Celeusius, a judge, who had authorised spectacles during the fast (Epist. 112; vol. ii. 101, ed. Bened.). Chrysostom, in a homily delivered in Lent, asks his hearers what profit they have gained from his sermons, when through the instigations of the devil they all have "rushed off to that vain show (πομπή) of Satan, the horse-race" (Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 48); and again he speaks of the great injury men who follow such practices do to themselves, and the scandal they are to others^m (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 59).

(7) The severity of the laws was relaxed during Lent. Thus the Theodosian Code in a law promulgated in A.D. 380 prohibits all hearing of criminal cases during that season (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 4; vol. iii. 252, ed. Gothofredus). Another law, published in A.D. 389, forbids the infliction of punishments of the body "sacratris Quadragesimae diebus" (op. cit. 253). As a parallel case, probably referring to the Lent season, we may allude to what is said by Ambrose, in his funeral eulogy of the younger Valentinian, where he praises him in that when some noblemen were about to be tried in a criminal case, and the prefect pressed the matter, the emperor forbade a sentence of death during a holy season (de Obitu Valentin. Consolatio, c. 18; Patrol. xvi. 1424). See also Nicolaus I. (op. cit. c. 45, col. 998), Theodulfus of Orleans (op. cit. c. 42, col. 205).

A rarely occurring exception only serves to bring out more sharply the general observance of the rule, and thus it may be noted that the younger Theodosius orders (A.D. 408) that in the case of the Isaurian robbers, the examinations by torture should be held even in Lent or at Easter (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. 35, l. 7; p. 255, ed. cit.), on the ground that the suffering of the few was expedient for the benefit of the many.

Not only the criminal, but also the civil code was relaxed, for Ambrose speaks of the sacred season of the week before Easter when "solebant debitorum laxari vincula" (Epist. 20, c. 6; Patrol. xvi. 1038ⁿ).

(8) Besides all these negative characteristics, we find also the endeavour to maintain a higher spirit of devotion, by an increased number of religious services. Thus in many cases, it would appear, sermons were delivered to the people daily throughout Lent, and Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis, to which we have already often referred, and those εις τοὺς ἀνδριάντας were of this kind. (See esp. Hom. xi. in Gen. c. 3; vol. iv. 102).^o We may also cite here Theodulfus of ⁿ We may note here that the council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) appoints Lent as one of the two periods in the year for the sitting of a synod of the bishops of the province to revise the sentence of excommunication inflicted by any of the number in the preceding season, as a check upon undue severity (can. 9, Labbe, ii. 32).

^m A curious extension of this idea is found in the Scavapeus of abbat Pirminius (ob. A.D. 758), who among other things deprecates the use of vehicles in Lent (Patrol. lxxxix. 1041). Again Nicolaus I. protests against the practice of hunting at that season (op. cit. c. 44, col. 997).

^o For another special manifestation of the same idea, see the rule laid down by the third council of Braga, that the three days at the beginning of Lent should be devoted to special forms of prayer, with litanies and psalms, by

Orleans, in whose Capitulare (c. 41, supra) it is ordained that all, save excommunicate persons, shall communicate on every Sunday in Lent. (Cf. also Augustine, Serm. 141 in Append. c. 5, vol. v. 2715.)

4. Liturgical Notices.—The earliest Roman sacramentary, the Leonine, is unfortunately defective in the part where Lent would occur, and we therefore first notice the references in the Gelasian sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1064 sqq.). This, in the form in which we now have it, has prefixed to the services for Lent an ordo agentibus publicum poenitentiam (c. 16), wherein it is ordained that the penitent be taken early on the morning of Ash Wednesday, clothed in sackcloth, and put in seclusion till Maundy Thursday, when he is reconciled. Then follow the forms for the week from Quinquagesima to the following Sunday, provision being made for the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, viewed as preliminary to, but as yet not forming part of, Lent. Thus in the Secreta of the first Sunday in Lent, we find "Sacrificium Domini, quinquagesimalis initii solemni ter immolamus. . . ." Services are given for all the Sundays in Lent, and for all the week-days except Thursday [save only in the case of Maundy Thursday]. In the Micrologus (l. c.), Melchades, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 314) is credited with the order that the Thursdays in Lent should not be observed as fasting days. As we have above remarked, the same authority speaks of Gregory II. as having been the first to require the Thursdays to be observed like the other days of Lent.

After the forms for the first week is given that for the first sabbath of the first month "in xii. lect. mense primo," which is followed by forms for ordination. The mass for the third Sunday bears the heading, "Quae pro scrutinii electorum (i.e. for baptism) celebratur." In the Canon mention is to be made of the names of those who are to act as sponsors for those about to be baptized, and afterwards the names of these latter themselves. The fourth Sunday is headed, "pro scrutinio secundo," with the recitations of names as before, as also on the fifth Sunday. After this are given the various forms requisite for baptism, and the attendant rites, ad faciendum catechumenum, benedictio salis, exorcism, etc., with the setting forth of the creed (Greek and Latin), and the Lord's Prayer. It may be noted finally that Palm Sunday bears the further heading De Passione Domini, a title which in the Gregorian sacramentary is given to the previous Sunday. For details as to the week from thence to Easter (the real Passion-week, though this name, by an imitation of Roman usage, is often, with infinitely less point, applied to the preceding week), reference may be made to the special article [HOLY WEEK].

In the Gregorian Sacramentary, after forms for Septuagesima, Sexagesima and Quinquagesima, comes the mass for Ash Wednesday (col. 35, ed. Menard). It is headed Feria iv., Caput Jejuni, the latter words, however, are wanting in one of the best MSS., the Cd. Reg. Suec., a fact which has a bearing on the question as to Gregory the Great having been the first to add on the four days at the beginning of Lent, a view which we considered his own words already cited rendered very improbable. It may further be noted that while this sacramentary provides services for every day from Ash Wednesday to Easter, there is no trace of the word Quadragesima till the first Sunday, the previous Saturday, e. g., being Sabbatum intra Quinquagesimam.

In the Ambrosian Liturgy, the service for Quinquagesima is immediately followed by that for "Dominica in capite Quadragesimae" (Pamelius, Liturgg. Lat. i. 324). The services for the week days in this liturgy are the same as in the Gregorian. The Sundays after the first bear the following names, from the subjects of the Gospels, (2) Dominica de Samaritana, (3) de Abraham, (4) de Caeco, (5) de Lazaro, [to the Saturday in this week is the heading in traditione Symboli, that is, for the approaching baptism] (6) in Ranis olivarum.

The ancient Gallican lectionary and missal, edited by Mabillon, make no mention of Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, or of Ash Wednesday. The former gives for the Prophetic Lection and Epistle for the "Initium Quadragesimae" (sic) i. e. the first Sunday in Lent, Isaiah lviii. 1-14, 2 Cor. vi. 2-15. (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 124.) The Gospel is unknown, as well as all the lections for the succeeding days till Palm Sunday, eight leaves of the MS. being wanting. The numbers, however, prefixed to the sets of lections shew that the missing ones correspond exactly with the number of Sundays in Lent, with nothing for any week day. For Palm Sunday the Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel, are respectively Jeremiah xxxi. . . . 34 [the beginning is unknown, owing to the gap in the MS.], Heb. ii. 3-34, John xii. 1-24.

In the Gothico-Gallic missal are seven masses in all for the season of Lent, the first being headed "in initium Quadragesimae" (op. cit. p. 228), followed by four headed "Missa jejunii," and these by one "Missa in Quad." The seventh is a "Missa in Symboli traditione" (cf. op. cit., infra, p. 338 sqq.). Probably the two last masses are both for Palm Sunday; and these are followed by one for Maundy Thursday. As regards the mass "in Symboli traditione" it will have been observed that the Ambrosian liturgy orders the creed to be communicated to the catechumens on the previous Saturday. Palm Sunday was the time ordinarily chosen in Spain and Gaul (cf. Isidore, de Eccles. Off. i. 37. 4; Patrol. lxxxiii. 772; also Concil. Agath. [A.D. 506], can. 13; Labbe, iv. 1385), where eight days is fixed as the period before baptism when the creed is to be imparted. Leslie (op. cit. 283) speaks of the above name as given to the fourth Sunday in Lent, but only cites a canon of the third council of Braga, which fixes the interval as twenty days (Concil. Brac. iii. [A.D. 572], can. 1; Labbe, v. 896). According to Isidore (l. c.), Palm Sunday was called capitilavium, because the children's heads were then washed with a view to the approaching Easter baptism.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, as we now have it, Sundays are reckoned up to the eighth after the octave of the Epiphany, followed by the "Dominica ante diem Cineris," and this by "feria iv. in Capite jejunii." It is clear, however, that in Spain, Lent originally began on the Sunday after Quinquagesima, which left thirty-six fasting days (cf. Isidore, l. c.: Concil. Tolet. viii. can. 9, supra), and thus there is no form for Ash Wednesday in the Hispano-Gothic use. The Mozarabic missal, therefore, has borrowed from the Toledo missal the office for the benediction of the ashes; the Gospel and prayers correspond with those for the first Sunday in Lent in the Hispano-Gothic use, and the Prophetic Lection and Epistle with those for the following Wednesday. Altogether the services in the Mozarabic liturgy are much out of order (Leslie, Not. in Liturg. Mozarab.; Patrol. lxxxv. 287). As a further consequence of the putting on of Ash Wednesday and three following days, whereas in the Hispano-Gothic use the title Dominica in (ante) carnes tollendas belongs to the first Sunday in Lent, in the Mozarabic it refers to Quinquagesima.

This latter has forms for Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays throughout Lent, and also for Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve. Under Ash Wednesday is given the form for the benediction of the ashes. In this rite (which, it may be remarked in passing, is one of those noted by Gillebert, bishop of Limerick [ob. after A.D. 1139], which may only be performed by a priest in the absence of the bishop, see BENEDICTIONS, p. 195), the priest or bishop (sacerdos), after blessing the ashes, sprinkles them with holy water, and they are then received from his hand by the clerics and laymen present. As each takes of them he is addressed in the words, "Memento, homo, quia cinis es, et in cinerem reverteris, age poenitentiam, et prima opera fac." The Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel for this day are Wisdom i. 23-33; James i. 13-21; Matt. iv. 1-12.

A common name in Spain for the first Sunday in Lent was Dominica in Alleluia, because of the markedly festal way in which the day was observed, and from the special singing of Alleluia on that day. We may take this opportunity of remarking that the ancient Spanish use was to close on this day the doors of the baptistery, which were sealed with the bishop's seal, till Maundy Thursday. The seventeenth Council of Toledo [A.D. 694] dwells on this rule (cap. 2; Labbe, vi. 1364; cf. Hildephonsus Toletanus [ob. A.D. 669] Adnot. de cognitione baptismi, c. 107; Patrol. xcvi. 156). A notice of the same custom as prevailing in the Alexandrian church is found in the ancient lectionary published by Zaccagnius (Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum, p. 718).

The following are the Old Testament Lections, Epistles and Gospels given in the Mozarabic liturgy for the Sundays in Lent; those for the Wednesdays and Fridays we have not thought it necessary to add. (i.) Isaiah lv. 2-13 (but formerly 1 [3] Kings xix. 3-14, Leslie, op. cit. 296); 2 Cor. v. 20-vi. 11; John iv. 3-43. (ii.) Prov. xiv. 33-xv. 8; Gen. xli. 1-46; James ii. 14-23; John ix. 1-36. (iii.) Prov. xx. 7-28; Num. xxii. 2-xxiii. 11; 1 Peter i. 1-12; John vi. 56-71. (iv.) "mediante die festo" [a name due not only to the fact that on this day was the middle point of Lent according to the Hispano-Gothic use, but also because of the occurrence of the words "Jam autem die festo mediante ascendit Jesus in templum" in the Gospel for the day; Leslie, op. cit. 353] Eccus. xiv. 11-22;

1 Sam. i. 1-21; 2 Pet. i. 1-12; John vii. 1-15. (v.) Eccus. xlvii. 24-30, 21-33; 1 Sam. xxvi. 1-25; 1 John i. 1-8; John x. 1-17. (vi.) "Dominica in ramis Palmarum, ad benedictionem flores vel ramos." [For this rite see HOLY WEEK; also Leslie, op. cit. 388.] Eccus. iii. 2-18; Deut. xi. 18-32; Gal. i. 3-13; John xi. 58-xii. 14.

In the Greek church there is a special service book, called the Tridion, for the period extending from what would be with us the last of the Sundays after the Epiphany (called with them the Sunday of the Pharisee and Publican, from the Gospel for the day) to Easter Eve. Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, are respectively the Sundays of the Prodigal (from the Gospel for the day), τῆς ἀποκρέω (because from Sexagesima onwards flesh was not eaten; cf. οὐ μὴ φάγω κρέα 1 Cor. viii. 13, which enters into the Epistle for the day), and τῆς τυροφάγου (from the nature of the diet taken in the ensuing week). The Lent of the Greek church is begun on the day after Quinquagesima, no special regard being paid to Ash Wednesday. The Armenian church, however, begins on the Monday before Quinquagesima; the fast of this first week being known as the Artziburion, a word of very doubtful origin (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 742). The Epistles and Gospels used in the Greek church for the six Sundays of Lent are as follows: (i.) κυριακὴ τῆς ὁδοδοξίας (in memory especially of the final overthrow of the Iconoclasts), Heb. xi. 24-26, 32-40; John i. 44-52. (ii.) Heb. i. 10-ii. 3; Mark ii. 1-12. (iii.) κυριακὴ σταυροπροσκύνησις, or simply σταυροπροσκύνησις [See CROSS, ADORATION OF, I. 501], Heb. iv. 14-v. 6; Mark viii. 34-ix. 1. (iv.) Heb. vi. 13-20; Mark ix. 17-31. (v.) Heb. ix. 11-14; Mark x. 32-45. (vi.) Phil. iv. 4-9, Gospel for Matins, Matt. xxi. 1-11, 15-17, for Liturgy, John xii. 1-18.

LEO I. (1) the Great, pope A.D. 440-461, is named first of all confessors in the Breton Litany (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82), second only to Sylvester in that at the mass for an emperor in Sacr. Gregor. (Muratori, 463), Nov. 10, and commemorated that day (Mart. Hier. Raban), but April 11, (Bede, Raban, Notker), "Cujus temporibus synodus Chalcedonensis extitit" is added on that day first by Usuard. Commemorated in the Greek church, Feb. 18. April 11 is probably the day of his translation to a more conspicuous tomb in the basilica of St. Peter, by Sergius (A.D. 687-701). He had an oratory in the days of pope Paul below the basilica of St. Peter without the walls (Anast. 85-95).

LEO (2) Pope A.D. 683, June 28 (Anastasius, the Capitulary published by Fronto, Mart. Rom. Bede, Ado, Usuard). Sollerius would make out that this was originally a festival of Leo I. But it is not certain that all the celebrations in the sacramentary of Gregory really date from Gregory's time. (For the collects there given v. Muratori, p. 100, or Migne; v. Rossi, i. 127.)

(3) Bishop of Catania, Feb. 20 (Cal. Byz.)

(4) Martyr, March 1 (Mart. Hieron.).

(5) Bishop of Sens, Apr. 22 (Mart. Hieron.).

(6) Confessor at Troyes, May 25 (Usuard.)

(7) Or Leontius, (Mart. Gellon.) martyr, Oct. 2 (Mart. Hieron.).

(8) Subdeacon, martyr at Rome, June 30 (Mart. Hieron. Usuard).

(9) Martyr, drowned by the mob at Patara in Lycia, under Lollianus, on February 18 (Cal. Byz. v. Tillem. v. 581); not in the Menology of Basil. He seems to have been confounded with Leo I. His acts, however, assign his death to June 30, an attempted identification with (8).

LEOBARDUS, monk of Tours, † Jan. 18, A.D. 583. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 562.) [E. B. B.]

LEOBINUS, bishop of Chartres, † A.D. 557; commemorated Sept. 15. (Bede, Raban, Wandelbert, Usuard.) [E. B. B.]

LEOCADIA, virgin, of Toledo, commemorated Dec. 9 (Cal. Hispano-Goth.; Mart. Rom. Parvum). Ado adds that she died in prison on hearing of the tortures of Eulalia. She had three churches in Toledo: one on the site of her martyrdom, in which the Gothic kings were buried; a parish church at the spot where she was born; and a cathedral over her tomb, in which the councils of Toledo were held. On the Saracen invasion, about A.D. 724, her relics were carried into Hainault. (De Vitis Sanctorum, Cologne 1605. Sollier's Usuard.) [E. B. B.]

LEODEGARIUS, LEUDEGARIUS, LAUDEGARIUS (St. LEGER), bishop of Autun, killed by Ebroin, mayor of the palace, A.D. 678, and commemorated Oct. 2, with a special service in the Gothic missal, as a martyr: "O beatum virum Laudegarium antistitem qui corpus nexibus absolutum, ora labiis minuatum oculisque orbatum, exilium perpetratum, lubricitatis saeculi positum, diversis tormentis passum, exemplum episcopis reliquit, . . . coronam immarcescibilis floribus remuneratur unde multae post reliquiae in Gallis floruerunt." The grammar is not perfect, nor is it clear what is meant by the relics of his heavenly crown blooming in Gaul. He is not named in the metrical martyrology of Bede. The place of his martyrdom is still St. Leger's wood. He was buried at Sercin. Afterwards the bishops of Autun, Arras, and Poitiers, contended for the possession of his body. They drew lots, and it fell to the latter, and was translated to the monastery of Maxentius at Poitiers, March 16, where a church had been dedicated to him the 30th October preceding. (Acta SS. Oct. i. 427, 428.) Monasteries were dedicated to him at Morbach in Alsace, and

Massevaux or Masmünster on the Upper Rhine, about A.D. 726. (Ib. p. 434.)

LEODEGARIUS (2) Priest in Le Pertois, 6th century, † June 23. (Acta SS. Jun. v. 414.) [E. B. B.]

LEOMENES, Pontius, of Epineium in Crete, under Decius, martyred Dec. 23. (Cal. Byz.) [E. B. B.]

LEONADIUS, (1) commemorated in Ethiopia, Dec. 27; called by the Copts Leontius the patriarch, and commemorated by them on the 28th. (Ludolf, Comm. ad Hist. Ethiop. p. 403.)

(2) Commemorated in Ethiopia along with Benikarus, on Jan. 7. (Ib. 404.) [E. B. B.]

LEONARD, (1) A noble disciple of St. Remigius, founder of the monastery of Noblat (St. Leonard), near Limoges; commemorated Nov. 6. He is now honoured in the Greek church also on that day (Arcudius, Anthologion).

(2) A monk of Le Mans, who refused to be prior, † Oct. 15, A.D. 570. His relics translated to Corbigny A.D. 877. (Acta SS. Oct. vii. 45.) The two following are found in the additions to Usuard.

(3) Confessor at Vendœuvre, Nov. 27.

(4) Confessor at Châteaudun, Dec. 8.

[E. B. B.]

LEONIANUS, abbat of Vienne, † Nov. 1st, circa A.D. 510. [E. B. B.]

LEONIDES, (1) Bishop of Athens, commemorated April 15. (Cal. Byz.)

σκότος συνέειχε τὰς Ἀθήνας ἄθροον δυνάμτος αὐταῖς ἡλίου Λεωνιδίου.

He is perhaps intended by the mention of the name on April 16 in the Hieronymian Martyrology.

(2) Father of Origen, and martyr circa A.D. 204. On June 28, the name is joined with Potamiaena and the other disciples of Origen, and thus attached as a companion to Irenaeus the same day. (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. June vii. 321.) Supposed to be the one mentioned with Arator, Quiriacus, and Basilus, April 22 in the Mart. Hieron. and Acta SS. April, iii. 10.

(3) Martyr at Antioch, April 26. (Mart. Hieron.)

(4) Burnt to death with Eleutherius, Aug. 8. The Mart. Hieron. names Leonides only, and assigns him to Philadelphia. Some menologies add, "and the babes," and say that their synaxis was performed "in the house of St. Irene, in the buildings of Justinian outside the gate." (Acta SS. Aug. ii. 342.)

(5) The name is mentioned March 1 or Jan. 28, as a martyr at Antinous in the Thebais, under Decius. (Acta SS. Jan. iii. 448.) [E. B. B.]

in Cappadocia, and translated to Langres in Gaul (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 437); commemorated Jan. 17 (Cal. Byz., Mart. Hieron., Bede, Ado, Usuard, but not in the Parvum Romanum). The Greeks call her Neonilla. (Men. Basil.)

(3) Bishop of Autun (5th century), † July 1. (Mart. Hieron.)

(6) Martyr at Amasea in Pontus, August 19. (Mart. Hieron.)

LEPERS, LEPROSI. There are few notices of the treatment of lepers in the early church. It is probable the disease did not assume such dimensions as to call for special enactments. Ugolini, under the heading De Morbis Biblicis, has collected (Thesaurus, vol. xxx. 1544) several reasons why leprosy was less prevalent in the Christian than in the Jewish church. The council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) has a canon (c. 17) directed against τοὺς ἀλογευσσάμενους καὶ λεπρούς ὄντας ἤτοι λεπρώσαντας; which may refer either to actual lepers, or may signify that those who polluted themselves with unnatural crimes contracted a moral leprosy. The council orders that their station shall be among the χειμαζόμενοι, inter hyemantes [HIEMANTES]. In the Gallic church the bishops are directed by the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549 (c. 21), to take care that no lepers within their diocese are left destitute, but that they are supplied with food and raiment from the church funds. The 3rd council of Lyons, A.D. 583 (c. 6), gives a similar injunction, with the addition that the lepers are to be prohibited from wandering from one diocese to another. In some instances they must have been in danger of being cut off from all church membership, for pope Gregory II., A.D. 715–731 (Ep. xiii. ad Bonifac.), gives a formal sanction to the Holy Communion being administered to them, although not in company with others free from disease. Some special directions are also given by pope Zacharias, A.D. 741–752 (Ep. xii. de regio morbo laborantibus; the regius morbus in this instance has been held by some to signify leprosy. Martene (De Rit. Antiq. iii. 10) has printed from French rituals various specimens of the forms and services to be observed in the treatment of lepers, but they lie outside our period.

LEPTIS, COUNCIL OF (Leptense Concilium), held A.D. 386, or thereabouts, at Leptis, in Africa, when nine canons contained in a synodical letter of pope Siricius to the African bishops, were received. By the second of them it is ordained that no single bishop may ordain another. (Mansi, iii. 670, and Supplem. ad Colet. i. 252, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS.)

[E. S. Fr.]

LERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Ilerdense concilium), held A.D. 546—not 524, as was once thought—at Lerida in Catalonia, and passed sixteen canons on discipline, to which eight bishops subscribed, the bishop of Lerida subscribing last, and after him one presbyter representing a ninth. By canon 1, all who minister at the altar are commanded to abstain from shedding of blood under pain of being suspended for two years, and excluded from promotion ever afterwards. By canon 8, no clerk may lay hands upon any slave or pupil of his who has taken sanctuary. By canon 10, those who refuse to leave church, when ordered out for misbehaviour by the priest, are to be deemed contumacious and treated accordingly. By canon 14, the faithful may not communicate, nor so much as eat, with the rebaptized. Other canons are given to this council by Burchard; among them, one referring to the purgation of pope Leo III., which took place two and a half centuries afterwards (Mansi, viii. 609 sq.; comp. Catalan, Conc. Hisp. iii. 172).

LESSON. [LECTION; LECTIONARY.]

LESTINES, COUNCIL OF (Liptincse Concilium), said to have been held at Liptines, or Lestines, in Hainault, A.D. 743, or according to Mansi, 745; described as one of the five councils under St. Boniface, but beset with as many difficulties as the rest. 1. All the four canons assigned to it reappear among Carloman's capitularies, dated Liptines, A.D. 743 (Mansi, xi. Append. 105); indeed the first of them speaks of the counts and prefects, as well as bishops, who had met there to confirm what a former synod had passed. 2. The heading says it was celebrated under Carloman, and makes no mention of Boniface. 3. Hincmar and others, who are supposed to refer to it, affirm that a legate from Rome, named George, presided at it jointly with St. Boniface. But George was not sent into France by Zachariah, but by Stephen II.; nor before Feb. 755 (Cod. Carol. Ep. viii. ed. Migne), by when St. Boniface had been dead eight months. Hence some have supposed a second council of Liptines in that year. The question is rather, whether the first has been truly described as a council. (Mansi, xii. 370-5 and 589. Comp. Hartzheim's Conc. Germ. i. 50, et seq.)

LETTERS, FORMS OF [LIBER DIURNUS;

LETTERS, PASCHAL [PASCHAL LETTERS].

LETTERS, PASTORAL [PASTORAL LETTERS].

LETTERS ON VESTMENTS. In the examples of early Christian art to be seen in the frescoes of the catacombs, and the mosaics of the basilicas, the dresses of the persons depicted are, in innumerable instances, marked by one or more letters or monograms on the border or outer fold. The letters thus employed are very various, and usually, if not always, belong to the Greek alphabet, and it must be acknowledged that hitherto no satisfactory explanation of their occurrence has been given. Those most frequently met with are I, H, X, T, Γ, Γ. The last letter, the capital gamma, was of such frequent use on the ecclesiastical robes of the Greek church, that it gave its name to a class of vestments [GAMMADIA]. Arbitrary symbols are also found, to which no meaning can be assigned, such as [], [], [], [], [], [], []. The earlier school of Christian archaeologists which was resolved to find a sacred meaning in every detail of the picture or bas-relief under consideration, had no difficulty in deciding that T and X represented the cross in different forms, while both I and H stood for Jesus, and Γ invariably denoted an apostle (Bosio, Rom. Sott. lib. iv. c. 3, p. 592; Aringhi, Rom. Sott. li. lib. vi. c. 28; Mellini apud Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. i. c. xiii. p. 98). This supposed law, hastily deduced from insufficient evidence, has been entirely refuted by wider examination. Ciampini (l. c.) proves it to be quite baseless. The theory however propounded by him, and supported by Buonarroti (Vetri, p. 89), that those letters and monograms on the dresses were the weavers' marks is equally destitute of a solid foundation, and is ridiculed by Ferrario (Costume antico e moderno: Europa, vol. iii. p. 149; Monumenti di Sant' Ambrogio in Milano, p. 176), since the same marks appear in mosaics most widely separated both by time and place. Other theories, e.g., that the letters indicate the name of the individual represented, or of the mosaic-workers, or even of the tailors who made the clothes, prove equally untenable, and the hopelessness of discovering any principle that would satisfactorily account at the same time for the variety and the identity of the marks has led some to assert that they were used capriciously (e.g., Suarez, bishop of Vaison, de Vestibus literatis, p. 7), without any fixed law, simply in imitation of an already established custom. The existence of this custom of weaving, or embroidering letters in the fabric, or sewing them on to the stuff, is proved by classical authorities. Pliny speaks of the ostentation of Zeuxis the painter, in having his name woven in golden letters on the border of his pallium at Olympia (Hist. Nat. lib. xxxv. c. 36, § 2). Apuleius speaks of "lacinias auro literatas" (De Asin. aur. lib. 6, ad init.). Vopiscus describes Carinus as adopting the same custom (Vopisc. in Carin.). Suidas (s.v.) defines τριβαννοφόρος as "one wearing a robe, having on it signs like small letters" (σημεία ὡς γραμμάτια). The purple clavi sewn on the senatorial robes, which gave its designation to the laticlavium, are considered by Rubenius to have been "letters, not mere stripes," "literas lacinias palliorum insertas" (De Re vestiaria, lib. iii. c. 12). In the well-known vision of Boethius, the ascent from practical to theoretical wisdom is symbolised by the letter Π woven into the bottom of the border of the robe of Philosophy, and Θ at the top, the intervening space being occupied with letters arranged like the steps of a ladder (De Consolat. lib. i. pros. 1). Although it is impossible to believe that the selection of the letters in the Christian representations was entirely capricious, it must be confessed that no satisfactory explanation of them has yet been given, and that the subject requires further elucidation. [E. V.]

LEUCIUS (1) Bishop of Brindisi, or LEONTIUS, or LAURENTIUS (Greg. Ep. vi. 62 (ix. 73), cf. De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 228), is commemorated Jan. 11. (Mart. Hieron.)

LEUTFREDUS, a confessor who by his prayers caused a fountain to well forth in Meer near Montfort-l'Amaury. June 21, Usuard.

LEVITE. (Λευίτης, Λευεῖτης, Levita.) Professor Lightfoot has remarked (on Philippians, p. 187, 2nd ed.) that "the Levite, whose function it was to keep the beasts for slaughter, to cleanse away the blood and offal of the sacrifices, to serve as porter at the temple gates, and to swell the chorus of sacred psalmody, bears no strong resemblance to the Christian deacon, whose ministrations lay among the widows and orphans, and whose time was almost wholly spent in works of charity." Nevertheless, when the three orders of the Christian ministry came to be universally recognised, the analogy between the bishop with his attending presbyters and ministering deacons, and the high-priest with his attending priests and ministering Levites, was on the surface so strong, that the terms appropriate to the one soon came to be transferred to the other. Thus Origen (Hom. 12 in Jerem. 3, iii. p. 196, ed. Delarue), quoted by Lightfoot (ib. p. 256), regards the priests and Levites as corresponding to the presbyters and deacons respectively. From the third century onward Levite is a frequent designation of the Christian ministry. Thus the 2nd council of Carthage, A.D. 390, designates (c. 2) the three orders of the ministry as antistites, sacerdotes, and Levitae (Codex Eccl. Afric. c. 3). Synesius (Epist. 58, p. 35, ed. Paris, 1640) speaks of the different grades of the ministry as Levites, presbyters, and bishops.

In the early portion of the Apostolical Constitutions, however, the bishops are regarded as succeeding to the Levitical privileges of the older dispensation. The bishops who serve the holy tabernacle, that is, the Holy Catholic Church, are the Levites in respect of the congregation (ii. 25, 5); the bishops inherited the Levitical privilege of receiving gifts for the benefit of the community (iv. 8, 1). On the other hand, in the later portion of the Constitutions (viii. 46, 3 ff.) the high-priest, priest, and Levite are regarded as analogous to bishop, presbyter, and deacon.

LEVITO (also Levitonarium, Lebito, Lebitonarium, Lebetes; Λεβιτών, Λεβητών, Λεβητονάριον, Λευιτών, etc.). The name Levito, a word apparently of Coptic origin^a (see Tattam's Lexicon Aegyptiaco-Latinum, in Append.), is used for a kind of sleeveless cloak, ordinarily worn by Egyptian monks—"Lebitonarium est colobium sine manicis, quali monachi Aegyptii utuntur (Isidore, Etym. xix. 22). The word occurs frequently in the Rule of Pachomius, of which we have Jerome's translation from Eusebius (Vita, c. 2; Regula, cc. 2, 67, 70, 81; in Jerome, vol. ii. 53 sqq. ed. Vallarsi). From this we learn that each monk was allowed two Levitonaria and a Psithium, or mat, in his cell. The material, of which this dress was made, was doubtless linen. Ménard (Not. ad Concord. Regularum, Benedicti Anianensis, c. 2; Patrol. ciii. 1237) argues that in the passage of Isidore cited above, the word lineum has dropped out after colobium, for Papias, the grammarian, quoting apparently from Isidore, so reads it. Also, Rufinus (de Vitis Patrum, c. 7; Patrol. xxi. 411) speaks of it as "stupeum colobium." Cassian again (de Coenobiorum Institutis, i. 5; Patrol. xlix. 68, where see Gazet's note) speaks of the Egyptian monks as "colobiis lineis induti." Also the Rule of Pachomius speaks of it directly as "tunica lineae." We need not therefore attach weight to the definition given by Suidas, χιτὼν μοναχικὸς ἐκ τριχῶν συντεθειμένος. LIBEL (Libellus famosus). The frequent enactments, both in ecclesiastical and civil legislation, against the circulation of libels, that is, scandalous charges circulated in writing, prove the frequency of the practice. The Theodosian Code (lib. ix. tit. 34, de Famosis Libellis) has detailed and rigorous enactments. Even the reader or collector of such libels is to be liable to capital punishment. And that of Justinian has provisions substantially the same. This seems to have been because the person in possession of or circulating a libel, was presumed, in law, to have been the author of it and punished as such (sciat se quasi auctorem hujusmodi . . . subjugandum). And this presumption might probably be rebutted by suitable evidence. The Apostolical Canons (Nos. 54, 55, 83) deal only with the case of a clergyman maligning another cleric, or a bishop, or the emperor; in the latter case he was to be deposed. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 17) remarks on the proneness of the clergy to present to the emperor accusations (βιβλία) against each other before the first council of Nice, and relates that Constantine ordered all these libelli to be burnt unread.

In a collection of canons said to have been delivered by pope Adrian to Ingilram, bishop of Metz, we find one apparently founded on the rule of law mentioned above, and embodying similar provisions. And the Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305) anathematised in its 52nd canon those who should be found to have circulated libels, "famosos libellos," in the church.

In the 6th century denunciations of this offence become much rarer. From that period forwards we have only a very few canons, and those in general terms, against libel. The councils are mostly occupied with a different class of offences, such as would naturally arise in the ruder state of society which followed upon the irruption of the barbarians and the fall of the empire. [S. J. E.]

LIBELLATICI. [LIBELLI.]

LIBELLI. I. In the Decian persecution the constitution of the courts employed to enforce conformity, and the number of minor officials dealing with individuals, rendered evasion easy. The approved form of submission to the state ritual was (as under Trajan) to offer sacrifice or incense, but it was possible also to tender submission in writing. The name of one who "professed" in this way was subscribed to a renunciation of Christianity, or to a denial of the charge, or to a declaration of having recently or habitually attended sacrifices, or sometimes (unless Augustine has fallen into an unlikely mistake) to a mere profession of readiness to comply. This document was delivered to a magistrate, entered on the Acta, and finally published in the Forum.

II. Certificates of exemption, like the "Parliamentary Certificates" of our own history, were offered by officials for money, and actually thrust on persons who believed themselves, after privately avowing their faith, to be only purchasing exemption from the obligation to conform. This would have been simply a species of confiscation, which has rarely given great offence (the church penance for it was of six months' duration, S. Pet. Alex., can. 5; but on the Montanist view of such acts see Tillemont sur la persécution de Dèce, note iii). But it is evident from the efforts of Cyprian to awaken penitence in respect of them, that the purport of this kind of libellus was not less objectionable than the first. They cannot have sanctioned exemption without some grounds alleged, and those grounds can scarcely have been any other than that the certifying officer declared himself satisfied of the sound paganism of the recipient.

The difficulties found by authors on the subject of libelli have arisen from the assumption that they were all of one kind, or that there could be any regular formal procedure for the evasion of procedure. On the contrary, every conceivable means would be adopted. The accounts are not irreconcilable, but are about different things. Cyprian's language is precise to technicality in the use of professional terms.

I. (1), That libellus which the suspected Christian tendered is characterised in Cyprian de Lapsis, xxvii. 22, "Professio est denegantis, contestatio christiani quod fuerat (cf. for this peculiar phrase, Cyp. c. Demetr. xiii. 11, id quod prius fueram) abnuentis." In Ep. 30, iii. 3, "Professio libellorum" is again the exhibition or putting in of such documents. Profiti is the proper term, as in the Acts of St. Agape (Ruinar, p. 424), Christi negotiationem scriptum profiteri, and compare Aug. de Bap. c. Don. iv. 6. Again, contestatio means the plea, or statement of his own case, made by either party to a suit, answering to the διαμωρία of the Athenian courts. The Roman clergy in Cypr. Ep. 30, iii. 3, argue correctly that although a man may never have approached the altar, he is bound by the fact of having put in a legal affirmation (contestatus sit) that he had done it.

In the above passages the libellus is a document emanating from the recanting persons. Such are described in Peter of Alexandria (can. 5) as χειρογραφῆσαντες. The nature of its contents is indicated in the passage of the de Lapsis, "He has declared himself to have done whatever another in fact sinfully did" (faciendo commisit), although this passage implies further the appearance of a deputy, a slave or heathen friend to personate him in the sacrificial act, as was common in the persecution of Diocletian.

The offence of the bishop Martial (Ep. 67, vi.) who was "stained with the libellus of idolatry," is explained by this use of the word contestatus. In the public proceedings (actis publice habitis apud) before the Ducenary Procurator, he had appeared to put in a declaration that he had denied Christ and adopted a heathen cultus. He is not accused of having ever actually sacrificed, and according to Augustine (l.c.) libelli might contain only a declaration of readiness to do so.

(2) A second class are spoken of by Novatian and the Roman clergy, as having virtually "given acknowledgments, quittances, or discharges" (accepta fecissent, the best authenticated reading, is a common term (Dirksen, Manuale, s. v.), but "acta facere," which Neander adopts, makes good sense, namely, "to put in a plea in a process"), though not present in person, "cumfuerant;" inasmuch as they had made a legal appearance (praesentiam suam fecissent) by commissioning a proxy to register their names (mandando ut sic scriberentur) on the lists of conformity. Novatian argues that, as one who orders a crime is responsible for its commission, so one who sanctions (consensu) the reading in public (publice legitur) of an untrue declaration about himself is liable to be proceeded against as if it were true.

II. The other kind of libellus which emanated not from the renegade but from the magistrate, is described with equal precision. In the Epistle to Antonian (55, xi. 8), Cyprian says some of the Libellatici had received such. An opportunity for obtaining one presented itself unsought (occasio libelli oblata . . . ostensa); they went in person or by deputy (mandavi) to a magistrate, informed him of their religion, and paid a sum for exemption from sacrifice. Since no magistrate could issue an order simply staying the execution of an edict, his certificate undoubtedly contained a statement of the satisfactory paganism of its holder. Thus Cyprian tried to awaken their consciences, while they felt that they had avowed their religion, and that the form of the document was not their affair.

Again, in the Exhortation of Martyrdom, Christians are urged if a libellus is offered (libelli oblata sibi occasione) not to embrace the gift (decipitium malum munus), by the example of Eleazar, who refused the facilities offered him of eating lawful flesh as a make-believe for pork. The official connivance in each case would have enabled them to seem to do what they did not. The libellus is here something offered, and is a munus.

Thus nothing remains more clear than that the libellus of conformity is used for two kinds of documents. Maran thought the distinction was merely as to whether persons had been present or not at the registration of their names (vita Cypriani, vi.). Rigalt says that the libellatici only purchased a libellus of exemption. Tillemont alone has guessed that there might be two ways, "Peut-estre que l'on faisait et l'un et l'autre." Whether a document was issued also in cases of registration is not apparent; but all three sorts of persons are included under the name of libellatici.

III. Libellus is the proper name of a perfectly distinct kind of document issued by confessors or martyrs in prison, to those who had "fallen." When the reaction commenced among the lapsed, in their desire to recover their lost standing, some reappeared before the tribunals and suffered torture or death; others dedicated themselves to the service of confessors, others entered on penances of undefined duration (Cypr. Epp. 24, 21, 56). Many more relied on vicarious imputations of merit, by means of intercessions, always owned as availing for the individual before God (praerogativa eorum adjuvari apud Deum possunt, Ep. 18, cf. Ep. 19, ii.), but now first used in subversion of church order. At first a letter from a martyr to the bishop only prayed that the case of a lapsed friend might be enquired into on the cessation of persecution; a period of penitence and the imposition of hands being understood to be necessary just as for other sins; some, like Saturninus, declined to venture even on this; Mappalicus requested it only for his sister or mother (Cypr. Ep. 20). But the presbyters who composed at Carthage the faction hostile to Cyprian perceiving the effectiveness which might be given to the practice, anticipated not only the bishop's enquiry but even the death of martyrs, and "offered the names" of lapsed persons (see Aubespine, Obs. Ecc. L. i. § vii., prefixed to Priorius's Optatus, 1676, p. 40), and gave them communion as duly restored penitents (Ep. 34) upon receiving such letters from confessors without the bishop's sanction. These libelli sometimes specified only one of a group to whom they were granted, "Communicet ille cum suis" (Ep. 15). Then they were issued in the name of deceased confessors, and of confessors too illiterate to write themselves (Ep. 27), and this so copiously that some thousands were supposed to be circulating in Africa (Ep. 20). The chief authority in this issue, Lucianus, when remonstrated with by Cyprian, seems to have replied almost at once by promulgating in the name of "all the confessors" (compare the letter of ἄντας ἁγίους μαρτύρων from Nicomedia, end of cent. iii. Lucian ap. Routh, Reliquiae, vol. iv.) an indulgence to "all the lapsed," and requesting Cyprian himself to communicate it to the provincial bishops, the sole condition annexed being that their conduct since their fall should have been satisfactory. This extraordinary document is extant, as Cypr. Ep. 23. Cyprian himself was prepared to concede some weight to these libelli in cases not undeserving of restitution, but the influence of the martyrs was ignored in the council (Carth. Sub. Cyp. i.) which regulated the terms of readmission. [AFRICAN COUNCILS, I. 38.]

These seditious libelli of the martyrs seem to have had no existence at Rome. This was no doubt due to the influence in the exactly opposite direction of Novatian over the confessors, whom he commends for maintaining "Evangēlica disciplina" (Ep. 30, iv. 4), and who at first adhered to him, and not to the milder Cornelius. The Roman presbyters sympathise with the African episcopate, and deplore the similar revolts in Sicily, and in "nearly all the world." They say of Rome, "We seem to have escaped so far the disorders of the times." The petition of Celerinus at Rome to the confessors of Carthage for "Peace" to be granted to his sisters, implies that libelli could not practically be obtained at Rome (Ep. 22); accordingly the Roman confessors who correspond with Cyprian, urge humility on the Carthaginians, and go beyond him in strictness (Ep. 27, 31, 32).

LIBER DIURNUS. The Liber Diurnus Pontificum Romanorum is a collection of formulae used in the correspondence and ordinary business, the "negotia diurna," of the Roman Curia.

Its date is determined within certain limits by internal evidence. In c. ii. tit. ix. p. 28, Constantine Pogonatus is referred to as departed. The formula which contains this reference therefore must have been drawn up or added to after the year 685. And Garnier argues that the book must have been compiled before the year 752, as it contains formulae of addresses to eparchs, which would, he thinks, not have been inserted after the date when eparchs were superseded. He considers the Liber Diurnus to have been drawn up in the time of Gregory II. (715–731), mainly on the ground, that in the second "professio fidei" of a newly-elected pope which it gives (p. 33 ff.), expressions and sentiments occur identical with some found in letters of that pope to the emperor Leo. Zaccaria, however, has shewn that at any rate the MS. which Garnier used was almost certainly not written earlier than the time of Gregory IV., as it contains an allusion (c. ii. tit. 2, p. 13) to the date of that pontiff's consecration (Nov. A.D. 827). And as it is very probable that many forms were left standing after they had ceased to be in actual use, no certain inference as to the date of the collection as a whole can be drawn from the fact, that forms are given for addresses to an exarch.

It was made use of by the early canonists, as Ivo of Chartres, Anselm, Deusdedit, and Gratian (Dist. xvi. c. 8); but as in the course of time forms of proceeding changed, it gradually fell out of use, and copies became rare.

Some time before the year 1650 the well-known Lucas Holstenius saw in the Cistercian monastery of S. Croce in Gerasalemme at Rome an ancient MS.* of the Liber Diurnus, and with some difficulty obtained from the abbat leave to have it transcribed—a task which is said to have been performed in a single night. While he was preparing to publish this, he heard of another MS. at Paris, in the possession of Sirmond, which was sent to him at Rome (Sirmondi Opera, iv. pp. 685 f. and 701). He does not appear however to have made any use of this MS., for what reason we do not know. His edition was printed, and a copy is found in the Vatican Library with the following title-page in Holstenius's own hand-writing: "Diurnus Pontificum, sive vetus Formularium, quo S. Rom. Ecclesia ante annos M utebatur. Lucas Holstenius edidit cum Notis. Romae typis Lud. Griniani, MDCL. 8vo." The notes are wanting, but Zaccaria, towards the end of the last century, saw Holstenius's preparations for them still preserved at Rome. The sheets were ready then in 1650, but not issued. The same book exactly, with the exception of some slight variations in the last sheet, is found with the printed title, "Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum ex antiquissimo codice ms. nunc primum in lucem editus Romae typis Josephi Vannucci, 1658." But the censors intervened, and the book was not published, though some sheets of it were sent to Petrus de Marca in 1660 (Baluze on de Marca, de Concordia, l. ix. 7). It is almost certain that this suppression of the book was due to its condemnation of pope Honorius (Professio Pontif. p. 41) as abetting heretics, a sentiment which seemed to Cardinal Bona, when the matter was submitted to him as president of the Congregation of the Index, a perilous one. In the pontificate, however, of Benedict XIII. (1724–1730) copies of the edition called of 1658 (really of 1650) were permitted to circulate.

Meantime Jean Garnier published an edition of the Liber Diurnus in quarto at Paris, in the year 1680. This seems to have been founded on the Paris MS. In 1685 Mabillon (Mus. Ital. i. 75) saw at Rome the original MS. which had been copied for Holstenius, and finding in it some formulæ not contained in Garnier's edition, inserted them in his Museum Italicum (i. pt. 2, pp. 32, 37), together with a selection of passages in which the reading of the MS. differed from that of Garnier's edition. These additions and various readings were used by Hoffmann in preparing the edition which he inserted in his Nova Collectio Scriptorum, vol. ii, pp. 1–268 (Leipzig, 1733). J. D. Schöpflin in his Commentationes Hist. et Crit. (Basil. 1741), pp. 502–524, having had access to a copy of the edition of Holstenius, noted almost all the places in which this differs from that of Garnier, and also added (pp. 525–530) those portions which are wanting in Garnier's edition, omitting four paragraphs, for what reason is not apparent. The edition of Riegger (Vienna, 1762) is a mere reprint of the original Paris edition. This is also reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. 105, with Mabillon's additions.

Garnier found the hundred and four formulæ in the codex without arrangement or division into parts or chapters. He arranged the matter and divided it into seven chapters. Of these the first contains the proper forms for papal letters to the emperor, the empress, the patrician, the exarch, a consul, a king, a patriarch, etc.; the second treats of the election and consecration of a pope, together with the proper forms of the letters to be written on such occasions to the emperor, the exarch, and other official personages; the third, of the consecration by the pope of the suburbicarian bishops; in the fourth are four formulæ for the bestowing of the Pallium; the fifth contains twenty-one formulæ for various transactions between the pope and the bishops of his own consecration; the sixth relates to the management of the estates of the Church; and the seventh to the granting of privileges to various ecclesiastical corporations, as monasteries and hospitals.

The book contains matter of great interest both in a dogmatic and an archaeological point of view. The "Professions" of a newly elected pope refer to such matters as ecclesiastical tradition, the respect due to the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, the heresies to be abjured and condemned, the claims of the Roman primate. The particulars of the order to be observed and the persons to be informed, on a vacancy of the papal see, are brought into clearer light by this document than by any other of so early a date. Much is learned as to the relation between the pope and the bishops of his own archdiocese, and also between the pope and the metropolitans who owned his jurisdiction, as to the conditions and the periods of ordination generally, to the residence of bishops, to the care and distribution of the property of the church; as to the different classes of churches—basilicas, tituli, oratories, and the like—their consecration, their endowment, and the offices to be performed in them; and as to the care of the sick and poor. In a word, a considerable portion of the ecclesiastical—especially the Roman ecclesiastical—life of the 8th century, or thereabouts, receives illustration from the Liber Diurnus.

(See Garnier's preface to the Liber Diurnus [Migne, Patrol. cv. pp. 11–22]; and Zaccaria's Dissert. de L. D., in his Biblioth. Rit. t. ii. sec. ii. pp. ccxxx–ccxcvi., Rome, 1781; and in Migne, cv. pp. 1361–1404. The most recent edition is that by Eug. de Rozière; Paris, 1869.) [C.]

LIBERA NOS. The amplification of the petition "Deliver us from evil," in the Lord's Prayer, found in almost all liturgies. For instance, that of the Gallican (which is variable), is on Christmas Day—"Libera nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo et custodi nos in omni opere bono, perfecta veritas et vera libertas Deus, qui regnas in saecula saeculorum." That of St. James's Liturgy is given under EMBOLISMUS [l. 609]. Many liturgies contain supplications for the intercession of saints in the Libera nos. [INTERCESSION, l. 844.] [C.]

LIBRA. In the later Roman empire the pound of gold was divided into 72 aurei or solidi (Codex, x. tit. 70, s. 5: see Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq. s.v. "Aurum"). It was probably from this circumstance that a number of 72 witnesses was called Libra Occidua (Baronius ad an. 302, § 91 ff.). The same term is said to be applied to the suffragan bishops of the see of Rome, who were in number about 72 (Macri, Hierolex. s. v. Libra; BISHOP, I. 240). [C.]

LIBRARIES BELONGING TO CHURCHES AND MONASTERIES. The information that we are able to give on this subject is fragmentary, but not without interest.

I. The most ancient library of Christian books mentioned by any historian is that at Aelia (Jerusalem), collected by Alexander, the bishop of that city, A.D. 212. Eusebius of Caesarea, writing about 330, says that it contained the epistles, from one to another, of many learned ecclesiastics of the time of Origen (A.D. 230), and that he had himself made very great use of it in compiling his history (Hist. Eccl. vi. 20). There was a much larger and more famous library at Caesarea in Palestine, which appears to have been founded by Origen, with the munificent aid, we may suppose, of his friend Ambrosius, and to have been greatly enlarged by Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius, A.D. 294. That it existed before the time of Pamphilus is clear from St. Jerome's account: "Having sought for them (books) over the world, but devoting himself especially to the books of Origen, he gave them to the library at Caesarea" (Expos. in Ps. 126, Ep. 34 ad Marcellam, § 1). The same author calls it the library of Origen and Pamphilus (De Vir. Illust. c. 113). In this library there was, as he informs us, the supposed Hebrew original of St. Matthew's Gospel (ibid. c. 3), which is probably the book (in the same collection) which he elsewhere describes as a Gospel in Syro-Chaldaic, used by the Nazarenes (Contra Pelag. iii. 2). In another work he says, "I have been somewhat diligent in searching for copies, and in the library of Eusebius at Caesarea I found six volumes of the Apology for Origen" (by Pamphilus) (C. Rufin. ii. 12). It contained copies of the greater part of the works of Origen, made by Pamphilus himself (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 75). The originals of the Hexapla were there, and Jerome corrected his copy from them (Comment. in Tit. iii. 9). Before the time of Jerome this library had fallen more or less into decay, but endeavours to restore it were made by two successors of Eusebius, viz. Acacius, 340, and Euzoius, 366 (Hieron. ad Marcell. u. s.). Of Euzoius, he says, on the authority of Thespesius Rhetor, that he "strove with great labour to refurnish with parchments the library of Origen and Pamphilus, which was already decayed" (De Vir. Illust. c. 113). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 636, asserts that the library of Pamphilus at Caesarea contained nearly 30,000 volumes (Orig. vi. 6).

There is extant the legal record of some proceedings that took place at Circa or Constantia, in Africa, during the persecution of 303-304. It relates that the officers "went to the church in which the Christians used to assemble, and spoiled it of chalices, lamps, &c., but when they came into the library (bibliothecam), the presses (armaria) there were found empty" (in Gesta apud Zenophilum, Optati Opp. App. ed. 1703; comp. August. c. Crescon. iii. 29). Constantine directs Eusebius the historian in a letter which the latter has preserved (De Vita Const. iv. 36) to cause to be written for the new churches in Constantinople, "by calligraphic artists, thoroughly skilled in the art, fifty volumes of the sacred writings, such as he knew to be most necessary for the supply and use of the church, on well-prepared parchments, legible and portable for use." Such a gift would, we may suppose, be in many cases the germ of a great church library. Julian the emperor, A.D. 362, orders Ecdicius the prefect of Egypt to send him the library of George, the Arian bishop of Alexandria: "See that all the books of George be sought out. For there were at his residence many philosophical, many rhetorical works, and many of the doctrine of the impious Galileans (Christians), which we could wish were all destroyed, but lest with these the more useful be made away with, let them also be carefully sought for. But let your guide in this search be the scribe [perhaps secretary] (vordaios) of George himself. . . . But I am myself acquainted with the books of George; for he lent me many, though not all, when I was in Cappadocia, for transcription, and had them back again" (Epist. Jul. 9). Julian was collecting books to enrich the library founded by Constantius in the portico of the imperial palace, and removed by himself to a more suitable edifice, which he had erected for the purpose. See Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana, ii. 9. 3. Hence it appears that the books of which the church was robbed did not return to her. Georgius Syncellus tells us that he had brought to him from the library of Caesarea in Cappadocia an excellent copy of the book of Kings, "in which was an inscription to the effect that the great and holy Basil (bishop of that see from 370 to 378) had himself compared and corrected the copies from which it had been transcribed" (Chronogr. p. 382; ed. Dindorf). St. Jerome, after referring a correspondent to several authorities, says, "Turn over the commentaries of all whom I have mentioned above; and make good use of the libraries of the churches; and thou wilt arrive more quickly at that which thou desirest and hast begun" (Epist. ad Iammach. 49, § 3; comp. Epist. 112, ad August. § 19). St. Augustine, writing at Hippo about the year 428, says, "I have heard that the holy Jerome wrote on heresies; but neither have we been able to find that little work of his in our own library, nor do we know from where it may be obtained" (De Hæc. sub fin.). When Augustine was dying, "he directed that the library of the church and all the books should be carefully kept for posterity for ever." He also left libraries to the church, "containing books and treatises by himself or other holy persons" (Possid. Vita Aug. 31). Theodosius the younger, 408-450, "collected the sacred books and their interpreters so diligently, as not to come behind Ptolemy" (Niceph. Call. Hist. Eccl. xiv. 3). Whether his collection was for the imperial library or the Patriarchium, we are not told; but the fact is worth noting, because it shews the spirit of the age. The leading ecclesiastics would not be behind the emperor. Hilary of Rome, A.D. 461, according to the Liber Pontificalis, "made two libraries in the Lateran baptistry" (Anast. Vit. Pont. 47). From the same authority we learn that the works of Gelasius, A.D. 482, were "kept laid up in the library and archive of the church" down to the 9th century (n. 50). Gregory I. A.D. 598, replying to the request of Eulogius of Alexandria that he would send him the Acts of the Martyrs collected by Eusebius, says, "Besides those things which are contained in the books of Eusebius himself concerning the deeds of the holy martyrs, I know none in the archives of this our church, or in the libraries of the city of Rome, except a few collected in the roll of a single book" (Epist. vii. 29). A narrative assigned to the year 649 or thereabout, shews that there was at that time a library already attached to St. Peter's. It is said that when Taio, bishop of Saragossa, who had been sent from Spain by king Chindasuind to procure the latter part of the Moralia of Gregory, could not learn from the pope or anyone else where it was, the very press in which it lay was pointed out to him in a vision, as he watched and prayed by night in that church (De Visione, etc., Labb. Conc. v. 1844). Willibald, A.D. 760, in the life of St. Boniface, says that the four books of St. Gregory were to his day put into the "libraries of churches" (Pertz, Monum. Germ. Hist. ii. 334). At this period, and earlier, as we learn from an epistle of Taio, above mentioned, few books were composed or copied in the west, and all were in danger of destruction, from the constant wars which desolated the Latin world (Epist. ad Quiricum; Præfat. Saec. ii. O. S. B. § v. lv. 17). His evidence refers to Spain, but the evil was felt at Rome equally, as we learn from a statement of the Roman synod in 680, to the emperors who had convened the 3rd council of Constantinople. After describing themselves as "settled in the northern and western parts" of the empire, the Latin bishops say, "We do not think that any one can be found in our time who can boast of great knowledge, seeing that in our regions the fury of various nations is every day raging, now in fighting, now in overrunning and plundering; whence our whole life is full of care, surrounded as we are by a band of nations, and having to live by bodily toil, the ancient maintenance of the churches having by degrees fallen away and failed through divers calamities" (Labbe, vi. 681). Agatho, then bishop of Rome, made this an excuse for the ignorance of his legates, whom he sent to the council, as he said, "out of the obedience which he owed" to the emperors, "not from any confidence in their knowledge" (ibid. 634). Bede (De Temp. Rat. 66, followed by Hincmar, Opus. 20 c. Hincm. Laud.) says that when they arrived at Constantinople they were "very kindly received by the most reverend defender of the Catholic faith Constantine (Pogonatus), and by him exhorted to lay aside philosophical [om. Hincm.] disputations, and to seek the truth in peaceable conference, all the books of the ancient fathers which they asked for being supplied them out of the library at Constantinople." The records of the council tell us that the same legates besought the emperor that the "original books of the patristic testimonies adduced might be brought from the Patriarchium" (Act. vi. Labb. vi. 719); and we find the bishop of Constantinople himself speaking of the "books of the holy and approved fathers which were laid up in his Patriarchium" (Act. viii. ibid. 730; comp. 751, 780). A large number of extracts from the fathers are said to have been compared with the originals in the "library of the Patriarchium" (Act. x. coll. 788, 790, 798, &c.) Several testimonies alleged are also said to have been compared with a "silver-bound parchment book belonging to the σκευοφυλάκιον of the most holy high church" in the same city (ibid. 813, 814, &c.). There was at Constantinople also a registry or repository of documents (χαρτοφυλάκιον, u.s. 963) under the charge of an officer called the χαρτοφύλαξ (ibid.). Whether this was a department of the library or distinct from it does not appear. The great esteem in which the church library at Constantinople was held by all parties is attested by the fact that the iconoclast Theophanes refused to look at a copy of Isaiah, brought from the emperor's library, alleging that all his books were corrupted, but asked for one from the library of the Patriarchium instead (Continuatio, iii. 14).

For some centuries after this the Greeks possessed advantages for the acquisition of knowledge over the Latins; though there were many in the west, especially among the bishops, who employed themselves in collecting and multiplying good books. Thus Bede says of Acca, who succeeded Wilfrid at Hexham, A.D. 710, that he "gathered together the histories of the sufferings (of the martyrs, &c.), with other ecclesiastical books most diligently, and made there a very large and noble library" (Hist. Eccl. v. 20). Egbertus, bishop of York from 732-766, is another example in our own country. Alcuin, in 796, writing to Charlemagne from Tours, where he had opened a school, says, "I am partly in want of books of scholastic erudition, that are somewhat difficult to be procured, which I had in my own country, through the good and most devoted diligence of my master, or my own labour, such as it was." He therefore desired that some youths might be sent into Britain to bring back whatever was necessary, "that there might not only be 'a garden enclosed' at York, but that there may be at Tours also 'plants, an orchard with pleasant fruits'" (Cant. iv. 13), (Epist. 38). From William of Malmesbury (De Gest. Reg. Angl. i.) we learn that the master of whom Alcuin speaks is Egbert of York. Alcuin also celebrates in verse the library which Aelbert, another bishop of York, attached to his cathedral church, and gives the names of many of the fathers, poets, and grammarians, whose works were contained in it (Poema de Pont. Ebor. ll. 1525 et seq. tom. ii. p. 257). In 787 a great stimulus was given to the formation of libraries in cathedral churches within the dominions of Charlemagne, by an order issued by him for the establishment of schools in connexion with them (Labbe, Conc. v. 1779). Such schools, as we have seen, implied a good collection of books. A later edict of the same prince, after providing that there be "set up schools of reading boys," adds, "Let them learn the psalms, notes, chants, the art of determining the seasons (computum), and grammar [in its ancient sense], in every monastery and episcopal church (episcopium). Let them also have Catholic books, well corrected" (Capit. ann. 789, c. 70). These laws of Charlemagne would certainly lead to the foundation of cathedral libraries where they had not existed before. It is probable that the smaller libraries found in connexion with many other churches owe their origin in a great measure to a similar edict of Lewis in 816. By this, bishops were ordered to "see that the Presbyters had a missal and lectionary and other books necessary to them" (c. 28; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 569). What some at least of these "other books," supposed to be necessary, were, we may gather from the following list in an ancient polyptychon, preserved in the church of St. Remigius, at Rheims: "A book of the gospels, a psalter, an antiphonary, a breviary [i.e. a table of the gospels for the year, in which they were indicated by their first and last words]. . . . a computus, an order of baptism, a martyrology, a penitential, a pasional, a volume of canons, forty homilies of St. Gregory" (ibid. ii. 1159). As soon as such a collection went beyond the requirements of the service, as in this case it did, the foundation of a church library was already laid.

II. We read of libraries attached to monasteries in the west at a somewhat early period. The rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530, speaks of the benefit to be derived from the reading of the Catholic fathers, their conferences, institutes, and lives (c. 73), in a manner which implies access to a considerable number of such works. Compare the rule of Ferreolus, A.D. 553 (c. 19). In Lent every monk under the rule of St. Benedict received a book "from the library" (bibliotheca), which he was to read through before he could have another (c. 48). The rule of Isidore, A.D. 595, enters into details: "Let the keeper of the sacrarium (here=secretarium) have charge of all the books; from whom let all the brethren receive them one at a time, which they shall carefully read and handle, and always return after vespers. Let the books be asked for every day at the first hour; and let none be given to him who shall ask later" (c. 9). To show the care with which the books were treated, we may mention that monks were allowed to have handkerchiefs in which to wrap them (Theodmar. Cassin. ad Car. Magn. in Capit. Reg. Franc. II. 1086), and that the council of Aix, 817, left it to the prior to determine, "when books had been received from the library," whether others should be given out or not (cap. 19). It would seem that, except in Lent, the ordinary monk did not have books out of the library for his private use; but the practice of reading aloud at meals implies a variety of suitable works. We hear of this even before the days of Benedict, viz. in the rule of Caesarius, A.D. 502: "While they eat at table, let no one speak, but let one read some book; that as the body is refreshed by food, so may the soul be refreshed by the word of God" (c. 9; comp. Reg. S. Ben. c. 38). Other times for reading were also appointed in some houses, as by the rule of Donatus for nuns, A.D. 640: "From the 2nd hour to the 3rd, if there be no need for them to work, let them employ themselves in reading . . . Let one of the elder read to the rest, as they work together" (c. 20).

Cassiodorus, who built, or entered, the monastery of Vivarium, about the year 562, collected books for it from the more distant parts of the world, and directed his monks that, if they met with any book that he wanted, they should make a copy of it, "that by the help of God and their labour, the library of the monastery might be benefited" (De Instit. Div. Litt. 8). In the preface to his work on Orthography, he gives a list of twelve books on the subject which he used in compiling his own. As he was then 93 years old, they were presumably all at hand in his own monastery. The fact suggests a good collection of works on general subjects, as well as on divinity. Among the Epistles of Gregory I. is one written (A.D. 599) to the Defensor of Naples representing that the books of the monastery of Macharis had in a time of trouble been carried into Sicily by a certain presbyter, who had died and left them there, and requiring that they should be restored (Epist. viii. 15). The monks of our own country were not behind others in collecting books. E.g. Benedict Biscop, abbat of Wearmouth, having visited Rome in 671, "brought home not a few books of all divine erudition, either bought with a set price or given to him by the kindness of friends, and when on his return he came to Vienne he received those which he had bought and intrusted to friends there" (Bede, Hist. Abbat. Wirem. § 4). In 678 he paid another visit to Rome, and then "brought home an innumerable quantity of books of every kind" (ibid. 5). "A great quantity of sacred volumes" was part of the result of a third visit in 686 (§ 8). In his last illness he gave directions that "the very noble and complete library, which he had brought from Rome, as necessary for the instruction of the church, should be anxiously preserved entire, and neither suffer injury through want of care nor be dispersed" (9). This collection, which was divided between the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, was "doubled" by the zeal of his successor, Coelfrid (12). It is to these libraries chiefly that we owe the learning of Bede. The order of Charlemagne in 787 already mentioned was addressed to abbats as well as bishops, and the only copy extant is that which was sent to the abbat of Fulda. It is interesting to know that less than 50 years after its promulgation, the famous Rabanus Maurus built a library there, which he amply stored with books (Vita per Rodolf. in Cave, Hist. Litt. nom. Raban). A beginning had been made, however, so far back as 754. When Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, was murdered by the Pagans at Dokem in east Frisia, they "broke open the repository of books . . . and scattered those which they found, some over the level fields, others in the reed-bed of the marshes, and flung and hid others away in all sorts of places." They were afterwards found and taken to Fulda, where three of them are still shewn, viz. a New Testament, a book of the Gospels, said to have been written by the martyr himself, and a volume stained with his blood, containing, with other tracts of St. Ambrose, de Spiritu Sancto and Bono Mortis (Willibaldi Vita S. Bonif. xi. 37, and Mabillon's note). In 799 Charlemagne founded an abbey at Charroux, which "he enriched with many relics and most munificent gifts brought to him from the east, and with a very rich library" (Gallia Christiana, ii. 1278). Many monastic libraries were destroyed by fire in the 9th and following centuries, in several of which books must have been accumulating during a lengthened period. For example, in 870, when the Danes destroyed the minster of Medhamsted (Peterborough), founded about 656, "a vast library of sacred books was burned with the charters of the monastery" (Ann. Bened. iii. 167, § 16, from Ingulf.). In 892 the monastery at Teano, near Monte Cassino, was burned down, "in which fire most of the deeds and instruments of the Cassinates were consumed, with the very autograph of the rule which the holy father Benedict had written with his own hand" (ibid. p. 283, § 67). About the year 900, the Hungarians destroyed the monastery of Nonantula by fire, and "burned many books" (ibid. 305, § 30).

We can give no certain information on the origin and condition of monastic libraries in the east during the period to which we are confined. We may, however, infer with great probability that monasteries began very early to collect books, from the fact that manuscripts of the highest antiquity are found in them at the present day. About 400 volumes of MSS. are now in the British Museum, which were brought in the years 1839, 1842, 1847 from a single Syrian monastery, viz. that of St. Mary Deipara, in the Desert of Nitria, or Valley of Scete. As a proof of the antiquity of some of these books, we may mention that the three volumes in which occur the several copies of the Epistles of St. Ignatius published by Mr. Cureton are, one earlier than 550, another some 50 or 60 years later, and the third "certainly not later than the 7th or 8th century" (Corpus Ignatianum, Introd. xxvii. xxxiii.). In the second of these volumes is a notice curiously similar to one quoted above respecting an English abbat, to the effect that Moses of Nisibis, the superior of the monastery, "gave diligence and acquired that book together with many others, being 250, many of which he purchased, and others were given to him by some persons as a blessing [see EULOGIAE (5)], when he went to Bagdad" (xxx.). This bears date A.D. 931. The MS. bible found by Tischendorf (1844, 1859) in the monastery of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, is assigned to the 4th century (Nov. Test. Sinait. Tisch. Proleg. ix.). He obtained many other books from the same library, and many from monasteries in Palestine, at Berytus, Laodicea, Smyrna, in Patmos, and at Constantinople (Notitia Edit. Cod. Sinait. p. 7). In his collection, now at St. Petersburg, are various Greek fragments of the 5th and 6th centuries (ibid. p. 56); five of the New Testament of the 6th and 7th; and one of the 7th or 8th (p. 50); parts of some Homilies of St. Chrysostom (p. 55), and some liturgical remains of the 8th (p. 56); all in the same language; and a Syriac version of hymns and sermons by Gregory Nazianzen written in the 7th (p. 64). We do not multiply such facts, because, though very probable indications of the existence of monastic libraries in the East within our period, and of the nature of their contents, they do not amount to a direct and positive proof. [W. E. S.]

LIBRARIUS. The word librarius has two meanings—viz. either a 'book-seller' or a 'transcriber': we are concerned with it in the latter sense. Of course there must have been transcribers in abundance before Christian times, if, as is said, the libraries of the Ptolemies at Alexandria, and of the kings of Pergamus in Asia Minor contained between them a million volumes and upwards in all languages (DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANTS. art. 'Bibliotheca'). Transcribers were frequently slaves at first, or else worked for money, and were not well paid. Hence the endless complaints of their ignorance, carelessness, or dishonesty which occur in the Fathers as well as in classical authors (Wower, de Polymath. c. 18, ap. Gronov. Thes. x. 1079). But with Christian times the office of transcriber for libraries insensibly passed into better hands. It was not that he became, strictly speaking, a public functionary, but he copied far more frequently for ecclesiastical bodies than for private persons: and was, in most cases, a member of the body for which he worked. Thus he worked, not for money, but as a duty: and not on chance books, but on books carefully selected for their contents by his superiors. This altered the character of his performances materially, besides going far to ensure their preservation. It is a simple fact in history, that Christianity stands between us and the written records of all preceding ages, and is our sole guarantee for their trustworthiness in their present state.

Origen was one of the first Christians who is said to have employed transcribers regularly for literary purposes (βιβλιογράφους, Euseb. E. H. vi. 23). Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, his friend and patron, was one of the first to form an episcopal library, which Eusebius found of great use in collecting facts for his history (ib. c. 20). Eusebius himself, by order of the emperor Constantine, had 50 choice copies of the scriptures made by experienced caligraphists on vellum, arranged in ternions and quaternions (Vit. Const. iv. 34-7, and Vales. ad l.). Pamphilus, the presbyter and martyr, with whom Eusebius was so intimate, enriched Caesarea with a large library, consisting of the works of Origen and other ecclesiastical writers, transcribed by himself (ib. c. 32, comp. St. Hier. de Vir. Illust. s. v.): and it was still in existence, and handy for readers, when St. Jerome wrote. [LIBRARIES.]

When parchment was scarce, one work was often effaced to make way for another. This may have been dictated here and there by religious prejudice: but in general what was least wanted at the time made way for what was most. The Scriptures themselves, or the works of the Areopagite—then regarded with almost equal reverence—were written over sometimes, as well as works like the Republic of Cicero—"Latent hodie," says Knittel (quoted by Mone, de Libr. Palimp. p. 2) in palimpsestis libris codices Novi Testamenti remotissimæ antiquitatis: hæc est prima ratio, cur magnæ sint utilitatis codices rescripti."

We must never forget, in estimating their practices or productions, that Christian transcribers were of all ranks and capacities. "The highest dignitaries of the church and princes even, says Mr. Taylor (Transmission of Ancient Books, c. ii. § 5), "thought themselves well employed in transcribing the Gospels and Epistles, the Psalter, or the Homilies and Meditations of the Fathers: nor were the classical authors....neglected by these gratuitous copyists." And again: "Every church and every convent and monastery had its library, its librarian and other officers employed in the conservation of books" (ib. c. 1, § 1). Then, further, as Mr. Taylor observes, "The property of each establishment—and the literary property of each establishment was always highly prized—passed down from age to age, as if under the hand of a proprietor: and was therefore subjected to fewer dispersions and destructions than the mutability of human affairs ordinarily permits" (c. i. § 1). And again: "The places in which the remains of ancient literature were preserved during the middle ages were too many, and too distant from each other, and too little connected by any kind of intercourse, to admit of a combination or conspiracy for any supposed purposes of interpolation or corruption. Possessing, therefore, as we do, copies of the same author, some of which were drawn from the monasteries of England, others from Spain, and others collected in Egypt, Palestine, or Asia Minor, if, on comparing them, we find that they accord except in variations of little moment, we have an incontestable proof of the care and integrity with which the business of transcription was generally conducted" (ib.)....Transcribers were frequently concealed under other names, from being attached to some special office, or else from their art having come to be divided into different branches. They were the notaries, chancellors, clerks, readers, amanuenses, of most convents, as Mabillon shews (Dipl. i. 13). St. Isidore tells us of another distinction which is still more to the point. "Librarii," he says, "idem et antiquarii vocantur: sed librarii sunt, qui et nova et vetera scribunt: antiquarii, qui tantummodo vetera, unde et nomen sumpserunt" (Etym. vi. 14). If this be true, and other authorities might be cited for it, there was a class of copyists whose labours were confined to re-transcribing old MSS.

Illuminators, again, formed another branch of the profession. They designed the initial letters, laid on the gold, or painted the miniatures. Under this last word, again, we have the record of another class: miniatores, who filled in the 'rubrics.' In general, the tran-scriber left blanks both for the rubrics and illuminations, as we see from many MSS. whose blank spaces have been but partially filled, or left altogether untouched. Sometimes it happened that there were transcribers who did all for themselves. Otherwise, we may occasionally find the dates of the handwriting and of the decorations separated by a wide interval. [MINIATURE.]

After a MS. had been transcribed, it passed through other hands to be corrected (Mabill. Suppl. c. xiii. 29): and the corrections in many cases not being erasures, we see what was judged erroneous, and what was judged right at the time. They are perhaps oftener corrections of spelling, or of words omitted, than of anything else: while numerous errors of grammar are left untouched.

Handwriting, of course, varied with the age, though two or more were almost always in full use at the same time. The handwriting of the 13th century, for instance, was always liable to be imitated by transcribers who lived much later, but it was unknown to transcribers who lived much earlier. Antiquaries could reproduce obsolete styles, but could not anticipate styles as yet unborn. Consequently, the rise of the different styles may be fixed with some accuracy; not so their duration after they had become current.

"The instruments," say the authors of the Now. Trait. Diplom. (p. ii. § i. c. 10), "with which antiquity required that the work-room of a transcriber should be provided, were the ruler, compass, lead, scissors, penknife, hone, sponge, style, brush, quill or reed, inkstand or inkhorn, writing table, desk, vial with liquid for thinning ink become too thick, vial with vermilion for writing titles of books or chapters, and a box of pounce. Each of these instruments had its own special use."

Their materials were more limited. "Parchement," says Mr. Taylor (c. ii. § 1), "so called, long after the time of its first use from Pergamus, a city of Mysia, where the manufacture was improved . . . is mentioned by Herodotus and Ctesias as a material that had been from time immemorial used for books." Almost all the early MSS. we possess are written on this. "In the east, leaves of the mallow or palm were used in remote times . . . and the inner bark of the linden or teil tree . . . called by the Romans 'liber,' and by the Greeks 'biblos,' was so generally used as a material for writing as to have given its name to a book in both languages. . . . Tables of solid wood called codices, whence the term 'codex' for a MS. on any material . . . were also employed . . . leaves or tablets of lead or ivory are mentioned . . . and still oftener 'tablets covered with a thin coat of coloured wax,' removable 'by an iron needle called a style.' Paper made from the papyrus in Egypt was in considerable demand at one time, but it was found to be less durable than parchment. Cotton paper, 'charta bombacina,' which began to be used in the west about the 10th century, led to the introduction of paper from rags, as at present, about two centuries later.

"Transcribers frequently subscribed their names at the end of a MS., with the year in which it was written, accompanied by a pious wish that posterity might profit by its perusal, and other particulars; numerous instances might be cited. The celebrated 'codex Amiatinus,' used by Tischendorf in his latest edition of the Vulgate of the Old Testament, has an inscription at the end of the book of Exodus, from which he infers it was transcribed by one of the disciples of St. Benedict named 'Servandus,' about A.D. 541" (Proleg. p. viii. ix.). Mabillon, in his Diarium Italicum, mentions a MS. of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, inscribed with the name of Theophylact, presbyter and doctor of law, and dated 6492 from the Creation, or A.D. 984 (c. 25). This was in Greek. Another, the Life of St. Gregory the Great, by John the deacon, in Latin, has the following: "Ego, Ugo, indignus sacerdos, inchoavi hunc librum 8 Cal. Sept. et explevi eum 14 Cal. Oct. feliciter concurrente sexto, indict. 15." Another, a work of Matthew Palmer the poet: "Antonius, Marri filius, Florentinus civis atque notarius, transcripsit Florentiae ab originali 11 Cal. Jan. MCCCCXLVIII. Valeas qui legas." . . . (Ib. and comp. c. 27.) "Qui legis, orate pro me," was another pious and favourite parting sentence.* Most of the oldest MSS., however unfortunately, supply no such clue to their authorship or date, and there are very few that have not had later additions appended to them, often in the same handwriting, which throw doubts upon their earlier parts. Often, again, the same work has not been copied all through by the same scribe; and sometimes the writing of contemporary scribes varies as much as the writing of one age from another. Dedicatory pieces again, especially when in verse, are apt to mislead. Sometimes it is their complimentary vagueness, sometimes it is the affectation of a higher antiquity than really belongs to them, that has enhanced the value of a MS. unduly. When Waterland, for instance, speaks of the Vienna MS. as "a Gallican psalter, written in letters of gold, and presented by Charlemagne, while only king of France, to pope Adrian I., at his first entrance upon the pontificate, in the year 772" (Crit. Hist. p. 101), he draws his conclusion from the dedicatory verses in gold letters at its commencement. But these might have been written by any king Charles, on giving this psalter to any pope Adrian. And there was a combination of just such another king, and just such another pope in Charles the Bald and Adrian II.

LIGATURAE (Ligamenta, Ligamina, Alligaturae, Suballigaturae, δέσεις, καταδέσεις, καταδεσμοί, περιάμματα, περίπαιτα) were amulets or phylacteries bound (ligatae) to any part of the body of man or beast, in the hope of averting or driving away evil. The name was, however, often given to amulets attached to the person in any other way; as when suspended, in which case they were sometimes called by the Greeks ἐξαρτήματα. This is one among many gainful superstitions which St. Chrysostom charged "certain of the vagabond Jews" (Acts xix. 13) with practising, as their fathers had done before them. Thus he says to Christians to whom they promised health by such means: "If thou persevere for a short time, and spurn and with great contumely cast out of the house those who seek to sing some incantation over, or to bind some periapta to the body, thou hast at once received refreshment from thy conscience" (Adv. Jud. Hom. viii. § 7). The heathen were equally addicted to their use. Two or three examples out of many given by Pliny in his Natural History will suffice to shew this. Wool stolen from a shepherd, bound to the left arm, was supposed to cure fever (xxix. 4); the large-tined horns of the stag-beetle bound to infants "acquired the nature of amulets" (xxx. 15). A stone taken from the head of an ox bound to an infant relieved it in teething (ibid.). As the ox was believed to spit this stone out, if it saw death coming, its head must be cut off suddenly. These facts may serve to indicate the source of the superstition among Christians. Until the conversion of the emperors this practice was regarded by all as magic and unlawful. Thus Tertullian (A.D. 192) says of the wound caused by the bite of a scorpion, "Magic binds something round it; medicine meets it with steel and cup" (Scorpiac.). In the Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled about the end of the 2nd century, bishops are forbidden to receive as catechumens those who "make ligaturae" (περιάμματα, viii. 32). The earliest intimation of their use by professed Christians occurs in the 36th canon of the Council of Laodicea, held probably about 365: "It is unlawful for those of the sacerdotal and clerical orders . . . to make phylacteries, which are the bonds of their souls. We have ordered those who wear them to be cast out of the church." It is implied here that these "phylacteries" were bound on, i.e. were ligaturae. When Martin of Braga (A.D. 560) made his collection of canons, he rendered the word "phylacteries" by "ligaturae" (can. 59; Labbe, v. 912). The words were, in fact, treated by many as synonyms, except when the Jewish practice mentioned in Scripture was intended. Of this we shall have further proof as we proceed. St. Epiphanius (A.D. 368) explains that the "phylacteries" of Matt. xxiii. 5 are not "periapts," as might be supposed "from the circumstance that some called periapts phylacteries" (Haer. 15, c. Scribas). When a distinction was made by Christian writers, the name of phylactery was restricted to those ligaturae which had writing in them. Thus Boniface at the council of Liptines, A.D. 743: "If any presbyter or clerk shall observe auguries . . . or phylacteries, id est scripturas, let him know that he is subject to the penalties of the canons" (Stat. 33). To proceed: St. Basil, in Cappadocia (A.D. 370) seems to imply an extensive recourse to such amulets by Christians: "Is thy child sick? Thou lookest about for a charmer, or one who puts vain characters about the neck of innocent infants, or at last goest to the physician and to medicines, without any thought of Him who is able to save" (in Psalm xlv. 2). Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia (A.D. 385) warns his neophytes against all such practices as among the "abominations of the Gentiles" and "by-ways of idolatry." "Deeds of witchcraft, incantations, suballigaturae, . . . are parts of idolatry" (Tract. iv. de Lect. Exodi). St. Augustine, in Africa, speaks of our subject in writings ranging from 397 to 426. Thus after mention of several "superstitious" practices, he says, "To this class belong also all ligaturae and remedies which even the science of the physicians condemns, whether in precantations or in certain marks which they call characters, or in any object to be suspended and bound on," &c. (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30). A reference to earrings in this passage is cleared up by another (Ep. ad Possid. 245, § 2), "The execrable superstition of ligatures, wherein even the earrings of men are made to serve as pendants at the tops of the ears on one side" (De Doctr. Chr. in summo aurium singularum) is not practised to please men, but to serve devils." Here, it will be observed, objects that were merely suspended are called ligaturae. In a sermon to the people the same father says, "One of the faithful is lying bed-ridden, is tormented by pains; prays, is not heard; or rather is heard, but is proved, is exercised: the son is scourged that he may be received back. Then when he is tortured by pains, comes the temptation of the tongue. Some wretched woman or man, if he is to be called a man, comes to his bedside, and says, 'Make that ligature and thou wilt be well. Such and such persons (ask them) did it and were made well by it.' He does not yield, nor obey, nor incline his heart; yet he has a struggle. He has no strength, and conquers the devil. He becomes a martyr on his bed, crowned by Him, who for him hung on the tree" (Serm. 285, § 7). Compare a strictly parallel passage in Serm. 318, § 3. Elsewhere he says, that the "evil spirits devise for themselves certain shadows of honour, that so they may deceive the followers of Christ; and this so far . . . that even they who seduce by ligaturae, precantations, by machinations of the enemy, mix the name of Christ with their precantations" (Tract. vii. in Ev. Joan, § 6). Again, "When thy head aches, we praise thee, if thou hast put the gospel to thy head, and not had recourse to a ligatura. For the weakness of men has gone so far, and men who fly to ligaturae are so much to be bewailed, that we rejoice when we see that a bedridden man tossed with fever and pains has placed his hope in nothing but in the application of the gospel to his head; not because it was done to this end, but because the gospel has been preferred to ligaturae" (ibid. § 12). St. Chrysostom (398) is witness to the prevalence of the superstition both in Syria and Greece, e.g. in a homily preached at Antioch, "What should one say of periapts, and bells hung from the hand and the scarlet thread, and the rest, full of great folly? while nothing ought to be put round the child, but the protection of the cross. But now He who hath converted the world . . . is despised, and woof and warp and such ligaturae (περιάμματα) are intrusted with the safety of the child" (Hom. xii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 7). "What should we say of those who use incantations and periapts, and bind brass coins of Alexander the Macedonian about their heads and feet?" (Ad Ilum. Catech. ii. 5). He says of Job that he did not, when sick, "bind periapts about him" (Adv. Judae. Hom. viii. § 6); and of Lazarus that "he did not bind plates of metal (πέταλα) on himself" (ibid.). "Some," he says, "tied about them the names of rivers" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Col. § 5). It appears that some alleged the compatibility of such practices with a sound belief. Hence St. Chrysostom warns his hearers, that "though they who have to do with periapts offer numberless subtle excuses for them, as that 'we call on God and nothing more,' and that 'the old woman is a Christian and one of the faithful,' it is nevertheless idolatry" (ibid.). He bids them as Christians make the sign of the cross, and to know no other remedy out of medicine (ibid.). Like St. Augustine he encourages the sufferer to resist the temptation to use amulets by telling him that patience has the merit of martyrdom: "Thou hast fallen into a sore disease, and there are present many who would force thee to relieve the malady, some by incantations, others by ligaturae (περιάμματα), some by some other means? Through the fear of God thou hast borne up nobly and with constancy, and wouldst choose to suffer anything rather than endure to commit any act of idolatry? This wins the crown of martyrdom," &c. (Hom. iii. § 5, in Ep. i. ad Thess. Comp. Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Col. u.s.). In France Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502) denounces the use of "diabolical phylacteries hung" on the person (Serm. 66, § 5). Gregory of Tours (A.D. 573) speaks of a hariolus who "mutters charms, casts lots, hangs ligaturae from the neck" of a sick boy (Mirac. ii. 45). In another case which he relates, to expel "the noonday demon," they applied "ligamina of herbs," with incantations (De Mir. S. Mart. iv. 36). In a third, the parents of the patient, "as the custom is of country people, carried to him ligamenta and potions from the fortune-tellers and soothsayers" (ibid. i. 26). Isidore of Seville, in Gothic Spain, writing in 636, copies in his Etymologicon (viii. 9) the passage cited above from St. Augustine, de Doctr. Christ. St. Eloy, bishop of Noyon, A.D. 640: "Let no Christian presume to hang ligamina on the necks of man or any animal whatsoever, even though it be done by clerks, and it be said that it is a holy thing and contains divine lections" (De Rect. Cath. Convers. § 5). In 742, Boniface, writing to Zacharias of Rome on the difficulties put in his way by the report of scandals tolerated in that city, says that his informants declared that they saw there among other relics of paganism, "women with phylacteries and ligaturae, bound, in pagan fashion, on their arms and legs, and publicly offering them for sale to others" (Epist. 49). The pope, in reply, says that he has already endeavoured to suppress these superstitions (Epist. i. 9). Boniface himself, the next year at the council of Liptines, sanctioned a decree for the abolition of all pagan practices. A list of them was appended to it, and in this we find, "Phylacteries and Ligaturae" (n. 10). In the 6th book of the Carolingian Capitularies is the following law: "That phylacteries or false writings, or ligaturae, which the ignorant think good for fevers and other diseases, be on no account made by clerks or laymen, or by any Christian, for they are the insignia of magic art" (cap. 72). Instead of such means, prayer and the unction prescribed by St. James are to be used. By the 42nd canon of the council of Tours (813) priests are directed to admonish the people that "ligaturae of bones or herbs applied to any mortal thing (man or beast) are of no avail, but are snares and deceits of the old enemy" (Sim. Add. iii. Capit. Reg. Franc. cap. 93). When the Bulgarians, A.D. 866, asked Nicholas I. if they might retain their custom of "hanging a ligatura under the throat of the sick," he replied, "ligaturae of this kind are phylacteries invented by the craft of the devil, and are proved to be bonds for men's souls" (Epist. 97, § 79). Probably we shall not be wrong in inferring from the foregoing testimonies that the practice prevailed at one time or another in every part of Christendom. It is also probable that it suggested the manner of many attempts to cure by those who looked solely for divine aid. E.g. St. Cuthbert (A.D. 685) sent a linen belt to the abbess Elfed, who was sick. "She girded herself with it," and was healed. The same belt "bound round" the head of a nun cured her of headache (Baeda, Vita S. Cuthb. c. 23).

In the 8th century we find a name of profession applied to those who offered to cure by means of ligaturae: "We decree that none become caucalatores and enchanter, nor storm-raisers, nor obligators." (See Conc. Aquisgr. (A.D. 789), can. 63 (Labbe, 64); Capit. Car. M. et Lud. P. i. 62; vi. 374.) Similarly in a later law of Charlemagne (c. 40; Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 518).

LIGHTHOUSE (Pharos). The lighthouse, as a symbol of the happy termination of the voyage of life, is of frequent occurrence in the cemeteries of the early Christians. Sometimes a ship in full sail appears to be steering towards it (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 372, but it is often found without the ship, as in the monumental slab of FIRMIA VICTORIA (Fabretti, Inscript. Ant. p. 566), in which, appearing with the crown and palm branch, and in conjunction with the name Victoria, it plainly typifies the triumphant close of a Christian career.

A kind of tower in four stories, crowned with flame, bearing an exact resemblance to a funeral pyre, is found on some imperial medals, particularly on those of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus (Mionnet, De la rareté et du prix des Médailles Romaines, t. i. pp. 218, 226, 241). This symbol, however, though it misled Fabretti, does not appear to have any Christian significance (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Phare). [C.]

LIGHTNING, PRAYER AGAINST.

Among the prayers for special occasions which follow the general form of office for a Lite in the Greek church, to be embodied in it as occasion shall serve [v. LITE], is one to be used in the time of danger from thunder and lightning. The prayer is too long to quote; it contains a confession of sin, an appeal to God's mercy, and an earnest supplication that he would assuage the fury of the elements.

In the Roman Ritual, under the head de Processionibus, we find "Preces ad repellendam tempestatem." The order is as follows:

The bells are rung, and those who are able to attend assemble in the church, and the ordinary litanies are said, in which the clause "a fulgure et tempestate, R. Libera nos Domine," is said twice: and after the litany and the Lord's prayer, Ps. 147 (147, v. 12, E. V. Laudate Jerusalem). Then follow some preces or versicles, said by the priest and people alternately, and the office concludes with five collects, and aspersion. Of the collects, the first is of an ordinary penitential character. The last four are these:

"A domo tua, quæsumus Domine spiritales nequitiae repellantur, et aeriarum discedat malignitas tempestatum."

"Omnipotens sempiterne Deus, parce metuentibus, propitiare supplicibus: ut post noxios ignes nubium, et vim procellarum, in misericordiam transeat laudis comminatio tempestatum."

"Domine Jesu, qui imperasti ventis et mari, et facta fuit tranquillitas magna, exaudi preces familie tue, ut hoc signo sanctæ crucis et omnis discedat sævitia tempestatum."

"Omnipotens et misericors Deus, quo nos et castigando sanas, et ignoscendo conservas: præsta supplicibus tuis ut et tranquillitatis optata^b consolationis lætemur, et dono tue pietatis semper utamur. Per."

The Roman missal contains a mass "contra tempestates" in which the collect is the first of these four collects, and the post-communion the last.

In the Ambrosian ritual there is a "Benedictio contra aeris tempestatem," of the same type as that in the Roman.

The clergy and people kneel before the high altar, where the tabernacle of the sacrament is opened, and after Deus in adjutorium, &c., these Psalms are said: 1, 14 [E. V. 15]; 53 [E. V. 54]; 69 [E. V. 70]; 86 [E. V. 87]; 92 [E. V. 93].

Then follow the Litanies, Pater noster, some preces, and two prayers, each much longer than the corresponding Roman collects, but to the same effect, and the office ends with an aspersion with holy water at the door of the church.

^a This collect is quoted by Martene (ii. 302) from an old MS. of cir. A.D. 500.

LIGHTS, THE CEREMONIAL USE OF

OF. It may be safely affirmed that for more than 300 years there was no ceremonial use of lighted candles, torches, or lamps in the worship of the Christian church. This is evident from the language of early writers, when they have occasion to refer to the heathen practice of burning lights in honour of the gods. Tertullian, for example, A.D. 205, ridicules the custom of "exposing useless candles at noon-day" (Apol. xlvi.), and "encroaching on the day with lamps" (ibid. xxxv.). "Let them," he says, "who have no light, kindle their lamps daily" (De Idolol. xv.). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "They burn lights as to one dwelling in darkness . . . Is he to be thought in his right mind who offers for a gift the light of candles and wax tapers to the author and giver of light? . . . But their gods, because they are of the earth, need light that they may not be in darkness; whose worshippers, because they have no sense of heaven, bring down to the earth even those superstitions to which they are enslaved" (Instit. vi. 2). Gregory Nazianzen, about 70 years later, says, "Let not our dwellings blaze with visible light; for this indeed is the custom of the Greek holy-moon; but let not us honour God with these things, and exalt the present season with unbecoming rites, but with purity of soul and cheerfulness of mind, and with lamps that enlighten the whole body of the church; that is to say, with divine contemplations and thoughts," &c. (Orat. v. § 35). The reader will observe that the objection is not to the use of lights in idolatrous worship only, but to all ceremonial use of them, even in the worship of the true God.

I. There was, however, already by the end of the 3rd century a partial use of lights in honour of martyrs, which would greatly facilitate their introduction as ritual accessories to worship at a later period. We learn this in the first instance from their prohibition by the council of Illiberis in Spain, probably about the year 305: "It is decreed that wax candles be not kindled in a cemetery during the day; for the spirits of the saints ought not to be disquieted" (can. 34). By the saints we must here understand the faithful who went to the martyria for prayer. This is the explanation of Binius, Dupin, Mendoza, and others. They would certainly be more or less distracted by the presence of the lights, and they might fear to excite the attention of the heathen by them. Many, if we may infer from the language of the writers quoted above, would be offended at the rite itself. The practice, nevertheless, maintained its ground in Spain and elsewhere. For at the beginning of the next century, we find it attacked by Vigilantius, himself a Spaniard, of Barcelona. Jerome, who replied to him, does not deny that such a custom existed. His language even shews that he did not in his heart disapprove of it; but he pleads that it was due to the "ignorance and simplicity of laymen, or at least of superstitious (religiosorum) women," who "had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Speaking for the church at large he says, "We do not, as you groundlessly slander us, burn wax tapers in clear light, but that we may by this means of relief moderate the darkness of the night, and watch till dawn." Yet he inconsistently defends the practice which Vigilantius condemned, comparing those who supplied the lights "in honour of the martyrs" to her who poured ointment on our Lord (Contra Vigilant. § 8).

II. In the time of St. Jerome we first hear of another practice, which would inevitably end in the ceremonial use of lights; viz. their employment as a decoration in churches on festivals. This is first mentioned by Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 407, who thus describes his own custom on the feast of St. Felix, to whom his church there was dedicated: "The bright altars are crowned with lamps thickly set. Lights are burnt odorous with waxed papyri. They shine by night and day: thus night is radiant with the brightness of the day, and the day itself, bright in heavenly beauty, shines yet more with light doubled by countless lamps" (Poem. xiv. Nat. 3, l. 99; comp. P. xix. N. 11, ll. 405, &c.). This does not prove his common use of lights by day, but that is made probable by another poem, in which, describing apparently the ordinary appearance of his church, he says:—

"Tectoque superne
Pendentes Lychni spiris retinentur abenis,
Et medio in vacuo laxis vaga lumina nutant
Funibus: undantes flammas levis aura fatigat."
Poem. xxxvii. Nat. ix. l. 389.

If such a practice prevailed in any degree during the 4th century, it probably affords the explanation needed in the well-known story of Epiphanius, who once, when passing through a country place called Anablathia, "saw, as he went by, a lamp burning, and on inquiring what place that was, learnt that it was a church" (Epist. ad Joan. Hieros.).

III. The ritual use of lights for which such a custom prepared the way would probably have been only occasional for many ages, but for the conditions under which the worship of Christians was held during the first 300 years. Secrecy was necessary when persecution was active, and great privacy at all times. This led to their assembling after the daylight had failed, or before the sun rose. When the disciples at Troas "came together to break bread," it was evening, "and there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together" (Acts xx. 7, 8). Pliny the younger, some 50 years later, told the emperor that the Christians were in the habit of meeting for common worship "before it was light" (Epp. lib. x. n. 97). From Tertullian (De Coronâ, iii.) we learn that it was the custom of his day to "take the sacrament of the Eucharist in assemblies held before dawn." The fear of discovery which induced this precaution caused them also to avail themselves of the catacombs and other subterranean places in which, while they were more free to choose their time of meeting, the natural darkness of the place itself would make artificial light essential. St. Jerome, speaking of the catacombs at Rome at a time when they were no longer in use for Christian worship, says, "They are all so dark that to enter into them is, in the language of the psalmist, like going down into hell" (Comment. in Ezek. lib.

xii. c. xl.). Some of the first churches even were, for the reason that we have indicated, built under ground. There is one still to be seen at Lyons, containing the remains of St. Irenaeus, "fort profonde et fort obscure," which is believed to be "one of the first churches in which the first Christians of Lyons used to assemble" (De Moleon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 71). Now there is every reason to believe that the necessary lights of this period became the ceremonial lights of the next. We do not know when they ceased to be necessary. Even in the 7th and 8th centuries, the station before the celebration of the Eucharist on high festivals still began at daybreak (Ordo Rom. i. 4; ii. 1; iii. 3; Musae. Ital. tom. ii.). They could hardly be needed to give light at that time; but a mystic meaning, already attached to them, must have led to their retention. The following is a description of their use in a pontifical mass of that period. When the bishop left the secretarium, he was preceded by 7 acolytes, each bearing a lighted wax candle (Ordo R. i. 8; ii. 5; iii. 7). As they came near the altar, they divided, 4 going to the right, and 3 to the left, that he might pass through. When the deacon went to the ambo to read the Gospel two of the lights were carried before him in honour of the book which he bore in his hands (i. 11; ii. 8; iii. 10). Our earliest authority now quoted does not tell us whether the lights were extinguished at any part of the service; but according to the next in date they were "extinguished in their place after the reading of the Gospel" (ii. 9). This was clearly a reminiscence of their original use. From the first two we learn that after the Kyrie the acolytes set the candle-stands (cereo-stata) on the floor (i. 26; ii. 5; comp. v. 6). The second further tells us that they were put "4 on the right and 3 on the left, or (as some will have it) in a row from south to north" (ii. 5). At a later period they were set "so as to form a cross" (vi. 5). After the Collect they were in the earlier age put "in one line from east to west, in the middle of the church" (ii. 6). In a later, we find them when extinguished set behind the altar (v. 7)—a practice which, in conjunction with the need of light at an early celebration, in due time paved the way for the introduction of altar-lights. The earliest document to which we have here referred is supposed by Ussher, Cave, and others to have been compiled about the year 730; but it evidently did not create all the rites which it prescribes. We therefore assume that those now described were practised at Rome at least during the latter part of the 7th century.

IV. To the same period we may, on the same grounds, refer the office of the TENEBRAE in its first stage. It was celebrated on the night before Good Friday. One-third of the lights in the church were extinguished after the first psalm of Nocturns; another third after the second, and the remainder, with the exception of seven lamps, after the third. These seven were extinguished at Matins; the first on the right side of the church, when the antiphon before the first psalm was heard; the second, on the left, at the end of the psalm, "and so on either side alternately down to the Gospel, i.e. the Benedictus; but at the Gospel the middle light is put out" (Ordo, i. 33; comp. App. § 2).

V. The Paschal Light (Paschal Post, Cereus Paschalis) is heard of at an earlier period. We have an almost certain reference to it in the Liber Pontificalis, where we are told (n. 42), that Zosimus, A.D. 417, "gave permission for the blessing of candles in the suburbicarian dioceses." Some copies (Concil. Surii, Annal. Baronii) even read cereum Paschalem here, and the passage can hardly refer to anything else. This was the tradition of Sigebert of Gemblours: "Zosimus the pope orders a wax candle to be blessed throughout the churches on the holy Sabbath of Easter" (ad ann. 417; Biblioth. PP. vii. 1358). Similarly Leo Ostiensis, Chron. Cassin. iii. 31). Two forms for the benediction of the Paschal Light were composed by Ennodius, who became bishop of Ticino in 511. They are still extant (see his works by Sirmond, Opusc. 9, 10, p. 453). Gregory the Great, writing in 605 to a bishop who was sick, says, "Let the prayers which in the city of Ravenna are wont to be said over the wax candle, and the expositions of the gospel which are made by the bishops (sacerdotibus) at the Easter solemnity, be said by another" (Epist. xi. 28, al. 33).

From the first Ordo Romanus (about 730) we learn that on Maundy Thursday, at the 9th hour, a light was struck from flint in some place outside the basilic at the door, if there was no oratory, from which a candle was lighted and brought into the church in the presence of the congregation. A lamp lighted "from the same fire" was kept burning until Easter Eve, and from that was lighted the wax candle which was solemnly blessed on that day (Ordo Rom. i. 32). Zachary, who became pope in 741, in a letter to Boniface of Mentz, says that "three lamps of great size (so lighted) placed in some more secret part of the church, burned to the third day, i.e. Saturday." He adds that oil for them was collected from every candle in the church, and that "the fire for the baptism of the sacred font on Easter Eve was taken from those candles" (Ep. xii. Labbe, Conc. tom. vi. col. 1525). It will be observed that lampas and candela are here synonymous. From the fragment of a letter of Hadrian I. A.D. 772, to the monks of Corbie, we learn that the priests and clerks did not put on their stoles and planetae on Easter Eve "until the new light was brought in that the wax candle might be blessed" (Comment. Praev. in Ord. Rom. Mabill. Mus. It. tom. ii. p. cii.). The blessing was pronounced by the archdeacon (Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38).

There are two forms of the Benedictio cerei in the Gregorian Sacramentary (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. col. 143). The former of these is also found in the Missale Gothicum (Liturg. Gallic. p. 241), in the Missale Gallicanum (Ibid. p. 357), and again in the Besançon Sacramentary discovered by Mabillon at Bobio (Mus. Ital. tom. i. p. 321). This may be thought to prove that the rite was derived to France from Rome.

In Gothic Spain and Languedoc, both the prayers and ceremonial differed from those of Rome. The clergy assembled, not on Maundy Thursday, but Easter Eve at the 9th hour in the processus, a chamber connected with the church, and in small churches identical with the sacarium. There the deacons received 12 wax candles from the bishop, who retained one for himself. They then entered the sacrum, where the bishop himself proceeded to strike the flint. A candle (candela) was first lighted with the fire thus obtained, and a lamp (lucerna) was then lighted from the candle. They then returned into the processus, where the bishop took his seat. He next lighted his own candle from the lamp which a deacon had brought from the sacrum, and the deacons then lighted theirs, also from the lamp. The deacon who held it then received a blessing from the bishop, for which no words were prescribed; and the bishop said an "Oratio ad benedicendam lucernam." They then entered the church in procession, the deacons with their lights preceding the lamp, the bishop and presbyters following it. As they entered the choir they sang an antiphon (Lumen verum, St. John i. 9) with versicle (populus qui sedebat, St. Matt. iv. 16) and gloria. The bishop or a priest next goes to the altar and says a prayer "ad benedicendum cereum." After this the deacons, who are themselves to bless the paschal lamp and candle, receive a benediction from the bishop, which is to fit them for that office. They then, while the bishop is in his chair behind the altar, and the presbyters are standing by him, solemnly pronounce a long form of blessing (benedictio lucernae) given in the sacramentary. A similar benedictio cerei followed, and the bishop then comes in front of the altar, and proceeds with the service of the day (Missale Mozarabicum, Leslie, pp. 174-178).

The benediction of the lamp appears to have been peculiar to this office, and the prayer is said by Elipandus, A.D. 792, to have been composed by Isidore of Seville (Epist. ad Alcuin. § xi. inter Opp. Alc.). He quotes a passage in it: "Induit carnem, sed non exuit majestatem," &c. by which we are enabled to identify it. See Miss. Moz. p. 176. It is certain that the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (can. 9), at which Isidore presided, recognised both the paschal lights:—"The lamp and the candle are not blessed in some churches on Easter Eve, and they inquire why they are blessed by us. We bless them solemnly because of the glorious sacrament of that night; that in the benediction of the hallowed light we may discern the mystery of the sacred resurrection of Christ, which took place on this votive night. And forasmuch as this rite is practised in churches in many lands, and districts of Spain, it is fit that for the unity of peace it be observed in the churches of Gallia."

At Rome there was a singular custom in connexion with the paschal candle which, so far as we have been able to discover, was not adopted elsewhere. The number of years from the crucifixion was inscribed on it. Bede (De Tempor. Rat. c. 45) records such an inscription, which had been copied at Rome by some pilgrims from England, viz.: "From the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ are 668 years."

The paschal candle played a considerable part in the baptisms which took place on Easter Eve. When the font was blessed, "at the invocation of the Holy Spirit, which the priest pronounces with a loud voice, i.e. with deep emotion of mind, the candle that has been blessed, or those that have been lighted from it, are put down into the water to shew the presence of the Holy Ghost"

(Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. Hittorp. col. 259). Only the lower part was immersed (ibid.), while the whole, when lighted, represented Christ the pillar of light; the part not yet burning, but ready to furnish the means of light, symbolised the Holy Ghost (Amal. Var. Lect. Hittorp. 1447). This was the baptism of the font mentioned above by Zachary. When the catechumens had been baptized, an unlighted candle was put into the hand of each. Litanies were then sung in the Roman ritual (probably only Kyries), and then the Agnus Dei, during which the precentor gave the word, "Light up," and the candles of the neophytes (Amalar. de Antiphon. c. 44; Pseudo-Alcuin, Hitt. col. 260), and all throughout the church (Ord. Rom. i. 45; Amal. ibid.), were at once lighted. Till that moment the lamps and candles of the church were not lighted for three nights, "to teach us," says the archdeacon of Rome to Amalarius (u. s.), "to turn away from joyfulness to sadness," as "joy was quenched in the hearts of the disciples of Christ so long as he lay in the tomb" (Amal. ibid.). They were re-lighted at the Agnus to shew that every one ought to receive light through that "Lamb that taketh away the sins of the world" (Amal. de Eccles. Off. i. 30). The mass of the resurrection began after the lighting of the candles (Ord. Rom. i. 45, and Append. 10; Amal. de Antiph. c. 44; Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38). For "the seven white days," i.e. until Low Sunday, the newly baptized were daily present at the celebration of the Eucharist in their white robes and with their candles in their hands (Alcuin, Ep. ad Car. Magn. in Hittorp. col. 300; Raban. u. s. cap. 39). The symbolism is thus explained: "The eight days of the neophytes represent the course of this present life. For as the Hebrew people, after passing the Red Sea, entered the land of promise, trampling over their foes, preceded by night throughout their journey by a pillar of fire, so our baptized, their past sins done away, are daily led to the church preceded by a lighted pillar of wax" (Pseudo-Alc. u. s. col. 262).

VI. We first hear of these baptismal lights in the 4th century.* Zeno of Verona, A.D. 360, speaks of the "salt, fire, and oil, and poor tunic" given to the newly baptized (Tract. i. xiv. 4). St. Ambrose, 374, addressing a lapsed virgin, says: "Hast thou forgotten the holy day of the Lord's resurrection in which thou didst offer thyself to the altar of God to be veiled? In so great and so solemn an assembly of the church of God, amid the blazing lights of the neophytes, among candidates for the kingdom of heaven, didst thou come forward as if to become the bride of the King" (De Laps. Virg. v. 19). Gregory Nazianzen, in a discourse delivered on Easter Day about 385: "Our white dresses and light-bearing yesterday, which we celebrated both privately and publicly, all conditions of men nearly,

* Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, has been supposed to mention these lights: "The call to be soldiers of Christ, and the lamps that lead the bride home, and the desire of the kingdom of heaven, . . . have been yours" (Catech. Praef. i.); but he is speaking, not to the baptized, but to competentes, and by the bridal lamps he means those motions of the Holy Ghost and spiritual instructions which had lighted their way to Christ, and to the entrance of His kingdom.

and every high officer, illumining the night with abundant fire," &c. (In S. Pascha, xlv. § 2). About the year 500, a large number of Jews were converted at Auvergne, and we are told by Gregory of Tours, 573, that at their baptism "candles blazed, lamps shone, the whole city was bright with the white-robed flock" (Hist. Franc. v. 11). At the request of Gregory, Fortunatus wrote a poem on the event (Poem. v. 5), from which we may cite the following lines:—

"Undique rapta manu lux cerea provocat astra :
Credas ut stellæ ire trahendo comas.
Lacteus hinc vesti color est; hinc lampade fulgor
Ducitur, et vario lumine picta dies."

We should infer from this that at baptisms of great interest others, beside the neophytes, carried lights. This is confirmed by the account which an eyewitness gives of the baptism of Theodosius the Younger, A.D. 401: "All were in white, so that you might fancy the multitude covered with snow. Illustrious patricians went before, and every dignitary with the military orders all carrying wax lights, so that the stars might be supposed to be seen on earth" (Marcus Gaz. Epist. ad Arcad. apud Baron. ad ann. § 28). The symbolism of these lights is thus explained by Gregory Nazianzen to some candidates for baptism: "The lamps which thou wilt kindle are a mystical sign of that lamp-bearing from thenceforth, wherewith we, bright and virgin souls, will go forth to meet the Bridegroom" (Orat. xl. in Sanct. Bapt. § 46).

VII. The gospel lights, to which incidental reference has been made, are first heard of in the 4th century. St. Jerome, A.D. 378, tells us that, "through all the churches of the east, when the gospel is to be read, lights are kindled, though the sun is already shining; not, indeed, to dispel darkness, but to exhibit a token of joy; . . . and that under the figure of bodily light, that light may be set forth of which we read in the psalter, 'Thy word is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths'" (Cont. Vigilant. c. iii.). In the west the custom is first mentioned by Isidore of Seville, writing in 636, which makes it probable that it travelled to Rome through Spain, as several other rites appear to have done. He says (Etymol. vii. xii. 29), "Those who in Greek are called acolytes are, in Latin, called ceroferarii, from their carrying wax candles when the gospel is to be read, or the sacrifice to be offered; for these lights are kindled by them, and carried by them, not to dispel darkness, for the sun is shining the while, but for a sign of joy, that under the form of bodily light may be represented that light of which we read in the gospel: 'He was the true light.'"

VIII. There is ample evidence of the use of lights, both stationary and processional, at funerals in every part of the Christian church. When the body of Constantine lay in state, "they lighted candles on golden stands around it, and afforded a wonderful spectacle to the beholders, such as was never seen on the earth under the sun since the world was made" (Euseb. Vita Constant. iv. 66). Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 370, speaking of his sister's funeral, says that "No small number of deacons and sub-deacons preceded the corpse on either side, escorting it from the house in orderly procession, all holding wax candles" (De Vita S. Macrinae, in fin.). From Gregory^b Nazianzen, we learn that the rite was in frequent, if not general, use at this time; for referring to the burial of Constantius, he says: "He is carried forth with the acclamations and escort of the people, and with these our solemn rites, viz. hymns by night, and torch-bearing, with which we Christians are wont to honour a religious departure" (in Julian. Insect. ii. Or. v. 16). St. Jerome, of the obsequies of Paula, A.D. 386: "She was borne by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulder to the bier, while other pontiffs carried lamps and candles before her (Ad Eustoch. Ep. cviii. § 29). St. Chrysostom: "Tell me what mean those shining lamps. Do we not conduct them (the dead) forth as athletes?" (in Epist. ad Hebr. c. 2; Hom. iv. § 5). When the remains of Chrysostom himself were removed from Comana to Constantinople in 438, "the assemblage of the faithful covered the mouth of the Bosphorus at the Propontis with their lamps" (Theodoret Hist. Eccl. iv. 36; comp. 34). At the funeral of St. Germanus of Auxerre, A.D. 447, "the multitude of lights beat back the rays of the sun, and maintained their brightness even through the day" (Constant. in Vita S. Germ. ii. 24; ap. Surium, Jul. 31). When Euthymius died in Palestine, A.D. 467, the patriarch of Jerusalem "went down to the laura himself, and transferred, with accompaniment of lamps and psalms, that holy body of the blessed one to the abode which he had himself built, trusting it to his own hands alone" (Euthymii Vita, c. 112; Eccl. Gr. Monum. ii. 296, Cotel.). Corippus, the grammarian, describing the ceremonial at the funeral of Justinian, A.D. 565, says that, "a thousand stands of gold and silver with candles set on them filled the halls," and that when the corpse was taken out for burial, "the whole populace went out in procession from the palace, the mournful bands burning funeral torches" (De Laud. Justin. Min. iii. 9, 38).

At Paris, in 585, king Guntram buried a murdered grandson "with the decoration of innumerable candles" (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vii. 10). When queen Radegund was buried at Poitiers in 587, "the freewomen, who carried candles (cereos) before her, all stood round the grave. Every one gave her name inscribed on her candle. They all, according to the order prescribed, gave the candles to one of the servants. A dispute arises among the people; some said that the candles themselves ought to be put into her holy tomb; others said not" (Vita St. Radeg. auct. Baudonivia, cap. v.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 13). The question was settled by one of the candles leaping out of the hands of the servant who held them, and falling at the feet of the corpse.

IX. From this use of lights the transition was easy to leaving them in the sepulchre, or near the grave, when the nature of the place admitted of it. We accordingly often read of lights in the martyria or oratories erected over the remain of martyrs. We have already seen this forbidden in the daytime by the council of Illiberis, about 305, because it tended to distract those who resorted to them for prayer. St. Jerome, as we have also seen, owns and defends the practice, though ascribing it to weak and ignorant persons. We may cite an instance from the Dialogues of Gregory, A.D. 595. That author relates that St. Peter once appeared to the sacristan, not long deceased, of the church dedicated to him at Rome, and in which the saint's body lay, when he had risen at night "to trim the lights by the entrance" (lib. iii. c. 24). Gregory's suggested explanation is, that he did so in order to shew that he was always cognizant of, and always ready to reward "whatever was done out of reverence for him." Gregory of Tours tells us that two enermungs entering a monastery at Malliacum (Maillé-Lallier), declared that it contained the tomb of St. Solemnis, and said: "When you have found it, cover it with hangings, and burn a light." Miracles followed the discovery, and we read that one person who had been cured of an ague, "having prayed and lighted candles, held them in his hands throughout the night, keeping vigil there" (De Glor. Conf. 21). A lamp gave perpetual light at the tomb of St. Marcellinus of Iverdun (ibid. c. 69), and of St. Marcellus of Die in Dauphiny (ibid. 70). The oil in both these instances was supposed to be endued with miraculous power. Franco, bishop of Aix, A.D. 566, having been plundered by a powerful neighbour, is said to have addressed St. Merre, before whose tomb he had prostrated himself, in these words: "Neither light shall be burnt here, nor psalmody sung, most glorious saint, unless thou first avenge thy servants of their enemies, and restore to holy church the things by force taken from thee" (ibid. 71).

^b Gregory (Orat. vii. 15) has been quoted as saying that his mother carried a lamp at the funeral of her son Caesarius, but the original has, not λαμπαδοφορία, but λαμπροφορία, and tells us that she wore a shining white dress. The error is due to the old Latin translation, which gives "cereum gestatione" as the equivalent to λαμπροφορία. See edit. Morell. Or. x. tom. i. p. 169.

X. The next step, naturally, was to treat any supposed relic of the saint, however small, with similar tokens of veneration. In the 5th century, we read of a man who had been cured of lameness after praying in a church where relics of St. Stephen and other saints were thought to be preserved, "lighting candles and leaving his staff there" before he went home (Evodius, de Mirac. St. Steph. i. 4; App. vi. Opp. Aug.). Gregory of Tours having dedicated an oratory, removed thither from a church relics of St. Euphronius and others, "candles and crosses shining" as they went (De Glor. Conf. 20). In another oratory at Tours were alleged relics of John the Baptist, before which a lamp burnt, the oil of which bubbled miraculously (Mirac. i. 15). The bishop of a certain sea-town in the east, hearing that some relics of St. Julian were in a ship that had just arrived, "moved the people to go in procession to the port with lighted torches" (ibid. ii. 33). During an epidemic at Rheims in 546, a relic of St. Remigius was carried through the city "with lighted candles on crosses, and with candlesticks" (De Glor. Confess. 89). Lights fixed on crosses were an invention of St. Chrysostom, who employed them in those nocturnal processions which he instituted at Constantinople to counteract a similar custom of the Arians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 8).

XI. Lights before relics were naturally followed by lights before images, when the latter begin to be unduly honoured. There are no instances, however, earlier than the 6th century. Some MSS. of Gregory of Tours relate a miraculous cure performed with oil from a lamp before the picture of St. Martin in a church at Ravenna (De Mirac. St. Mart. i. 15). This proves, at least, that the practice was known to the writer, while its novelty and partial distribution may be inferred from the fact that Paulus Warnefridi, telling the same story, says that "there was an altar in honour of St. Martin, with a window near it, in which a lamp was set to give light" (De Gest. Longob. ii. 13). In the east, John Moschus, A.D. 630, tells the story of a hermit who, when about to visit any holy place, used to set a candle before the picture of the blessed Virgin, trusting to her to keep it burning until he returned (Pratum Spirit. c. clv.). In 715, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, writing to another bishop, says: "Let it not scandalize some that lights are before the sacred images and sweet perfumes. For such rites have been devised to their honour. . . . For the visible lights are a symbol of the gift of immaterial and divine light, and the burning of sweet spices of the pure and perfect inspiration and fullness of the Holy Ghost (Ep. ad Thomam, in Labbe, Conc. vii. 313). In 787, the second council of Nicaea gave its sanction to the practice already popular by a decree that "an offering of incense and lights should be made in honour" of the icons of Christ, of angels, of the blessed Virgin, and other saints (Labbe, u. s. 556). This was one of the practices which even the more moderate of the emperors opposed to image worship endeavoured to put down (Epist. Mich. Balb. ad Ludov. Pium in Decreta de Cultu Imag. Goldast. p. 619).

XII. During the last three centuries of our period, a custom prevailed of offering candles to God, and at length to the saints, with prayer for recovery from sickness, and other benefits. E.g. a girl who had been long ill made a candle of her own height, which she lighted and held burning, "by the help of which (God pitying her in the name of the holy woman St. Radegund), the cold was expelled before the candle was consumed" (Vita S. Radeg. § 32; Venant. Fortun. A.D. 587; compare the Life by Baudon. § 20). Gotselin, the monk who, in the 9th century, wrote a life of St. Augustine of Canterbury, when relating the cure of a cripple, says, that he had received from a charitable woman "a light to offer" to the saint (§ 2, Acta SS. O. B. tom. i.). By the council of Nantes, A.D. 660, all persons were forbidden "to make a vow or to carry a candle or any gift when going to pray for their health, except at the church to the Lord their God" (can. 20). The object, it must be explained, was to put down heathen superstitions, not to discourage saint-worship. In the life of St. Sabas, ascribed to Cyril of Scythopolis, A.D. 555, there is a story of a silversmith who, having been robbed, "went immediately to the martyrrium of St. Theodore, and for five days supplied (and probably tended, ἐπαύσα) the lights of the nave, and remained there night and day weeping at the rails of the bema" (§ 78, Cotel. Mon. Graec. iii. 355).

XIII. Candles were also offered as a token of thankfulness for mercies received. For example, when Justin the Younger, on his accession, went with the empress to a public service of thanksgiving, they both offered frankincense and candles (Corippus, u. s. ii. 9, 71; comp. v. 317). A wax candle was offered at the tomb of St. Eucherius of Orleans, A.D. 738, by a woman whom he had converted (Vita S. Eucher. § 10; Acta SS. O. B. iii. 599).

XIV. The Liber Pontificalis (Anastat. Biblioth. n. 85) tells us that Sergius I. A.D. 687, ordered that on the feast "of St. Simeon, which the Greeks call hypapante, a litany (i.e. procession) should go forth from St. Adrian's, and the people meet it at St. Mary's." The Greeks had observed the feast for some time (with what ceremonies we cannot say); but this appears to be its introduction at Rome. Sergius was a Syrian of Antioch by birth, and was more likely to bring in an eastern custom than many of his predecessors. This feast (Feb. 2) was afterwards called the Purification of St. Mary, and was marked by so profuse an use of lights that it acquired the name of Missa Luminum (Candlemas). Lights are not mentioned in the above account, nor by the interpolator who in the 9th century or later adapted Gregory Nysse's Sermon de Occursu Domini to the feast; but they were so common in processions at Rome, that they were probably carried in it from the first; especially as the words of Simeon (Luke ii. 32) suggested them as appropriate to the occasion. The earliest witness to their use however is Bede, 730, who says that the festival took the place of the old lustrations of February: "This custom of lustration the Christian religion did well to change, when in the same month, on the day of St. Mary, the whole people with the priests and ministers go in procession through the churches and suitable parts of the city with the singing of hymns, all carrying in their hands burning wax lights, given them by the pontiff" (De Temp. Rat. 10). The only other witness before the death of Charlemagne is Alcuin, in a sermon (in Hypapanti, § 2) before that prince: "The solemnity of this day, while it is unknown to some Christians, is held by many in greater honour than the other solemnities of the year; but above all in that place, where the Catholic Church has obtained the primacy in its chief pastor, is it held in so great reverence, that the whole populace of the city collected together, shining with huge lights of wax candles, celebrate the solemn rites of masses, and no one without a light held in his hand enters the approach to a public station;—as if, in sooth, being about to offer the Lord in the temple, yea, to receive also the light of faith, they are outwardly setting forth by the sacred symbolism (religione) of their offering that light wherewith they shine inwardly" (Baluz. Miscell. ed. Mansi, ii. 52). Martene and others have cited similar references to the lights of this festival, which, if genuine, would be earlier than Bede, from homilies ascribed to St. Eloy, bishop of Noyon, A.D. 640, and Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, 657; but those homilies are by careful critics assigned respectively to the 9th and 12th centuries. See Oudin in nn.

It will be observed that Bede speaks of the candles as "given" by the bishop of Rome. He does not say "blessed." Similarly, Pseudo-Alcuin (De Div. Off. Hittorp. 231): "They receive all a single wax candle from the hand of the pontiff." Amalarius, A.D. 827 (De Eccl. Off. iv. 33) and Rabanus, 847 (De Instit. Cleri, ii. 35), also mention the lights, but not any benediction. Nor can we find any form of blessing in any sacramentary written before the 9th century. There is one in a Tours missal of that age, but so inferior in composition that it can hardly be older than the missal itself. We give it here:—"A Prayer at the Blessing of the Lights. O God, the true light (lumen), propagator and author of the light (lucis) everlasting, pour into the hearts of Thy faithful the brightness of perpetual light (luminis); and (grant) that whosoever in the holy temple of Thy glory are adorned with lamps of present lights, being purified from the contagions of all vices, may be able to be presented unto Thee, with the fruit of good works, in the temple of Thy heavenly habitation; for the," &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 15, 5). [W. E. S.]

LILIOSA, martyr; commemorated Aug. 27 (Usuard. Mart.); Bede as LIBIOSA same day.

LILY. Though this flower may be considered as a scriptural symbol from St. Matt. vi. 28, no particular meaning seems to have attached to it at any early date. The κρῖνα of that passage may be the scarlet anemones which every traveller must have observed in the Holy Land during the spring, or rather, as the writer is inclined to fancy, the delicate and lovely cyclamens which flower in great plenty in both spring and autumn in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The early Christian decorators made little generic distinction in the wreaths of flowers they painted or carved on graves. The Italian use of the lily may probably date from Giotto and the early Florentine Renaissance, and would then refer to the red or white Giglio of the city arms. The subject of the Annunciation, so frequently treated from the earliest Byzantine or Lombard-Romanesque dates, would sooner or later bring the favourite flower of Florence and of France* in special pictorial relation to the blessed Virgin. In later days, it is considered as the lily of the tribe of Judah, and accordingly forms a symbolic essential to pictures of the Annunciation (Guénébault, Dictionnaire des Monuments, s. v.). But as a symbol, carved or painted, it is either ethnic or mediæval, though used to convey the idea of virginal beauty in Cant. ii. 2, 16, &c. Its connexion with the lotus, dwelt on by Auber (Symbolisme, iii. 546), is not made out, and appears to be simply architectural, and founded on the convex or concave form of the bells of capitals of columns (1 Kings vii. 19, 22). See Ruskin, Stones of Venice, ii. 128, 242, 137.

The following meanings are attached to the lily in the Clavis attributed to Melito of Sardes (Spicilegium Solesmense, iii. p. 475). It is fairest of flowers, and so resembles Him (Cant. ii. 1). It is golden on white, it has petals and six leaves, both perfect numbers, representing perfect deity and humanity. It possesses both beauty and medicinal virtue ("membris medetur adustis"), and so resembles the mother of God, who has pity on sinners.

* No earlier than Philip Augustus (Auber, vol. iii. p. 547).

Its green signifies humility; its whiteness, chastity; its golden hue, charity. It is the holy church; it is the glory of immortality; it is the Holy Scriptures, with reference to Cant. iv. 5; and a variety of impertinences of symbolism, which have been its weak side, and the bane of religious art, from a distressingly early date in the history of religion and art alike.

LION. It is difficult, as Ciampini admits (Vet. Mon. tab. 17), to attach specially Christian meaning to the form of an animal which has been an ethnic or universally human symbol of strength and courage from the earliest records of Egypt and Assyria. As part of a composite form, the shape of the lion is connected with the cherubic symbol. [See CHERUB in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.] The twelve lions of Solomon's throne (1 Kings x. 19, 20), to which Ciampini alludes, were intended of course as emblematic sentinels, after the fashion of Assyrian imagery; and he also notices that the eagle is used in the same manner, often in company with the lion, apparently for state and ornament alone. It is pretty certain, however, that the ideas of watchfulness and vigour, or authority in the faith, were connected with the leonine form, as it not unfrequently occurred in Christian churches, especially under Lombard rule. It is placed at the doors, very frequently as a solid base to small pillars in the porch, or tympanum; and also at the foot of ambons or pulpits; as a symbol no doubt of watchfulness, or even of wakefulness, according to the tradition of the lion's sleeping with open eyes. The lions of the gate of Mycenae may be an instance of ancient Greek use of the form in this sense. To this effect Martigny quotes Alciati's Emblems (Deliciae Ital. Poetarum, p. 20, Francof. 1558):

"Est leo, sed custos, oculis qui dormit apertis; Templorum idcirco ponitur ante fores."

It is natural, of course, that archaeologists of all dates should wish to attach a specially Christian symbolism to the lion-form. But, as Ciampini shews, the principal sculptures of the subject are of early pre-Christian date; he gives two, in particular, from ancient Egypt (Vet. Mon. i. tab. 17), and the same associations have attended the image of the king of beasts from the first records of ideas. By the early church, it was adopted, like the originally ethnic images of the shepherd, the vine, or the fish; though not sanctioned, like them, by the Lord's use of the image.

Lions are sometimes represented as grasping the "hystrix" or porcupine, or holding a small human figure in their claws, apparently with tenderness, in the latter case (see Ciampini). The hystrix will in this case represent the power of evil, the human form the race of mankind. The Veronese griffin, mentioned by Prof. Ruskin (Modern Painters, vol. iii. ch. viii. p. 106), holds a dragon in his claws to typify victory over evil by the angelic powers.

On a gem figured vol. i. p. 715, the lion and serpent are represented on each side of a dove, which is placed on a wheat sheaf, bears the olive branch, and evidently represents the church. This Mr. King considers an illustration of the precept to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves; though it seems possible that the idea of contest with the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon, may be connected with it. This subject, though rare, occurs in a Vatican ivory from the abbey of Lorch, part of the binding of its ancient Evangelary; and again in Gori (Thes. Diptychorum, vol. iii. iv.).

LITANY (Λιτανεία, Litania v. Letania). A litany is strictly any united prayer and supplication in the churches or assemblies of the faithful. "Litania, quae Latine Rogatio dicitur, inde et Rogationes." Ordo Romanus. By the word, however, is usually understood a form of alternative prayer, intercessory or deprecatory, and of a penitential character, containing invocations to the Holy Trinity and to the saints, in which the people respond to each clause of the priest by the repetition of a short and expressive formula.

Litanies date from the earliest times of settled forms of Christian worship. Originally they were confined to the liturgy, properly so called; but in course of time, as forms of public prayer developed themselves, they are more frequently found apart from the liturgy, and appropriated to occasions of more than ordinarily earnest and penitential supplication, and specially associated with processions, during which they were repeated. Hence the procession itself was often called litanía.

The word is sometimes spelt "letania," and some have drawn a distinction between the two forms, and argued that letania means a day appointed for special rejoicing. "Laetum ac festivum diem significat."* The words are, however, generally, and probably always, used as synonyms.^b

The earliest and simplest form of Litany is the Kyrie Eleison, repeated three,^c six,^d twelve,^e forty,^f or more times. Mabillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. i. 2, p. 34) describes a procession in which the people chanted alternately three hundred times Kyrie Eleison, Christe Eleison; and the Capitulary of Charlemagne (vi. c. 197) directs that during the funeral office, if the people do not know the Psalms, the men should repeat Kyrie Eleison and the women Christe Eleison while they were being chanted.

The expression has been thought by some to have been suggested by a sentence of Arrian (Comment. de Epicteti Disput. ii. c. 7), "Calling upon God we beg of Him κύριε ἐλέησον." It occurs however with slight variations¹ in the Old Testament, and was in use in the Christian church before the date of the sentence just quoted. It has been used in the ecclesiastical offices of all nations, and from the earliest times. It is found in the liturgies of St. James, of St. Mark, and of the Greek Fathers, as well as in those of the Armenians, Syrians, and other Oriental Christians, whose rites are among the oldest extant, and who repeat it in the vernacular.

There is some uncertainty by whom it was introduced into the Latin Church. The chief writers on Ritual² attribute the introduction to Gregory the Great. But the custom appears to have been in use before his time, as the 5th canon³ of the 2nd council of Vaison, in the time of Felix IV. (al. III.), A.D. 529, seems to shew which speaks of the Kyrie Eleison as being then established in all the provinces of the East and of Italy, and directs it to be used in the churches of Gaul; and Gregory himself (lib. 7, Ep. 64), in answer to some who spoke of him as wishing to introduce the rites of the church of Constantinople into that of Rome, says: "We neither have hitherto said, nor do we now say, Kyrie Eleison, as it is said by the Greeks" [nos neque diximus, neque dicimus, &c.], and then he points out the double distinction: (1) that with the Greeks the whole congregation say it together, whereas with the Romans the clergy and people say it alternately; and (2) that the Roman use is to repeat Christe Eleison as often as Kyrie Eleison has been said, which the Greeks never do.⁴

The words were always said by the Latin church in Greek, for which practice different symbolical reasons have been given. St. August. (Ep. 178) compares it with the use of the Greek Homousion, and remarks that as by the word Homousion the unity of substance of the Trinity is confessed by all believers, so by that other, Kyrie Eleison, the nature of the One God is invoked by all Romans and barbarian. The words were said after the Introit, but originally the number of repetitions was not prescribed, but Kyrie Eleison was repeated by the choir until the presiding prelate directed it to be changed into Christe Eleison: "Schola vero, finita Antiphonia, ponit Kyrie Eleison, Prior vero scholae custodit ad Pontificem ut ei annuat si vult mutare^k numerum Letaniae!" (Ordo Rom. v. num. 6).

It appears that in the 9th century the number of repetitions was prescribed (v. Amalarius, de Div. Off. iii. cap. 6), and by the 12th century at latest was established at nine, i.e. Kyrie Eleison (thrice), Christe Eleison (thrice), Kyrie Eleison (thrice). At this number it has since remained. Various symbolical reasons have been assigned for this number, on which it is not necessary to dwell. In the Ambrosian rite Kyrie Eleison is said thrice after the Gloria in Excelsis, thrice after the Gospel, and thrice at the end of the mass.

It has been questioned to whom the invocation is to be considered as addressed. When the form Kyrie Eleison alone is used, the prevailing opinion appears to be that it is addressed to the second person in the blessed Trinity, and Anastasius Sinaiticus^m (Contemp. in Hexameron. lib. vii. cont.), referring to Dionysius the Areopagite,ⁿ says that God the Word was properly called Lord (Dominus, Κύριος), after and with reference to the Incarnation, and the dominion which He thereupon received. "He is called Lord [Dominus, nempe Κύριος] because He has the Lordship [ex eo quod κυριεύει]. Rightly, therefore, and fittingly and suitably, when God the Word in His advent to man took flesh and was seen upon earth, was He also called Lord. For previously He was called God (θεός), as being the overseer (θεωπητής) of the world."

^c In the daily offices, passim.

^d As in the litanies after Terce on certain days, in the Ambrosian use.

^e As after the hymn at Lauds, and in Lent at the end of Vespers in the same use, and in Vespers of the Greek church.

^f As in the daily night and day hours of the Greek church.

^g e.g. Micrologus, Amalarius.

^h There is some confusion in the canons of the two councils of Vaison (Vasio, in Gallia Narbonensis); the first was in the time of Leo the Great, A.D. 442.

ⁱ In the Ambrosian rite the invocation Christe Eleison is very rarely found, and only in borrowed forms.

^k Otherwise called "mutare Litaniam."

ⁿ Ib. vol. ii.

When Christe Eleison is interposed, the invocation is usually considered to be addressed successively to each of the persons in the Trinity (see Amalarius, lib. iii. 6, and iv. 2; and S. Tho. Aquin. Summa, part iii. qu. 83, art. 4).

We have entered at some length into the use of Kyrie Eleison, as these words are the germ of all litanies. We will now proceed to their use and development.

I. As to the use of litanies in the Liturgy. In the Greek liturgies from the earliest times long intercessory prayers, broken into clauses, each with the same beginning, and responded to in the same words, have formed part of the introductory or proanaphoral part of the liturgy. In the Clementine liturgy, these prayers begin as follows. They are called "The Bidding of Prayer over the Faithful" (προσφώνησις ὑπὲρ τῶν πιστῶν).

"Let us pray for the peace and the stability of the world and of the holy churches, that the God of the universe may give us His perpetual peace which cannot be taken away; that He would keep us to the end of our lives in the fulness of piety and godliness. Let us pray for the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church throughout the world, that," &c., and so on; the successive petitions comprising prayers for the diocese, the bishop and clergy, the married, the single, relations, travellers, captives, slaves, enemies, those who are in error, infants, &c.

In the Liturgy of St. James these prayers occur in the same position as in the Clementine liturgy, shortly before the beginning of the Anaphora. They are of precisely the same nature, though differently worded. They are called the catholic and universal collecta or synapte (συναπτή); and, after a few opening words by the deacon, begin thus: "That God may send peace from heaven; that He may be gracious unto us, and preserve our souls,

"Let us beseech the Lord," and so on for twelve such clauses, each ending Let us beseech the Lord (τοῦ Κυρίου δεηθῶμεν), and the last followed by κύριε ἑλέησον (thrice).

In the liturgies of St. Basil and of St. Chrysostom these prayers are the same for each. They occur in both at the opening of the liturgy, before the prayer of the first antiphon.

The deacon says: "Let us beseech the Lord in peace."

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

"Deacon. For peace from above, and for the salvation of our souls, let us beseech the Lord."

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

"For the peace of the whole world, for the stability of God's holy churches, and the unity of them all, let us beseech the Lord."

and so on, the petitions making mention of all orders of men, for the king, his court and army, for success in battle, for fine weather, for the fruits of the earth, &c. These prayers are called in the rubrics,^o εἰρηνικά, because of the introduction, "Let us beseech the Lord in peace," the first petition in all of them, as will be seen in the examples given, being for peace. They are also known as διακονικά, because said by the deacon; as συναπτή [Collecta]^p, because they form, as it were, a concatenation of petitions fitted together into one; or as Ectene (ἐκτενή), because they are ordinarily long. They were recited by the deacon from the Ambo.

In the Armenian liturgy a litany of the same character, except that the response is not always the same, is said by the deacon and the choir alternately, immediately after the Trisagion,^a and before the lections from Scripture, and the Creed.

In the West, missal litanies were also common. It was usual to say them immediately after the Kyrie on those days on which Gloria in Excelsis was not said, and this custom continued until the 9th century. They contained prayers for all estates of men, and were of the same character as the Greek.

An old form contained in a MS. at Fulda, and called a missal litany, begins thus:

"Let us all say with our whole heart and mind,

"O Lord hear and have mercy [Domini exaudi et miserere].

"Thou who beholdest the earth and makest it tremble,

"We beseech Thee, O Lord, hear and have mercy.

"For profoundest peace and tranquillity of our times,

"We beseech Thee," &c.

"For the holy Catholic Church, which is from the borders of the world unto the ends thereof, and so on for 15 clauses.

"We beseech Thee," &c.,

In the Ambrosian liturgy, the missal litany is still said on the Sundays in Lent, immediately before the Oratio super populum, which corresponds with the Roman collect for the day. There are two litanies, of which one is used on the first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent, the other on the alternate Sundays. They are framed entirely on the Greek model; often in almost the same words. They are said by the deacon, the choir responding. The first runs thus:

"Imploring the gifts of divine peace and indulgence with our whole heart and soul, we beseech Thee,

"Lord, have mercy.

"For the holy Catholic Church, which is here, and is dispersed throughout the whole world, we beseech Thee

"Lord, have mercy," &c., &c.

The original of this litany, which is a good specimen of missal litanies, is as follows:

"Divinae pacis et indulgentiae munera supplicantes ex toto corde et ex tota mente precamur te,

"Domine miserere" (repeated at the end of each clause).

"Pro Ecclesia sancta Catholica, quae hic et per universum orbem diffusa est, precamur Te." [These two words repeated at the end of each clause.]

"Pro Papa nostro III. et Pontifice nostro III. et omni clero eorum, omnibusque Sacerdotibus ac Ministris, precamur Te.

"Pro famulis Tuis III. Imperatore, et III. Rege, Duce nostro, et omni exercitu eorum,

"Pro pace Ecclesiarum, vocatione gentium, et quiete populorum,

"Pro civitate hac et conservatione ejus, omnibusque habitantibus in ea,

"Pro aeris temperie ac fructu et fecunditate terrarum,

^p The English word collect conveys quite a different notion.

^a This must be distinguished from the Sanctus of the liturgy.

^r Sc. Illo.

"Pro virginibus, viduis, orphanis, captivis, ac poenitentibus,

"Pro navigantibus, iter agentibus, in carceribus, in vinculis, in metallis,* in exiliis constitutis,

"Pro iis qui diversis infirmitatibus detinentur, quique spiritibus vexantur immundis,

"Pro iis qui in Sancta Ecclesia Tua fructus misericordiae largiuntur,

"Exaudi nos Deus in omni oratione atque deprecatione nostra,

"Dicamus omnes, Domine miserere."

The other litany is of precisely the same nature, but worded differently.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, missal litanies, called preces, are said on the first five Sundays in Lent, after the psallendo, which follows the prophecy, or Old Testament lection, and before the epistle. There is no essential difference of character in them from those hitherto mentioned, though prayers for mercy for the particular congregation occupy a larger space, and there is a much greater number and variety in them. They also have a distinctly rhythmical and stanzaic character, and an approximately accentual scansion, which a few corrections of the text, often corrupt, would probably restore throughout. Those for the first, second, and third Sundays are addressed to the Saviour; those for the fourth and fifth are put into His mouth. Their rhythmical character is clearly seen in the following opening of that for the second Sunday in Lent, which is in accentual iambic lines:[†]

Prostrati omnes lacrymas producimus,

Pandentes Tibi occulta quae admisimus

A Te Deus veniam deprecamur.

R. Quia peccavimus Tibi.

"Orationem sacerdotum accipe,

Et quaeque postulant [? poscunt] affluenter tribue,

Ac Tuae plebi miserere Domine.

Quia peccavimus Tibi."

And so on for nine such stanzas.

Or in that for the third Sunday:

"Rogamus Te, Rex Saeculorum, Deus Sancte,

Jam miserere, peccavimus Tibi.

Audi clamantes, Pater altissime,

Et quae precamur, clemens attribue,

Exaudi nos Domine. Jam miserere, &c.

Bone Redemptor, supplices quaesumus,

De toto corde flentes, requiramus

Adsisite propitius. Jam miserere, &c."

And so on for seven stanzas.

That for the fourth Sunday begins thus:

"Vide Domine humilitatem meam, quia erectus est inimicus.

"R. Miserere Pater juste et omnibus indulgentiam dona."

"A Patre missus veni

Perditos requirere,

Et hoste captivatos

Sanguine redimere,

Plebs dira abiecit me.

R. Miserere, &c.

"Praedictus a Prophetis

Natus sum ex Virgine,

Assumpsi formam servi

Dispersos colligere,

Venantes ceperunt me.

R. Miserere, &c."

And so on for nine stanzas, recounting the incidents of the Passion.

In the Roman liturgy these litanies did not establish themselves permanently. None appear in the sacramentary printed by Thomasius (vol. vi.), which cannot be later than the end of the 6th century."

The interpolated or forced kyries, said at the mass instead of the simple kyrie on certain days, hardly come within our limits of time; but a reference to them, in connexion with the subject before us, may be allowed. They were common in the Middle Ages, and probably were intended to assist the devotion and bring out the mystical signification of the words. A few are printed in an edition of the Roman missal of Paul III., with the heading "Sequuntur quaedam devota verba super Kyrie Eleison, Sanctus, et Agnus Dei, ibi ob pascendum nonnullorum Sacerdotum devotionem posita, quae licet non sint de ordinario Rom. Ecc., tamen in certis missis ibidem annotatis licite dicendae."* These interpolated kyries were called "tropes."

The following is appointed for festivals, other than those of the highest class:

Kyrie, Rex genitor ingenite, vera essentia, Eleison.

Kyrie luminis fons, rerumque conditor, Eleison.

Kyrie, qui nos tuae imaginis signasti specie, Eleison.

Christe Deus formae humanae particeps, Eleison.

Christe lux oriens per quem sunt omnia, Eleison.

Christe qui perfecta es sapientia, Eleison.

Kyrie, Spiritus vivifice, vitae vis, Eleison.

Kyrie, Utriusque vapor in quo cuncta, Eleison.

Kyrie expurgator scelerum et largitor gratiae, quaesumus propter nostras offensas noli nos relinquere, consolator dolentis animae, Eleison.

II. In other of the daily offices of the church, litanies of the same description as those in the liturgy often occur. For instance, in the Greek church a litany, whether called "synapte" or by any other name, is said in the daily office of nocturns, and at great vespers of a vigil at the office of lighting of lamps. They also form part of many of the offices of the church contained in the euchology.

In the Ambrosian office, litanies are said (among other days) after terce on Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent ("litaniae post tertiam"). These consist mainly of a series of penitential antiphons, divided into two parts by invocations to saints and two collects, and other forms.

The Mozarabic daily offices abound in short litanies, of the same nature as those in the mass. They are placed at the end of most of the offices in Lent and on days of penitence. They are in most cases evidently rhythmical, and are addressed to the Saviour.

The following is from terce on Tuesday in the fourth week in Lent, and is a fair specimen:

* Among other reasons, (1) because Filioque does not appear in the Creed; (2) because there are no masses for Thursday in Lent, which (on the authority of Anastasius) Gregory II. instituted early in the 8th century; and (3) because masses for some festivals are wanting which were instituted early in the 7th century.

† They were in common use in England, and are said by some to have been introduced by Bede, and twenty-nine are given from the various missals. The Sarum missal directs that on all double feasts throughout the year one of the following Kyries (which are there given), with its verses (cum suis versiculis), shall be sung at the choice, within certain limits, of the precentor. It is said they were in use in Sicily in the middle of the last century. The one given in the text is found in the Sarum and Hereford missals.

* A very frequent petition in these litanies.

† In the office books they are printed without distinction of lines.

Preces. Dicamus omnes: Miserere nobis Deus.

R. Miserere nobis.

V. Tu Redemptor, Jesu Christe, salva mundum Tua morte.

R. Miserere nobis.

Qui pro nobis es percussus, et inique judicatus.

R. Miserere nobis.

Qui ligatus crucem portas, et in cruce Patrem vocas.

R. Miserere nobis.

Cujus latus perfoditur, et humilitas aridetur.

Miserere nobis.

The "miserationes" said at compline on week days in Lent are of the same nature. There is a different form for each day in the week.

III. The typical form of litany differs from those already noticed. It was, moreover, appropriated to other occasions of prayer, and used at other times than the ordinary liturgy or daily offices, and specially in connexion with processions.

The original and simplest form was, as we have seen, Kyrie Eleison and its repetitions. The smallest and most usual number of these repetitions was three, in the place of the second of which the Roman church, at an early period, substituted the form Christe Eleison. To this introduction was added an invocation to each Person of the Blessed Trinity severally and to all collectively, with miserere nobis at the end of each clause. Then followed invocations to the Blessed Virgin, angels and saints, each with ora pro nobis. Then "deprecations" from various evils, spiritual and temporal, each followed by Libera nos Domine; supplications for the church and all estates of men, each followed by Te rogamus, audi nos; the whole series concluding with the Agnus Dei thrice repeated, with the three successive responses—Parce nobis Domine; Exaudi nos Domine; miserere nobis. Then Christe audi nos; Christe exaudi nos; Kyrie, &c.; Pater noster, a few "preces" (said alternately), a psalm, or disconnected verses of psalms said consecutively, and sometimes called "capitula," and the whole concluded with prayers or collects (orations), mainly for forgiveness and protection.

This is the outline of a Roman litany in its full development. The names of the saints invoked varied with the place, or the occasion, or the service, as in the Ambrosian litanies in Lent, already referred to, in which they vary with each litany. The list was always headed by the Virgin and the heavenly host. The Agnus Dei was added in the 9th or 10th century.* According to some authorities the essential parts of a litany, without which no form of prayer is properly entitled to the name, are the invocation of saints, and the Christe audi nos, &c., at the end of the supplications.

The following litany is found, under the title Litania Romana, in an old MS. sacramentary of Gregory the Great. It was doubtless adopted in some church or churches of Gaul, as appears from the introduction of the names of some saints who were not specially venerated at Rome (S. Maurice, † A.D. 286, S. Germanus, † A.D. 448, &c.), and from the petition for the Emperor of the Franks.

Later forms of litanies are fuller, but in character do not differ from the earlier.

In the early Latin church various kinds of litanies were distinguished by different names. The principal of these were—

1. The greater litany (litania major), called also the sevenfold litany (litania septiformis).

This is said to have been instituted by Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, to be observed on St. Mark's day (April 25), for the purpose of averting the Divine wrath on the occasion of a pestilence then ravaging the city. In a sermon preached the day before, he urged the people to come at daybreak the next day with contrite heart and amendment of life to the sevenfold litany, for which he then proceeds to give directions. It was so called from its being divided into seven litanies or processions, each of which started from a different church, and singing litanies on their road, all met in the church of St. Mary the Great. "Let the litany" (i.e. the procession), he continues, "of the clergy proceed from the church of St. John the Baptist; the litany of men from the church of St. Marcellus the Martyr; the litany of monks from the church of SS. John and Paul; the litany of the handmaidens of God from the church of the Blessed Martyrs Cosmas and Damian; the litany of married women from the church of the Blessed Stephen the Protomartyr; the litany of widows from the church of the Blessed Martyr Vitalis; the litany of the poor and infants from the church of the Blessed Martyr Cecilia”^a (S. Greg. Ep. lib. ii. 2). In another passage Gregory speaks of litanies as already in existence, and their observance as familiar to the people:—“The return of this annual devotional celebration reminds us, beloved brethren, that we ought, by the help of God, to celebrate with earnest and devout hearts the litany which is called by all the greater (major).”

Letter from J. M. Tommasi to Eras. Gattola, abbat and librarian of Montecassino, dated Rome, 1690.

* The number of these invocations was sometimes much larger. A litany of the church of Tours, assigned to a date not later than A.D. 800, has more than 300.

But there is an uncertainty. It may well be that Gregory found some litanies on a smaller scale in existence, and developed them. These litanies on St. Mark's day are still observed in the Ambrosian rite.

2. There were the litanies on the three Rogation days. These are said to have been instituted by St. Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, A.D. 477. St. Avitus, his disciple, Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. i. 7, &c.), and Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 34), relate the circumstances. The latter says there had been a great and destructive earthquake in the city of Vienne, which also suffered from war and wild beasts, and that as Mamertus was celebrating mass on Easter Eve, the royal palace in the city was struck with fire from heaven (divino igne) and destroyed. Upon this, he ordered litanies, with fasting, for the three days previous to Ascension Day. The rite was adopted in other French churches, and enjoined by the council of Orleans, A.D. 511. These litanies were not introduced into the church of Rome till the pontificate of Leo III. (A.D. 795–816). In Spain they were received still later. According to Ambrosian use, they are not observed on the original days of their institution, as is supposed on account of our Lord's words, “Can the children of the bridechamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them,” &c. (St. Mark, ii. 19), but a week later, i.e. on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in the octave of the Ascension. The litanies are said after terce as on the days in Lent, and are of the same description, but somewhat longer. In the Mozarabic breviary the four days next before Pentecost are appointed as days of fasting—“ad exorandum D^m, nostrum J. C. pro peccatis nostris, ac pacem impetrandum vel pro sacris lectionibus audiendis; et ut veniat Spiritus Paraclitus, et munda nostra reperiat habitacula Ecclesiam Dⁿⁱ, frequentemus” (Rub. in Brer. Moz.). The ordinary service is modified by the addition of short preces at the end of terce, sext, and none.

There is some variation in the name by which the litany of the Rogation days is known. At first it seems to have been called, in Rome at least, letania “minor,” partly to distinguish it from the litany on St. Mark's day, which was always called “major,” and to which the epithet was appropriated, and partly, possibly, as suggested by Durandus—“quae minorem nacta sit auctorem; non Romanum Pontificem, sed Mamertum Viennae Allobrogum Episcopum.” These litanies, however, were soon called “major,” as in the council of Mentz, can. 33, A.D. 813—“Placuit nobis ut Litania major observanda sit a cunctis Christianis diebus tribus,” &c. Menardus also says (in Litania majore): “Haec Litania major est Rogationum, quae in triduo ante Dominicam Ascensionem celebranda,” &c. It was also sometimes called Gallicana, from the country in which it was instituted, while the Litany on St. Mark's day was called Romana.

The directions for the order of the Litany and procession on the Rogation days are given very fully from a MS. ceremonial of the Church of Vienne by Martene, iii. 126, and also the Litanies themselves for each day from a MS. ordinary of the church of Lyons. They present no peculiar features, but are interesting as pointing out clearly where the Stations occur, and at what churches. They are always said after Terce. After the ordinary litany, in which no psalm is said (Nulla dicas capitula sed orationem tantum), Sext is said, the processional office continuing with more invocations and antiphons, and at the last station of the day None is said, and then Mass. Afterwards the procession returns, saying alternately certain preces, and the whole terminates with the “Litany for any trouble” [Letania de quacunque tribulatione].

Litanies of the same character were said in some churches at other times. Thus the Mozarabic breviary prescribes Litanies and days of fasting on the Sejunium calendarum Januarii, i.e. the three days next before the Epiphany, for three days before the festival of St. Cyprian [Sept. 13], and for three days before that of St. Martin [Nov. 11], called Sejunium calendarum Novembris, as well as on certain other week days.

The Ambrosian rite also appoints Litanies for the week days of the last week in Advent, called Feriae de Exceptato.

3. Certain Litanies were also called septenary, quinary, ternary (septena, quina, trina). They were thus said at the font on Easter Eve:

The first subdeacon begins Kyrie Eleison, then the second repeats Kyrie Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe audi nos, and so on till the seventh.

And the whole Litany is gone through in the same manner, each clause being repeated seven times, once by each of seven subdeacons. In the Invocations of the saints, seven names are recited out of each order of saints (dicuntur de quolibet choro septem sancti), seven from the apostles, seven from the martyrs, seven from the confessors, and seven from the virgins.

Then follows the quinary litany, said in the same manner by five subdeacons, the names of five saints being recited from each order, and then the ternary, said in the same manner by three.

Litanies were also used at baptisms, at administering extreme unction, and on other occasions, which it is not necessary to specify.

In a MS. Pontifical of Salzburg, the following metrical litany occurs:—

Rex sanctorum Angelorum, totum mundum adjuva,
Ora primum tu pro nobis, Virgo mater Germinis Et ministri Patris summi, ordines Angelici,

Rez Sanctorum.

Supplicate Christo regi, coetus Apostolici,
Supplicate permagnorum sanguis fusus Martyrum,

Rez Sanctorum.

^a This sevenfold order is said to have been kept up at Tours as late as the 17th century, the clergy of the seven churches in the city starting each from their own church and meeting in the abbey church of St. Martin.

Implorate Confessores, consonate Virgines,
Quo donetur magnae nobis dies indulgentiae,
Rex Sanctorum.

(and so on through all the orders of saints, ending thus):

Praesta Patris, atque Nati compar Sancte Spiritus,
Ut te solum semper omni diligamus tempore,
Rex Sanctorum.

The following is "ex pervetusto codice seu ordine Romano Wirtinensis, in dioecesi Monasteriensis:—

"Letania" (for the first day of Rogation).
Humili prece ad Te clamantes semper exaudi nos.
Summus et Omnipotens Genitor qui cuncta creasti, Aeternus Christus Filius atque Deus;
Necnon sanctificans Dominator Spiritus almus,
Unica majestas trinaque sola Dei,

Ad Te clamantes.

Ipsa Dei Genetrix, reparatrix inclyta mundi,
Quae Dominum casto corpore concipiens,
Perpetua semper radians cum virginitate
Indignos famulos Virgo Maria tuos,

Humili.

Angelici proceres, coelorum exercitus omnis,
Aeterno semper lumine conspicuus.
Agmine ter trino supero per sidera regno
Laudibus aeternum concelebrans Dominum,
Petrus cum Paulo, Thomas cum Bartholomeo,
Et Jacob sanctus nos relevent precibus.
Andreas, Matthaeus, Barnabas atque Johannes,
Matthias, Lucas, Marcus et alitisonus,

(and so on for 78 Elegiac verses, embodying the usual invocations of saints, and supplications of a litany).

These curious litanies are given by Martene, vol. iii. [See also LITE, PROCESSION.]

[H. J. H.]

LITE (λιτή). This word is explained as the united supplication of many. In the Greek church it has acquired the technical meaning of a religious procession accompanied with prayer; or of prayer for a special object made during such procession. Hence λιτή and περίπατος are used by Codinus^a as synonyms, and both as equivalents of the Latin processio, ἔτι ψαλλομένου τοῦ ὄρθρου γίγνεται ὁ περίπατος, καὶ ἐστὶν ἀνάγκη γενέσθαι ὡς ἔθος λιτήν, ἐν δὲ τῇ λιτῇ περὶπατῆσαι τὸν βασιλέα. "Matutinis decantatis, processio fit, et necesse est supplicationem in procedendo fieri, et in supplicatione Imperatorem procedere." (Codinus De off. aul. Const. c. ii.) Again λιτή and λιτανεὶα are used by Cedrenus^b as synonymous, αὐχμὸν γενομένου λιτανεὶαν ἐποίησαντο οἱ τοῦ βασιλέως ἀδελφοί . . . ἐποίησε δὲ καὶ ἐτέραν λιτήν ὁ πατριάρχης σὺν τῷ κλήρῳ. So λιτανεὶα is used in the sense of "to walk in such a procession" (Typicum Sabae, c. 42).

Litae were used on various occasions of public calamity and intercession. The Greek euchology contains a general "office for different Litae, and vigils with supplications" [ἀκολουθία εἰς διαφόρους λιτάς καὶ ἀγρυπνίας παρακλήσεων], the framework of which is common to all Litae, and is adapted to the special occasion by the introduction of proper prayers, epistle, gospel, and canon. These and some other minor varying portions are given for the following emergencies: in time of Drought; in peril of Earthquake; in time of Pestilence; in storms on Land and at Sea; on occasion of Inroads of Barbarians; in anticipation of War. There are also special prayers for occasions of intercession, such as, in any public calamity; for the Christian people; for the Emperor and his Army; in times of famine; in danger of thunder and lightning.^c

The outline of the service is as follows:

The customary opening formulas (Ter sanctus—τρισάγιον. Most Holy Trinity—παναγία τριάς). The Lord's prayer. Kyrie eleison twelve times.

Psalm 142 [143, E. V. Domine exaudi].

The great Synapte.^d

A few Troparia of the usual character.

Psalm 6.

"Then the first of the priests says a prayer proper to the Lite, and the deacon the little Synapte" (εἶτα λέγει ὁ πρῶτος τῶν ἱερέων μίαν εὐχήν, κατὰ τὴν λιτήν, ὁ δὲ διάκονος συναπτὴν μικράν).

Then begins the second station:—

Psalm 101 [102, E. V. Domine exaudi].

A few Troparia.

The second of the priests says another prayer.

The little Synapte.

Psalm 78 [79. Deus venerunt].

A few Troparia and the gradual psalms.

The proper gospel and canon. Dismissal.

[εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ τὴν λιτήν, καὶ ὁ κανὼν παρομῶις].

The special prayers in these offices are long; several occupying a closely printed folio column and a half, or more, and one (in time of pestilence) almost five such columns.

A Lite of a somewhat different nature from the foregoing occurs in the course of Great Vespers of a Vigil.

After the prayer of Inclination of the head [εὐχή τῆς κεφαλοκλισίας] the rubric proceeds: "Then we sing in this manner the idiomela^e proper to the saint of the day, making procession in the Narthex (λιτανεύοντες ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι) the priest and the deacon going first with lights and censer. Glory. Stichos of the saint. And now, Theotokion^f, and after this the deacon, if he is present, or if not, the priest, says this prayer."

Then follows a prayer for protection through the intercessions of the saints, and prayers for all conditions of men, framed as an ordinary Ectene, but with Kyrie eleison repeated not after each clause, but three times after a group of several in the course of the prayer, and forty times at the conclusion.

The priest then says a short prayer, bids Peace to all, and after the injunction by the deacon to bow the head to the Lord, says a prayer for protection identical in substance with that immediately preceding the Ectene.

^a Codinus held the office of Curopolate at the court of the last emperors of Constantinople, and wrote (among other works) de Officiis Eccl. et aulae Constantin. Graec. et Lat.

^b A Greek monk of the 11th century, who wrote Compendium Historiarum from the beginning of the world to A.D. 1057.

^c There are corresponding offices for nearly all these occasions in the rituals of the Western church.

^d The same, with the omission of the clauses for the king, &c., as that said in the office of the LUCERNARIUM.

^e i.e. certain antiphons, or stichs, i.e. verses.

^f i.e. an antiphon to the B. V. M.

Then the Aposticha (ἀπόστιχα)⁸ are begun, and while they are being sung, the procession returns into the nave, preceded by lights, and singing both the Aposticha and the Stichi belonging to them (ἐπάδοντες καὶ τοὺς τυχόντας στίχους αὐτῶν).

The office then finishes with the benediction of the loaves [see Article].

[This is extracted from the office for vespers (ἀκολουθία τοῦ ἑσπερινοῦ) given in the euchology. The "order of the sacred ministry" (διάταξις τῆς ἱεροδιακονίας), in the same book, gives fuller and more complicated rubrics, but the office is the same.]

Symeon, Archbishop of Thessalonica^b, speaking of this office (op. cont. Haeres.) says, "This (λίτή) is celebrated out of doors (ἐξωθεν) in the Narthex of the church, on Saturdays and chief festivals." He assigns also as the reason why the Lite is celebrated in the Narthex, that as the Saviour descended to our lower regions, so we implore His mercy, standing at the doors of the church as though at the doors of heaven.

Other occasional and extraordinary Litae take place, he says, when any plague or public calamity threatens. [See also LITANY and PROCESSION.] [H. J. H.]

LITIGATION (lites). Lawsuits of any kind, especially before secular courts, were discouraged as far as possible. The 3rd Council of Carthage (c. 9) provides that any of the clergy who might appeal to a secular court in a civil matter, should in case of success forfeit what they had gained, if they desired to retain their offices. The 4th council of Carthage goes still farther. A bishop is altogether forbidden to undertake any lawsuit about a temporal matter (Statut. Eccl. Antiq. c. 19; Bruns, Canones, i. 143). The disputes of the clergy among themselves were to be settled by the bishop, either by persuasion or authority, those refusing to obey him were to be condemned by the synod (c. 59). Any catholic, lay or clerical, who referred any cause, just or unjust, to the decision of a non-catholic (alterius fidei) judge was to be excommunicated (c. 87). The council of Chalcedon (c. 9) provides a series of appeals to ecclesiastical courts, ending with the tribunal of the emperor at Constantinople (cf. Codex Eccl. Afric. c. 125). The council of Vannes however (c. 9) permits the clergy to appeal to the secular courts by permission of their bishops, but an appeal from the decision of a bishop, or a suit against a bishop, must be made to other bishops, and on no account, on peril of excommunication, be referred to a secular court. The council of Agde (c. 31, 32; Bruns, Can. ii. 152) provides that those who refuse to cease from litigation at the bidding of the bishop shall be excommunicated, and forbids any of the clergy to carry a cause into a secular court without permission of the bishop, but permits them to plead in a cause that has already been taken there. The evidence of those who were prone to litigation was to be regarded with suspicion and not received without very careful inquiry into its truth (Statut. Eccl. Antiq. c. 58). In all lawsuits the faith and moral character of both parties were to be taken into consideration (ibid. c. 96). [P. O.]

LITURGICAL BOOKS. The present article relates not merely to such books as are necessary for the performance of the Liturgy proper, or Mass; but to all that are used in the performance of the offices of the church.

I. Before enumerating these, it will be convenient to attempt some answer to the question, "When were liturgies or other formularies committed to writing for use in the church?"

It is sometimes alleged that the great variety and length of the prayers, &c. in the liturgies and offices of the church preclude the supposition that these can ever have been said without book. And this is no doubt true; but it only throws us back on the further enquiry, when it was that liturgies and services became so lengthy and complicated as absolutely to require written manuals for their due performance—a question to which no definite answer can be given.

We cannot, in fact, inquire when liturgies were first written, without first inquiring when they were first celebrated in set forms; forms must have been adopted before they were written down, though it by no means follows that they were at once written; some forms may have been long handed down by tradition before they were committed to writing.

As it is certain that the Jews used forms of devotion in the Temple and in the Synagogue before the Incarnation, and as the services of the church were unquestionably influenced by those of the Synagogue, it seems to be a fair presumption that Christians also adopted set forms in their public devotions from an early period.* To this it is objected that Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 67) describes the president of a Christian assembly as sending up prayers "according to his ability"—an expression which (it is thought) must imply that the prayers were wholly dependent upon the powers of him who uttered them. But in fact it is probable that the words ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ simply mean "with all his strength," referring to the vehemence with which the prayer was uttered, and not to the matter of it; and Valesius has noted (on Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 36), that ἀναπέμψιν is used specially of uttering with a loud voice. Indeed, when Justin describes (l. c.) the Christians as standing up together in a body, and uttering prayers (εὐχὰς πέμπομεν), we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the harmonious utterances of a multitude must have taken some well-known form, perhaps rather of the nature of short "preces" than more lengthened "orations." And when he says (Apol. i. c. 13) that Christians thought it to send "poms and hymns" b to the Creator by means of language, rather than as the heathen did, his words suit better the majestic style of Eastern prayers and odes, such as we have them, than the unpremeditated effusions of a presiding brother.

Another objection is found in Tertullian's assertion (Apol. c. 30), that Christians prayed without a prompter (sine monitore) because they prayed from the heart. We know too little of the functions of the heathen "monitor" to be able to say with certainty what kind of contrast is intended. If the monitor dictated the words of the prayer, the passage seems to imply that Christians needed no such aid, but prayed in such words as the heart prompted; if the monitor, like the deacon in Christian assemblies at a somewhat later date, simply proclaimed the object for which prayer was to be made from time to time, no such inference can be drawn. And, as Bingham has remarked (xiii. v. 5), in public prayer the presiding brother or presbyter must, in any case, have dictated words to the rest, whether with the help of a set form or not, or there could have been no common worship. On the whole, we conclude that Tertullian, in the passage before us, simply means that Christians needed no urging to pray, as some of the heathen did; they needed no prompting but that of their own hearts.

Again, it is contended (e.g. by Le Brun, tom. ii. Diss. i. p. 11 ff.) that certain expressions of St. Basil prove conclusively that liturgies were not committed to writing in his time. The passage in question is the following: τὰ τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ῥήματα ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναδείξει τοῦ ἁγίου τῆς εὐχαριστίας καὶ τοῦ ποτηρίου τῆς εὐλογίας τίς τῶν ἁγίων ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν καταλέλοιπεν; (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27, § 66); that is, "which of the saints left behind for us in writing the words of the invocation at the displaying (or dedicating) of the bread of thanksgiving and the cup of blessing?" On this passage we have to remark, that St. Basil is here defending apostolic tradition; if, he says, we were to reject everything which has not direct written [i.e. scriptural] authority as being of no great importance, we should very much endanger the church; for many well-known practices rest only on tradition; as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, the turning towards the East, the use of the words of invocation [EPICLESIS]. That he is referring to the want of scriptural authority for certain parts of the church service, not to the absence of written copies, is evident from the words which follow the passage quoted above: "for we do not by any means content ourselves with those words which are recorded in the Epistles or the Gospels, but we prefix and suffix others, as being of great efficacy in respect of the mystery, receiving them from the unwritten discipline (ἐκ τῆς ἀγράφου διδασκαλίας παραλαμβάντες)." Clearly when St. Basil says that the words of the Epiclesis were not received in a written form from any of the saints, he means that they were not contained in scripture, but formed a part of that mass of non-scriptural tradition which included so many well-known church observances. On the question, whether these formularies were committed to writing in his own time, his words determine nothing; what he says is virtually, that they were not contained in any writing of the apostolic age. In any case, St. Basil's expressions relate only to the Epiclesis in the liturgy, the exact words of which may perhaps not have been committed to writing until a comparatively late period, from the dread of profanation by the heathen.

In another of Le Brun's arguments (tom. ii. Diss. i., art. 5, p. 29-32), that the fathers expressly forbade the Lord's Prayer or the Creed to be written down on paper or parchment, he seems to have forgotten both that the Lord's Prayer and the Creed were regarded as much more secret and sacred than most other portions of divine service, and that these cautions were addressed to catechumens.

On the other hand, it has been supposed that some at least of St. Paul's quotations, which are not found in canonical scripture, are taken from Christian liturgies. As, for instance, in 1 Cor. ii. 9, the quotation, "eye hath not seen nor ear heard . . ." which is introduced with the words "καθὼς γέγραπται," is by no means exactly taken from Isaiah lxiv. 4, and may (it is contended) have been taken from a liturgy. The expression does in fact occur in the liturgy of St. James (Daniel, Codex, iv. 113), which however is, as a whole, unquestionably of much later date than the apostolic age. With greater probability it has been thought that the expression "faithful is the word" (πιστὸς ὁ λόγος), several times occurring in the pastoral epistles (1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Tit. iii. 8) implies the quotation of a saying or γνώμη familiar to the Christians in their assemblies, perhaps one which they were accustomed to repeat "with one voice;" the passage 2 Tim. ii. 11 in particular has very much the rhythm of an "ode" intended for chanting.

Whether we should reckon the books or rolls found in ancient Christian pictures [I. 877] as liturgical books is very doubtful. But we come upon the traces of at least some forms committed to writing in the 2nd century. Celsus (Origen c. Cels. vi. 40, p. 302 Spencer) says that he saw in the possession of Christian priests certain "barbaric books, full of names of demons and portentous expressions." These were in all probability forms of EXORCISM [I. 651], though Daniel (Codex, iv. 28 ff.) considers them to have been DIPTYCHS. They were at any rate some kind of formulaary used by Christians. And the way in which Origen replies to Celsus, that Christians who duly worship God in the set prayers (προσταχθείσας εὐχαῖς) are free from the assault of demons, seems at any rate to indicate the existence of forms. Eusebius declares (H. E. v. 28, § 5) that written odes (γραφεῖσθαι) testified from the very beginning to the divinity of Christ the word of God; a passage which reminds us of the well-known phrase of Pliny (Epist. x. 96 [al. 97]), "carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere." In the account of the martyrdom of Felix (†250) of Tubyya in Africa (Baluz. Miscell. ii. 77), the emperor is said to have put forth an edict, that the books—meaning apparently those which were the property of the church—should be taken from the bishops and priests by violence if necessary; and in the same narrative, the priest Januarius and the readers Fortunatus and Septimianus declare that the bishop had the custody of the books. In the 4th century, the evidence of the existence of liturgical books becomes more clear and definite. Pseudo-Athanasius, for instance, speaking of the rage of the Arians against the orthodox (Epist. Ath. et Episc. ad Marcum, in Migne, vol. 28, p. 1445), says that, among other things, they burned the church books. It is not improbable that the book which Hilary of Poitiers is said to have compiled (Jerome de Scriptoribus Eccl. c. 100), called Liber Hymnorum et Mysteriorum, was a collection of forms for the celebration of the sacraments. Gennadius (De Viris Ill. c. 48) describes certain books which Paulinus of Nola compiled as Sacramentarium and Hymnarium. Victor Vitensis (Persec. Vandal. i. 12) tells how Geiseric compelled the priests to give up the sacred vessels or all their books (ministerium divina vel libris eunctis).

The existence of something of the nature of a "mass-book" in the 5th century is testified by Gregory of Tours in the following circumstance (Hist. Franc. ii. 22). Sidonius Apollinaris († ca. 488), when the book from which he was accustomed to read the sacred office (per quem sancta sollemnia agere consueverat) had been mischievously taken away, was able to go through the whole service of the holy day "a tempore," to the admiration of all. This is mentioned as an instance of his readiness and command of expression, not of his memory; but even if we suppose that the saint extemporised the office, the passage equally proves that a "libellus" was in common use. Gregory also (Vitae Patr. c. 16, § 2, p. 1229) relates of Venantius, that coming one day to the church he said, "my eyes are dim and I cannot see the service book (libellum)," and requested a presbyter to say the office, which was (as the subsequent narrative shews) the altar service.

II. List of Liturgical Books.—The rule of Chrodegang (c. 79, in Conc. Germ. i. 119) lays down that every priest ought to have in his church the books which are necessary to enable him to read masses, epistles, gospels, baptismal and penitential offices, the series of offices for the year (circulos anni) or the nocturnal lections, without further defining the books. The English Aelfric at a somewhat later date required that every presbyter should possess before ordination a psalter, a book of the Epistles, a book of the Gospels, a mass-book (librum missalem), books of the Canticles, a manual or encheiridion, a "gerim," a penitential, and a lectionary (Hardouin's Conc. vi. 982). Instead of the word "gerim," Mansi gives (Suppl. Conc. i. 1168) "Numerale," which is thought to mean a calendar or martyrology. [LIBRARIES, II. 986.]

books actually existing, and used (in most cases) from ancient times.

a. Of the Western Church.—For the saying of the several offices at the altar or in the choir there would evidently be required—

1. Some kind of directory as to the order and manner of performing the services and ceremonies appropriate to the several days. Such a book, which would contain what in modern times we call the Rubrics, the Latins called ORDO.

2. The actual matter of the prayers, thanksgivings, prefaces, &c., which were to be used in the offices. The SACRAMENTARY or MISSAL contained the prayers, &c., used in the altar offices on the several festivals throughout the year.

The plenary MISSALS, which contain all that is necessary for the performance of the altar-services, do not fall within our chronological limits. The Collectarium contained the COLLECTS [I. 403], and the CAPITULA [I. 289], to be said in the Hour-offices.

3. The PSALTER contained the Psalms arranged for saying in the daily offices, together with the CANTICLES [I. 284], and the Psalm Quicumque Vult.

4. Provision was of course made for the reading the Scripture-portions appointed in the offices, whether at the altar or in choir. This was done either by marking in a copy of the Gospels, Epistles, or other books of Scripture, the passages to be read in the several offices; or by extracting the several passages and arranging them in a separate book [EPISTLE, I. 621; GOSPEL, I. 740; LECTIONARY, II. 953].

5. The ANTIPHONARY [I. 100] contained the Antiphons, Responds, and Invitatories used in divine service.

6. The Hymnarium contained the metrical hymns used in the offices.

7. It was sometimes found convenient to place the Benedictions in a separate volume called a BENEDICTIONAL [I. 199].

8. The MANUAL contained those offices (other than the Mass and the Hour-offices), which a presbyter could administer; and

9. The PONTIFICAL, those which only a bishop could perform.

10. The Penitential (Poenitential) contained not only the form of administering penance, but also the penances required for various forms of sin. [PENITENTIAL BOOKS.]

11. The Passional (Passionale, or Liber Passionarius) contained the acts of the martyrs who were commemorated on certain days of the year. [LEGENDA, MARTYROLOGY.]

β. The Greek Liturgical books in the list given below are probably, in several cases, of later origin than the eighth century; but as there is great difficulty in determining their exact date it seemed best to give the whole list according to the modern arrangement.

1. The Directory for saying the offices was called by the Greeks TYPICUM (τυπικόν).

2. The LITURGY proper (λείτουργία) contains the fixed portions of the office of the altar. If to this the offices for the administration of the other sacraments, benedictions, etc. are added, the whole volume is called EUCHOLOGION.

3. The MENAEAE contains the portions both of the choir-services and altar-offices which are proper for the several Saints'-days or other festivals.

4. The HOROLOGION [I. 784] contains the daily offices for the hours of prayer.

5. The Greeks, like the Latins, have a book of the Gospels (εὐαγγέλιον); of Epistles (ἀπόστολος, or πραξαπόστολος); and of Lessons from the Old Testament (ἀναγνώσεων βίβλος). Also

6. The PSALTER (ψαλτήριον), containing the Psalms, arranged for recitation, and several other offices or portions of offices.

7. The TRIODION contains the CANONS of odes to be used in Lent; and a similar book, the PENTECOSTARION, contains the proper odes, &c. for the period from Easter to the octave of Pentecost.

8. The PARACLETICON, or Paracletice, contains the Troparia for the ferial offices.

9. The OCTOECHUS contains the ferial Stichera and Troparia from the vespers of the Saturday till the end of the liturgy on Sunday.

10. The MENOLOGION is equivalent to the MARTYROLOGY of the Western Church.

The ANTHOLOGION [I. 91] and Synopsis ought, perhaps, scarcely to be reckoned among liturgical books, as they are mere compilations for the use of ordinary worshippers, from the Paracletice, Menaæa, and Horologion, of such portions as are most commonly in use.

The Hirmologion is a collection of HIRMOI (I. 773).

The Synaxaria are "the abbreviated lections from the Menologion, extracted from the Menaæa, and published, for convenience sake, by themselves" (Neale's Eastern Ch. Int. 890).

The PANEGYRICON is a collection of sermons, by approved authors, for various festivals.

III. Among liturgical books, the first place, both for its importance and the splendour with which it was written, illuminated, and decorated [see below], is to be given to the Evangeliiary, or book of the Gospels. Evangelistaria, or books containing only those passages of the Gospels which were read in the altar-office, are rare within our period, while many ancient MSS. of the Gospels bear marginal words or marks which shew that they have been used for liturgical purposes [LECTIONARY].

The book of the Gospels was an object of veneration in many ways. When the church was able to celebrate its services and arrange its churches without fear of persecution, and the sacred books were no longer concealed from the prying eyes of informers; then it came to be usual to lay the book of the Gospels in some conspicuous place in the church, or even on the altar itself [ALTAR, I. 66], (Augustine, de Civ. Dei, x. 29; see the representations figured by Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxvii.). Compare ENTRANCE, GOSPEL. In councils it was not unusual for the Codex of the Gospels to be enthroned with great solemnity at the beginning of the assembly, as was done in the councils of Chalcedon, in the third and fourth of Constantinople, the second of Nicaea, and in the Roman synods of the years 642, 745, and 969. In the Christianised Empire, Justinian ordered the book of the Gospels to be deposited in the courts of justice (Binterim, iv. i. 225). From Chrysostom (Hom. 72 [al. 73] in Matt., p. 669, Migne), and Jerome (Comm. on Matt. xxiii. 6, p. 186), we learn that in their time it was not unusual for Christians to have a copy of the Gospels hung from their necks, which was also a practice of pious ladies in the fifth century, according to the testimony of Isidore of Pelusium.

The oath in the Gospels was from ancient times regarded as one of the most solemn adjurations. [OATH.]

On the use of the book of the Gospels in ordination, see BISHOP, I. 221, and ORDINATION.

The Fathers of the Eighth General Council (Constantinople, A.D. 869, c. 7) approved the veneration paid to the book of the Gospels by the faithful.

The Evangeliiary, to protect it from injury, was commonly placed in a clasped or sealed CAPSA when not actually in use; an example may be seen in a mosaic of the Liberian church in Rome, said to have been completed under Sixtus III. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 16). [C.]

IV. LITURGICAL BOOKS IN ART.—Dom Guéranger (Institt. Liturg. iii. 223 ff.) dwells on the devoted care with which the sacred books were transcribed, edited, and corrected, in early days. There was required of them, he says, accuracy and fidelity enough to set all men free from the least fear of alteration in the text; personal morality, well suited to the sanctity of divine mysteries; and a degree of dignity, if possible of splendour, in execution such as might impress the eye and the mind with religious respect. The MSS., when completed in the scriptoria, were corrected under the care of bishops and abbats, who either entrusted that duty to confidential hands, or, in many cases, executed it themselves. The copyists would have thought it sacrilege to depart in any degree from the words given them to reproduce.

Guéranger (iii. 225) quotes the prologue found in Alcuin's sacramentary, as a specimen of the spirit in which church-books were compiled and copied.

"But since there are some other forms which the holy church necessarily makes use of, and which the said father saw had been set forth by others, and so himself had passed them by, on this account we thought it worth the while to gather these up like blossoming flowers of the field, and collect them in one, and set them apart in the body of this MS. . . . and for the sake of this distinction we have set this prologue in the midst, so as to be the end of the first part of the book and the beginning of the second. . . . We pray you therefore, whoever shall have taken in hand this roll to read or transcribe it, that ye pour out your prayers to the Lord for me, for that we have been diligent to collect and correct these things for the profit of as many as may be. And we pray you to copy it again so diligently, as to its text, that it comfort the ears of the learned, and allow not any of the simpler sort to go astray. For it will be no avail, as saith blessed St. Jerome, to have made correction in a book, unless the corrected reading be preserved by the diligent care of the book-keepers."

Some of the personal prayers or benedictions of actual scribes are of great beauty, but few appear to have been preserved before the 11th century. One or two may be repeated here. Guéranger has extracted the first from a Greek evangeliary of that period. Their mournful piety is certainly different from the quiet greeting of St. Paul's secretary, "I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you."

"This book has been written by the hand of a sinner. May the most holy mother of God, and Saint Eutychius, vouchsafe to accept its homage, and may the Lord God, by intercession of the most holy mother of God and Saint Eutychius, grant us eternal life in heaven. Amen."

The two illustrious (and ominously named) caligraphs of the 9th-century evangeliary of St. Emmeran of Ratisbon speak to this purpose on its last page, in Latin elegiacs:—

"Bis quadringenti volitant et septuaginta
Anni, quo Deus est virgine natus Homo;
Ter denis annis Karolus regnabat et uno,
Cum codex actus illius imperio.
Hactenus undosum calamo descripsimus aequor,
Litteris ad finem nostra carina manet,
Sanguine nos uno patris matrisque creati,
Atque sacerdotis servit uterque gradum,
En Berengerius, Luthardus nomine dicti,
Quis fuerat sudor diluissique nimis.
Hic tibimet, lector, succedant verba precantis,
Ut dicas, caplant regna beata poli."

Mabillon, Iter Germanicum, p. 53.

"Twice four hundred years are fled and seventy, since the God-Man was born of a virgin: thrice ten years and one Charles had reigned when by his command this book was begun. Thus far we have traced our course over a troubled sea with our pen; our bark is staid on the shore at last: we two were born of the blood of one father and one mother, and each of us serves the office of priest, even we, called by name Berengerius and Luthard, to whom has been toil much and hard. Here, O reader, mayest thou thyself take up words of prayer, and say, May they reach the blessed kingdom of heaven."

Charlemagne exerted himself, amidst all the cares of his vast empire, to multiply exact copies^d of evangeliaries, psalters, and sacramentaries, often destined as presents to his bishops for the use of their dioceses. There can be no doubt of the important effect produced on deep and imaginative minds, not greatly aided nor encumbered by book-study, by the lovely ornament, and sometimes energetic and powerful realizations of actual events, which are found in the great MSS. of early ages. There is no reason to doubt the story that king Alfred received help in the pursuit of knowledge, if he was not induced to learn to read, by the ornamental letters of a MS. (Asser, pp. 7, 8, ed. Walsingham). Charlemagne's devotion to the subject induced him to attempt the art of caligraphy and illumination with his own hand (Eginhard, Vita B. Caroli Magni, cap. vii.), "sed parum prosperè successit labor praeosterus et sero inchoatus."

Mabillon and Montfaucon both describe a MS. which is said to have been copied by the hand of Eusebius of Vercelli in the 4th century. (See Iter Italicum, xxv. p. 9, ed. 1687; Diarium Italicum, p. 445, 1702.) It contains the gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, as Mabillon says; and it may here be observed, in passing, that the early grandeur of uncial characters, majuscular or minuscular, often made it necessary, for want of space, to divide the evangeliaries into parts; or even prevented their completion. The Eusebian evangeliary is in uncial writing, chiefly minuscular, says Guéranger (Institutions Liturgiques, iii. 312), and Montfaucon gives its alphabet. But both he and Mabillon speak of it as in a most lamentable state of fragility and decay, caused more by damp and former accidents, than by its age. "Membrana situ fere corrupta est, characteres paene fugientes et semideleti tantisper a Romana scriptura degenerant," says the latter; and Montfaucon seems to have regretted its probable destruction somewhat the less because he found it as a version, "a vulgata nostra toto coelo discrepantem." It has been published by Bianchini, Rome, 1749,^e and is said to be still preserved in the treasury of its ancient convent.

In the 5th century the principal authentic specimens of evangeliaries yet remaining are the Vatican MS. above mentioned (1209), the Gothic evangeliary of Ulfilas, kept at Upsal,^f the Latin evangeliary of St. Germain des Prés, and those at Cambridge, with perhaps the most important of all, the Syriac gospels, transcribed by the monk Rabula in 586,^g now in the Laurentian Library at Florence. The Leonian sacramentary, the psalter of St. Germain des Prés,^h and that of Zurich,ⁱ complete Guéranger's selection of liturgical MSS. of this century. Without giving his full list (iii. 289–292) of the works and caligraphs of the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries, we may mention the evangeliaries of Monza,^k of Notre Dame de Paris, and that which bears the name of Colbert, both in the Bibliothèque National at Paris;^l the Anglo-Saxon Cottonian MS. in the British Museum, and St. Kilian's at Würzburg, in the cathedral treasury, with the Cottonian psalter of St. Augustine. Of the 8th century, the Sacramentary of Gellone will be found admirably illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. i.; and the great Greek evangeliary of Vienna, with the Missale Francorum, Missale Gothicum, the Cottonian MSS., and others, in Silvestre's Paléographie Universelle.

Before proceeding farther, it may be well to call the reader's attention to the accurate meanings of a few terms, and one or two necessary explanations. The first has reference to the real function of the caligrapher, as distinguished from that of the illuminator or miniature-artist of later times. The illuminators, as Guéranger observes, begin their reign at the end of the 12th, and enter on decided pre-eminence in the 13th century. They have little to do with our period, and their work marks the commencement of a new period when the study of natural beauty had begun, and the vegetable kingdom in particular began to be illustrated for ornamental purposes in the service books of the church. A distinction will be found, under article MINIATURES, between truly caligraphic and artistic ornament. (See Westwood, Palaographia Sacra.) Much of what we have to say on the subject of artistic ornamentation belongs to article MINIATURES: for the present the distinction must always be observed between the beauty, elegance, or splendour of the letters as writing, which is caligraphy, and the power of colour, form, and imagination displayed in pictures attached to the writing, which is fine art. It is difficult, if not impossible, to assign proper limits between these phases of decoration: and it is enough to say that they are combined in most liturgical MSS. of the earliest date which still remain to us; and, further, that in most of the most valuable the caligraphic art has its full share of importance, and that the decoration is subordinate to the writing, and dependent on the text, not only as to meaning and import, but also in appearance. The effect of the whole page, as to form and colour, has evidently been the chief object of the caligraphic artists as such, apart from the genuine piety of aim which really seems to have influenced them as their main motive. The text and its pictures form a whole, united, generally speaking, by the effect of grandly ornamented capital letters; unless, of course, the MS. be on purple vellum, when the ground colour gives the main effect, and determines all the rest of the ornament. Perhaps only one modern artist has revived this idea of the old caligraphists in a perfectly original way, but with exact analogy. The illustrations and ornamented writing of Blake's various poems, copied and executed by his own hand, renew and illustrate that excellent moderation of judgment of the old copyists, which made their pictorial ornament, however beautiful and ingenious, still always subsidiary to their caligraphy. The pictures were beautiful, they thought, the text was sacred; but even because the latter was chief and the one thing needful, too much attention could not possibly be given to the former.

The capital letters in liturgical MS. are generally of the kind called rustic, especially when several lines consist of smaller capital letters. But they are frequently executed in the best Roman style, as in the evangeliaries of Soissons and of Gellone, and in the sacramentary of Drogon. (Count Bastard, vol. i. ii.; Silvestre, Palaographie Universelle, 3^{me} partie, § 2.) The uncial characters, or rounded capitals, with their particular beauties of size, clearness, and order, appear and reappear in all the richer MSS. down to the 11th century, when writing begins to be altogether Gothicised or made cursive, and the ornament is concentrated on the initial letters, and their accompanying miniatures. The artistic use of varied colour may be said to be based on the minium or red lead, from which the word miniature is derived. Green and yellow follow almost immediately in the Visigothic and Merovingian work; but while the richest MSS. were executed on purple or azure grounds, the use of varied hues was of course out of the question, and writing and ornament were alike executed in gold or silver. A very grand specimen of the earlier chrysographs, as they are called, in uncial capitals of gold and silver, is the celebrated psalter of St. Germain (Bastard, i. 1). But the use of purple vellum for books destined for the use of imperial students goes back to comparatively early days of the empire, on the eve of the triumph of the Christian faith; Maximin the younger received a purple vellum MS. of Homer as a present from his mother (Jul. Capitolin, Vita Maxim.). Sacred books, and in particular the evangeliaries, would naturally have been the first objects of Christian splendour, when such a thing became possible. The gospels of Ulilas, the psalter of St. Germain above mentioned, with that of Zurich, and the evangeliary of Brescia, are on purple, and the evangeliary of Brescia on azure-blue vellum; but that of St. Germain has one side of each page dyed purple, the other in azure.

St. Wilfrid of York gave a purple evangeliary to his cathedral in the 7th century: the 8th produced those now at Vienna and Monza. Charlemagne presented one to his church at Aix-la-Chapelle, and another of his evangeliaries, entirely on purple vellum, is still, says Guéranger, the principal ornament of the library of Abbeville.^m The splendid MS. preserved in the library of the Remonstrants at Prague, appears to the writer to be of about the same date. The great emperor's attachment to the art of caligraphy has been mentioned, and the splendour of the early empire was revived by him in this use of purple or azure books, necessarily written in either gold or silver. They reappear during the Carolingian age, and go out of use almost entirely in the 10th century, though the Bodleian Library at Oxford possesses a purple evangeliary, with whole-page pictures, dating from the 11th.

Silver-ink MSS. are much rarer than chrysographs, strictly so-called, but both metals are frequently used together, as in the evangeliary of Ulilas and the psalters of St. Germain and of Zurich. The evangeliaries of Verona and Brescia are written almost entirely in letters of silver.ⁿ In the others the text is silver, with golden headings and initials, gold being used also for the sacred names.

Purple vellum begins to be economised in or before the 9th century, as in Charlemagne's psalter, presented to Adrian VIII. about the end of the 8th. This is now in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and has a limited number of purple pages. The antiphony of Monza, of nearly the same date, is entirely purple.

In the sacramentaries of the 9th century, the canon of the mass is frequently on purple, or the frontispiece and first pages of the books; or texts to which special attention is to be drawn, are thus distinguished. Gradually the purple is arranged with other hues on a white ground, and begins to be used, artistically speaking, as a colour.

Golden writing was not, or was not long, confinied to the purple, violet, or azure MSS.* Many which have but few coloured pages are chrysographs throughout; as the evangeliaries of Charlemagne (or of St. Martin des Champs), of St. Martin and St. Médard of Soissons (in Count Bastard's second volume). The expense of purple vellum seems to have been very great; so much so, that as early as the 4th century the bishop Theonas enjoins on Lucianus, the emperor's chamberlain, not to have the MSS. of the imperial library entirely in colour, unless by special order (D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. xii.). Charlemagne seems to have reserved this magnificence especially for evangeliaries, the Vienna psalter being only gold in part. For chrysographs on white, in the 9th century, they are too numerous to allow of more than brief mention of a few, besides those of St. Médard and St. Martin already named. The evangeliaries of St. Emmerand at Munich, of Lothaire in the National Library of France, with his psalter; those of the abbeys of Hautvillers (Bastard, ii.) and Lorch (the latter now at the Vatican, with fine uncial writing on alternate bands of purple and azure), and the antiphonary of Goubert, monk of St. Bertin, are named by Dom Guéranger. Those of Charlemagne, or St. Martin des Champs (Gothic writing), and of St. Médard, and another very grand one, written for Charlemagne, in fine uncial, with large whole-page illustrations [see MINIATURES], the sacramentary of Drogo (golden uncial, rustic capitals, and cursive Gothic, with splendid Roman initials), the evangeliaries of Lothaire and Louis le Débonnaire, are all magnificently illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. ii., with that of Hautvillers. He also gives pictures from two magnificent bibles, written for Louis le Débonnaire and Charles the Bold; and one presented to the latter monarch by Count Vivien, abbat commendatory of Tours, which shews great progress in miniature painting, and attains something like a climax of splendour in ornamental caligraphy. The ceremony of its presentation to Charles the Bald is illustrated on its title-page with considerable skill, and perhaps with some attempts at portraiture. Its writing is a perfect example of what is called the Caroline uncial and demiuncial.

Guéranger goes back to the 7th century for the first employment of artistic design by the liturgical caligraphers of the Western church. They began naturally with their initial letters, making the illustration a part of the page considered as a whole, and keeping their art in equal alliance with their caligraphy. In the Eastern church the Rabula MS. shews how much could be done even in the 6th century, but its miniatures are inserted in rectangular spaces, and independent of the writing. (See Professor Westwood's Palaographia Sacra, Introduction; also CRUCIFIX and MINIATURE.)

The canons of Eusebius of Caesarea were very early added to the sacred text: they are found in the MS. of Rabula, in the 6th century, accompanied with a free and luxuriant ornament: and in the western world the evangeliary of Ulfilas, of the same period, possesses them. The idea of architectural decoration of pages struck the caligraphers at once, as was natural. To consider a row of parallel columns as an arcade, separated by pillars, and to lavish wreath-, scroll-, and flower-work, or even birds, on their traceries, was an obvious and pleasing system of decoration. The Colbert evangeliary (Bastard, i.), 7th century, has its columns drawn firmly and beautifully with the pen: and it is most interesting to the artist, in an age of mechanical copying, to observe the extraordinary power and freedom of manual execution in many of these MSS., which in the opinion of the present writer, fully raise the ancient caligraphy to the level of a fine art. The O of Giotto was doubtless a fair test of his great executive power; but it is excelled in difficulty and interest by the pen-drawn birds and grotesques of the MSS. See GROTESQUE. I. 751 f; LION, II. 999, for instances of true pen-drawing. It is singular that the last relics of the vanished art should be the swans or birds of the modern writing-master's flourish.

* The names of these colours are somewhat vague and must necessarily convey rather different ideas to different persons. The greater number of purple MSS. are at present of what would be called a puce colour, mostly dark and rich, but occasionally lightened by time, or deadened almost into black.

The 8th and 9th century MSS. are richest in their decoration of the canons, and those of St. Martin des Champs, St. Médard, of the Church of Mans, of Hautvillers, and that written for Lothaire, are models of gorgeous grotesque. Sometimes there are twenty or twenty-five pages of them, worked out with inexhaustible variations and fancies. Gold and silver are lavished everywhere; the horizontal lines end in nondescript heads, the leaf-work is rich but chaste, and wreaths about the pillars like "the gadding vine;" and a first faint sign of naturalistic imitation appears in the very skilful use of gold to imitate the wavy cloudings and changing lines of polished marble pillars. Animals and small figures present themselves apparently just where they like, though always in places well adapted to balance of pattern and ordered arrangement. They are in some cases emblematic, as the evangelical symbols present themselves constantly, and there are endless nondescripts. A list is appended, taken from the above-mentioned MSS., which differ from the wild grotesques of the Gellone sacramentary of 7th century, by being often drawn with careful attention to natural character.[†]

A decided falling off in colour-power, with some carelessness of drawing, will be observed in the Hautvillers MS.: the bibles of Charles the Bald are either Franco-Saxon or Gallo-French, showing the serpentine spirals and endless interlacings of the Northern-Gothic work. Count Vivien's MS. shews equal splendour and higher aim in the artist: the great zodiac illumination is given by Count Bastard (vol. ii.).

In the Visigothic work of the Sacramentary of Gellone, 8th century, there is a crucifixion, with angels; much blood is used, and the drawing is very rude. There is a miniature of the crucifix in the canon of the mass, the cross forming the T in the words "Te igitur." In the same MS. the Mass of the Invention of the Cross has in its initial letter the figure of a man squaring a tree-trunk, as if to form the upright stem. The "Leofric" sacramentary, in the Bodleian, 9th century, has highly-ornamented initials in the canon of the mass, but is without figures. Our Lord sits in the initial of the word Quoniam, at the beginning of St. Luke's Gospel, in the MS. of St. Médard. The grand whole-page St. Matthew of the Charlemagne evangelist, with its mystic fountain and symbolic building of the Church, is an interesting example of the decoration of manuscripts. As Guéranger remarks, the ideas of the heavenly city or palace, and possibly the pillars and polished corners of the Hebrew Temple, may have been in the minds of the artists (Ps. cxliv., 12). We cannot agree with him (Inst. Lit. p. 366) as to their admirable knowledge of perspective; but ingenuity of invention, splendour of material, harmony of colour, and minute accuracy of hand, can go no further than in most of their works. Information about Byzantine architecture is certainly to be gathered from the illustrations of the Menologium or Calendar of the emperor Basil the Younger, and other works; as, for instance, Charlemagne's evangelist. They remind the student of the architectural backgrounds of Giunto of Pisa, in the lower church of Assisi and elsewhere.

The ease with which cheap copies of the holy scriptures and other books are to be obtained in our own day, may prevent us from understanding the real and practical value of the sacred MSS. of the earlier ages, and still more from understanding the single-hearted devotion, and happy self-concentration, with which the copyists seem to have carried on their labours. It is probable that in most cases the best educated monks, or men of more natural refinement than others, must have been employed in the scriptoria of the great houses; at least in every monastery which professed the life of labour and prayer with sincerity, some sensible division of labour, according to various capacities, must have taken place, and the fine hands of the calligraphist or painter would hardly be set to hew wood or draw water, unless for temporary discipline.

It is singular that Martene, who records forms of benediction in use for all other objects, from emperors and empresses down to pilgrims' staves and scrips, says nothing in his chapter "De Benedictionibus," of forms for dedication of sacred books, though he gives the full order for blessing a writing-desk (scrinium) or book-case (capsa), (De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, lib. iii. cap. 1). This is quoted from an English pontifical MS., and a second from a MS. of St. Victor, said to have been 500 years old, in his own time. The first, however, seems to apply to an arca or credence, and neither are within the limits of our period.

A specimen of malediction on any person guilty of stealing a 13th-century MS. is not to be omitted (Colbert, Bibliothèque Nationale). "This sacred gospel has been copied by the hand of George, priest of Rhodes, by the exertions and care of Athanasius, cloistered monk, and by the labour of Christonymus Chartinos, for their souls' health. If any man dares to carry it off, either secretly or publicly, let him incur the malediction of the twelve apostles, and let him also receive the heavier curse of all monks. Amen." The first day of the month of September, year 6743, of Jesus Christ 1215."

The missal of St. Maur des Fossés speaks to the same purpose. "This book belongs to St. Mary and St. Peter, of the monastery of the Treuches. He who shall have stolen or sold it, or in any manner withdrawn it from this place; or he who shall have been its buyer, may he be for ever in the company of Judas, Pilate, and Caiaphas. Amen, amen. Fiat, fiat. Brother Robert Gualensis (of Wales?), being yet young and a Levite, hath devoutly written it for his soul's health, in the time of Louis (le Gros), king of the French, and of Ascelin, abbat of this place. Richard, prior and monk, caused this book to be copied, in order to deserve the heavenly and blessed country. Thou, O priest, who ministerest before the Lord, be mindful of him. Pater noster."

The bindings and outer cases (capsae) of the more important liturgical books are in themselves a subject of no small interest. That of the Eusebian evangelist of Vercelli is thus described by Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 9, April 1685). "Codicis operculum ex argento, a Berengario imperatore ab annis fere octingentis instauratum, ex una parte Salvatoris effigiem, ex alio sanctum Eusebium exhibet; ad cuius caput hi versus adscripti leguntur:

Praesul hic Eusebii scriptis, solvitque vetustas;
Rex Berengarius sed reparavit idem.

In infima vero parte ad pedes Eusebii

Argentum [?] postquam fulvo decompsit et auro, Ecclesiae Praesul obtulit ipse suae."

He also mentions (p. 213, Jan. 1686) the ivory covers of St. Gregory's purple antiphonary, at Monza, one of which has a medallion of David, the other of the donor. The great MS. of Theodolinda (supra) has a golden cover, with the cross on each side. These ancient relics may be classed according to their material and ornaments, whether of carved ivory, of chased metal, or of metal with jewelled ornaments. A special interest attaches to the ivory covers, not only from their intrinsic value, but from the use of ancient consular diptychs [DIPTYCH]. There is no doubt that many of these ancient ivories have been employed by later ages in the bindings of liturgical books, sometimes with slight changes and adaptations, as in the antiphonary of Monza. This is, perhaps, the typical example of a consular diptych, converted to ecclesiastical use. Two ivory panels or plaques bear each its figure, perfectly recognisable as a consul of the 5th century, by the dress and the mappa of the games. But one of them has been converted into St. Gregory the Great, by the addition of a tonsure, and the addition of a cross to his staff of office.^a The other has had his wand lengthened and curved into a shepherd's staff, and passes for David. The consular ivory of

Flavius Taurus Clementinus, now at Nuremberg, had an ecclesiastical diptych-list engraven on the ivory itself, and the Diptychon Leodiense, in memory of the consul Flavius Astyrius, forms one of the sides of an evangeliary in St. Martin's, of Liège, and is also engraved on the inside. (See Donati, De Dittici degli Antichi profini e sacri, Lucca, 1753-4; Gori, Thesaurus veterum Diptychonum, Flor. 1751, fol.; and Maskell, Ivories, 1876.)

There is a passage in Cassiodorus in which he speaks of having designed and published, or set forth in a collected volume, a number of examples of carvings, or designs of some kind, for the external bindings of sacred books. "We have moreover designed skilful artifices in the coverings of our MSS.; so that there might be a covering of outer ornament over the beauty of the sacred text, herein perhaps in some sort imitating that example of the Lord's figuring. Who clothed in marriage garments those whom He thought worthy of invitation to His supper. Among which we have set forth many examples of designs (facturatum) represented in one volume, that any studious person may choose for himself any form of covering he shall prefer." (De Institutione divin. Scripturarum, cap. xxx.) These would probably be executed in ivory for the most part. The ivory of Murano (described by Costadoni in the collection of Calogera, tom. xx.) is of the greatest interest, as it is covered with reliefs of the ancient cubicula of the catacombs and of the earlier sarcophagi, and it may be considered earlier than the 8th century. The nail-holes intended to fix the ivory panel on the cover of the book to which it belonged still remain, as is the case with many ivories, which have been used for reliquaries and shrines, as in the case of the diptychs of Symmachus and Nicomachus (Gori, Thesaurus, tom. i. p. 207). For 9th-century ivories as bindings of church books, those of the evangeliary of Lorch in the Vatican, and of the sacramentary of Droyon and evangeliary, No. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, may be referred to. The collection, or catalogue, of Professor Westwood, is the best reference in this country for all the more ancient documents on ivory.

The Gothic evangeliary of Ulfilas is called Codex Argenteus, on account of its rich binding of that metal; and the evangeliaries of St. Médard and St. Emmeran possess covers of enamel and gold respectively, the latter with embossed portraits. Plates of vermilion-enamel occur in the Eusebian gospels, and one of the covers of the Lorch evangeliary is of this material. This use of different metals was practised by Victor III., while at Monte Casino, under the name of Didier; who ornamented an epistolary for his abbey, with gold plate on one side and silver on the other; this binding was called dimidius (D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 402). Precious stones, and even relics, have been enclosed in these bindings, as by Didier of Monte Cassino, in the MS. of St. Emmeran, in the splendid ones of the Sainte-Chapelle,* and in

The subjects represented in ivory or metal on covers of sacred books are of course, in most cases, simple in choice and in execution during our period. Guéranger mentions in particular the grand ivory cover of the Lorch evangeliary in the Vatican, which bears some resemblance in its carving to the work of the later sarcophagi, and which he vindicates on Gori's authority (Thes. vet. Diptych. tom. iii. tab. iv.) from the imputation of being a pagan ivory, altered and adapted to Christian use.[†] Our Lord is represented as holding the Gospel and treading down the Lion and the Dragon, attended by two angels bearing sceptres and rolls; above are two flying angels with a clipeate cross, and below, two subjects of the Magi before Herod, and also making their offerings to the Holy Child and His Mother.

On the great MS. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, are Lazarus, the Samaritan woman, and the Entry into Jerusalem, treated much as in the sarcophagi. See Trésor de Numismatique, Bas-reliefs et Ornaments, X. Série, II. Classe, 2 partie, pl. ix. x. xi. The sacramentary of Droyon has liturgical rites chased or embossed on its cover in eighteen compartments.

The embossed figure of our Lord on the Vercelli Gospels is probably one of the earliest in such a place, and dates from about 888. Representations of the crucifixion also begin in that age.

The folio work of Prof. Westwood, published 1869, contains an appendix note on the magnificent book-covers, "auro argento gemmisque ornata, which are repeatedly mentioned in connexion with fine early copies of the Gospels. They have, for the most part, long ago disappeared; but there still exist a number of metal cases which have served to hold some of the smaller Irish MSS., which generally exhibit restorations at various periods." They are also generally ornamented with crystals or other gems, and are known under the name of cumhdachs. See article on the Book of Armagh, p. 80; on the Psalter of S. Columba, p. 82; the Book of Dúnna, pp. 83, 84; and the Gospels of S. Mulling, p. 93. Plate 51, fig. 9, represents a party of ecclesiastics from the cumhdach of the Stow missal, p. 88. The front of that of St. Molaise or Molasch is at fig. 6, pl. 53. "It is 5½ inches by 4½ inches, and 3½ inches deep; of bronze, bound with silver, overlaid with openwork, riveted, on white metal, silvered . . . a cruciform or wheel-cross design, with the emblems of the Four Evangelists at the angles, barbarously designed. Portions of gold filigree and interlaced ornaments, with some jewels, occupy some of the remaining compartments of the openwork, one ruby still remaining in its setting."

The capsae or cases in which the books thus gorgeously ornamented were deposited for safety were generally made of, or adorned with, plates of gold, silver, &c. They are mentioned repeatedly in mediaeval documents beyond our period; but Gregory of Tours says that Childebert obtained, in the plunder won from Amalaric, about twenty of these cases for evangeliaries, all covered with pure gold and precious stones" (Hist. Francor. cap. lxiii. p. 114; Migne, 71, 250). St. Wilfrid of York's evangeliary had a case of this kind (Acta SS. O.S.B. Suec. IV. part ii. 'Vita S. Wilfredi').

The study of this subject must necessarily lead, as has been said, to a full understanding of the reverence paid to the text of the Gospels, in particular, during the dark ages, and at a period when that text, like the oral prophecies of the Lord in Samuel's early days, was rare and precious in the eyes of those who were its keepers. Yet, in looking at the few and splendid relics of the magnificence of Byzantine or Carolingian ritual, it is impossible to help thinking of the vast mass of perished MSS. of far earlier days, written on humbler materials and for humbler hands; and on the important question, how far the skill, enterprise, and numbers of the regular book-transcribing and selling trades of Rome and the larger cities of the empire may have multiplied cheap copies of the Holy Scriptures in the first three centuries. This is for other hands; an article on the learning of the early Church by the Rev. Prof. Milligan (Cont. Rev. vol. x. April 1869) is well worthy of reference as bearing on the subject; but the important and strictly correct remark of the Commendatore de Rossi, that the early cycle of Christian ornament in the Catacombs is merely a cielo biblico, or scriptural repertory of Christian symbolism and history, bears also on this observation. It is impossible not to see that in the earliest centuries the Holy Scriptures were held to be the exclusive repertory of subjects for Christian art, and that the true and exclusive use of Christian popular art was general instruction in Scripture.

It seems possible that evangeliaries or forms of sacramental ministration may have been multiplied on papyrus, like other books, in large numbers by means of dictation—possibly to educated slaves or freedmen. If so, they have perished with other books in the wrecks of ancient civilisation.

The following inscription from the first folio of the Gospels of Treves may be taken (as prefixed to the facsimiles of Anglo-Saxon and Irish miniatures) to represent the commendatory inscriptions of the Greek MSS.

"Scriptori vita aeterna; Legenti pax perpetua; Videnti felicitas perennis; Habenti possessio cū salute. Amen Dō gracias: Ora pro me: D's tecum." [R. St. J. T.]

LITURGICAL LANGUAGE. It would seem natural that prayer and praise in the congregation should be made in the vernacular tongue of the people; and in the early days of Christianity there can be no doubt that it was so. St. Paul's depreciation of "speaking with tongues," in comparison with "prophesying" (1 Cor. xiv. 1–17), has not indeed a direct bearing on the question of liturgical language, for the "tongues" of which he speaks do not appear to have been foreign languages, but utterances which only persons specially gifted could interpret; but his reasoning on the necessity of so giving thanks and so speaking that the congregation may be edified, and may not merely hear sounds which convey no definite impression, applies in full force to services celebrated in languages "not understood of the people." Even Guéranger (Inst. Lit. iii. 86, 88; compare Bona, de Reb. Lit. i. 5), eagerly as he defends the modern Roman usage, "has no difficulty in conceding that originally the church must have employed the vulgar tongue at the altar. . . . As for the apostles themselves, there is no doubt that they celebrated the liturgy in the language of the people whom they instructed." In truth, we may safely conclude, on the testimony of Origen (c. Celsum, viii. c. 37, p. 402, Spencer), that in the third century "each man prayed to God in his own common speech (κατὰ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ διάλεκτον), and sang hymns to Him as he could."

Over a large portion of the East there can be no doubt that Greek—in which were written the great liturgies which bear the names of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark—was the language of public devotion; for, from the beginning of the fourth century, Greek was the official language of the Eastern empire, and Constantinople the seat of a patriarchate. Numerous liturgies are also found in Syriac, whether translations of Greek originals or of independent origin. The Armenian, the Ethiopic, and the native Egyptian churches had also vernacular services. Of the early use of the latter we have an instance in the circumstance which Athanasius (Vita Antonii, c. 2, p. 633) relates of St. Anthony, that he was induced to sell all that he had by hearing the parable of the rich young man read in church. As we are expressly told that the saint knew none but his native language, this lection must have been in Coptic. Where a vernacular version, from whatever cause, was not used in the services, an interpreter explained what was read. Thus Procopius held three offices in the church at Scythopolis; first, that of reading; second, that of interpreting Syriac (in Syri interpretatione sermonis); third, that of exorcist.

It is probable that even in the West the first missionaries of Christianity spoke mainly Greek, the "lingua franca" of the educated class throughout Europe, and of the scattered communities of Jews and Jewish proselytes in Gentile cities. The church in Rome to which St. Paul wrote was a Greek-speaking community, and so it continued to be for several generations. Polycarp came to Rome to confer with Anicetus on the observance of Easter in the year 170. Eusebius tells us (H. E. v. 24) that on this occasion the pope—himself almost certainly a Greek—ceded to the stranger the privilege of consecrating the eucharist. It is in the highest degree improbable that Polycarp celebrated in any other language than Greek. At the beginning of the third century Hippolytus wrote in Greek, and evidently contemplated the church in Rome as a Greek-speaking society. The inscriptions on the tombs of popes Fabian (A.D. 251), Lucius (A.D.

* The same author tells a story of a goldsmith who fraudulently combined with the saint's messenger to substitute silver for gold in the binding of an evangeliary. Both were swallowed up by the earth, "videntes et vociferantes." (De Gloria Confess. cap. lxlii. p. 946.)

252), and Eutychianus (A.D. 275) are in Greek; a fact which, as De Rossi (Roma Sott. Christ. i. p. 126) points out, evidences the official use of the Greek tongue by the Roman church in its solemn acts. And at an even later date, pope Sylvester (†335) wrote against the Jews in the Greek tongue; unless indeed the treatise which we possess is a Greek translation of a Latin original. From this time all trace of Greek as the language of the church of Rome vanishes; it probably migrated to Byzantium with the emperor and the court. Pope Leo (440–461) seems to have been ignorant of Greek; he was certainly unable to write it, for he speaks of the necessity of having an accurate Greek translation made of his letter to Flavian (Epist. 131 ad Julian.); and the words of Proterius (Leon. Epist. 133), apologising for the omission of a Latin translation of his letter, the responsibility of which (as it seems) he wished to leave to the pope, seem to imply that he could not read it in Greek. Survivals of the days when Greek was the liturgical language of the church of Rome are found in the Kyrie Eleison so frequent in her services; in the use of the Greek Trisagion—Agios o Theos, agios ischyros, agios athanatos, eleison imas—in the Holy Week; in the recitation of the Creed in Greek on behalf of a child to be baptized [CREED, I. 492]; in the reading of certain lections in Greek as well as in Latin [INSTRUCTION, I. 862]; and in the singing of the angelic hymn in Greek in the Christmas mass (Martene, Rit. Ant. I. iii. 2, § 6).

In the half-Greek districts of Southern Italy, Greek rites naturally lingered long; but the Greek element received a large accession when Leo the Isaurian, in the eighth century, placed a considerable part of Southern Italy under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, who not only founded new sees, but made vigorous efforts to introduce Greek rites. And these efforts of the pope's adversaries were seconded by the pope's adherents; for many Basilian monks who, like the pope, defended images, took refuge in the same region, where they naturally maintained their own services in their monasteries, which were numerous (P. P. Rodota, Dell' Origine, Progresso, e stato presente del Rito Greco in Italia osservato dai Greci Monaci Basiliani e Albanese, Roma, 1758). There is a strong indication of the mixture of the two languages in the following circumstance. The author of the life of Athanasius of Naples (†877), commonly supposed to be Peter the Deacon, speaks of "laity and clergy not ceasing in common prayer in Greek and Latin." Even the purely Western Benedictine Order was not insensible to the influence of the Greek colonies in its neighbourhood. Thus we read that the monks of Monte Cassino on Easter Tuesday, going from their monastery to the church of St. Peter, sang mass with a bilingual chant (Greek and Latin) to the end of the gospel (Codex Cassin. in Martene, Monach. Rit. III. xvii. n. 14).

In Southern Gaul we find another region which had received its civilisation mainly from Greece. There, says Dean Milman, "Latin had not entirely dispossessed the Greek even in the fifth century;" and Jourdain (Traductions d'Aristote, p. 44) refers to a MS. of Limoges in the National Library at Paris (No. 4458), which gives the Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the mass of Pentecost, in Greek. Doublet (Antiq. de S. Denis, c. 48, p. 366) tells us that on the festival of St. Denis the monks of the abbey of St. Denis, near Paris, chanted the whole mass in Greek, in honour of the Greek apostle of France, with Epistle and Gospel in Latin as well as in Greek.

The MS. Sacramentary, No. 2290, of the Paris National Library, which is of the ninth century, contains at the beginning the Gloria in Excelsis, the Nicene Creed, the Sanctus, and the Agnus Dei, in Greek, but in Latin characters. In the so-called "Athelstane's Psalter" (British Museum, Galba, A. xviii.), in a portion of the MS. which belongs to the early part of the ninth century, we find a short Litany, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Sanctus, in Greek, in Anglo-Saxon characters. And in a Psalter in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, called "Pope Gregory's Psalter," is a Creed in Greek.

At the time when Christianity was first preached, Latin was rapidly becoming the common tongue of a large part of Western Europe; the conquests of Rome, as St. Augustine remarks (De Civ. Dei, xix. 7), imposed the Latin language on the subject races. Latin was commonly spoken in the Roman colony of Africa, and in Africa we find the most considerable Latin writers of the early ages—Tertullian and Cyprian. St. Augustine tells us of himself (Conf. i. 14) that he learned Latin in the nursery, and contrasts the perfect ease with which he acquired this with the difficulty which he afterwards experienced in learning Greek. In preaching at Hippo he assumes that his congregation all spoke Latin, while some at least did not understand the native Punic; for, quoting a Punic proverb, he thinks it necessary to translate it into Latin: "quia Punice non omnes nostis" (Serm. 167, on Eph. v. 15, 16). The earliest distinct mention of a liturgical form in Latin appears to be Cyprian's citation of the Sursum Corda (De Orat. Dom. c. 31). Gaul from the time of its subjugation adopted the Roman customs and idiom with remarkable readiness; and in later times the civilised Gauls imposed their tongue on their Frankish and Norman conquerors. An incident related by Sulpicius Severus (Vita S. Mart. c. 9) may serve to shew that Latin was what we may fairly call the vernacular of at least a portion of Gaul in the fourth century. Martin was taken by force from his beloved monastery by a crowd of the neighbouring villagers to be made bishop. In the church to which he was taken some one in the crowd, opening a Psalter at random, read aloud from the eighth psalm the verse, "Ex ore infantium et lactentium perfectisti laudem propter inimicos tuos, ut destruas inimicum et defensorem."^a There was instantly a shout raised, for the people looked upon the passage as of ill omen to Defensor, a neighbouring bishop who had opposed Martin's election. In Spain also, after its subjugation by the Romans, the Latin language came into common use. It seems also to have been spoken in Dalmatia. Jerome at least, who was born there, clearly regarded it as his native language, and complains that he never heard of it in its purity while he was living in the East (Epist. 7 [al. 43] ad Chrom. p. 18). Even in Britain after the time of Agricola the upper classes adopted to some extent the Roman language and customs (Tacit. Agric. c. 21).

When Latin was so generally diffused, it could not fail soon to become the vehicle of public worship. When public prayer was first offered in Latin in Rome itself we cannot tell, but it is an obvious conjecture that when the "old Italic" version of the New Testament came into use in Rome, prayers and thanksgivings were also said in the Latin tongue. That at an early date Latin became the liturgical language of (at least) much the greater part of Italy, of Gaul, and of Spain, admits of no doubt whatever. The "clerks" and officials everywhere spoke Latin throughout the Western empire. And even when Christianity was introduced into regions where little or no Latin was spoken, as Britain and Ireland, there is no evidence of vernacular services; the early evangelists of Britain, St. Patrick and his followers in Ireland, the Roman missionaries to the Angles and Saxons, alike seem to have retained the Roman language in the offices which they introduced. Probably it would have seemed a kind of profanation to translate sacred phrases into the "gibberish" of barbarian tribes. Indeed it came to be maintained that a certain sacredness attaches to the three languages, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, of the inscription on the Lord's cross (Hilary of Poitiers, Prolog. in lib. Pss. c. 15; Honorius of Autun, Gemma Animæ, i. 92), and that these tongues alone—Syriac being taken to represent the ancient Hebrew—are fit vehicles for the public prayers of Christians. Hilary further elevates Latin to a dominant position among the three tongues, as the language of Rome, "specialiter evangelica doctrina in Romani imperii, sub quo Hebraei et Graeci continentur, sede consistit." Ulfilas did indeed give the Goths a vernacular version of the Bible, but even here there is no trace remaining of Gothic offices.

That the Latin of the service-books was often, even among the so-called "Latin" races, a tongue "not understood of the people" seems scarcely doubtful. In Italy, for instance, where even at this day the peasantry speak several dialects neither mutually intelligible nor intelligible to those who only understand the literary Italian, we cannot suppose that the language of Leo and Gregory was everywhere understood. The same may be said of Spain and Gaul, and still more of Britain and Ireland. Provision was no doubt made for instructing the several races in their own tongues wherein they were born, and there is no reason to doubt that the nature of the several offices was explained to the faithful; but the offices themselves seem to have been invariably said in Latin. Whatever may be the case with the Syriac or other Eastern offices, in the districts where Greek and Latin were the ecclesiastical languages the gulf between the tongue of the church and the tongue of the people was always widening; the dialect of the streets came to differ widely from the unchanging idiom of the church, even while it retained the same name. In the eighth century this divergency became so marked that it was recognised by authority. A council at Frankfort in the year 794 (c. 52, Concc. Germ. i. 328; Baluze, Capit.

Reg. Fr. i. 270) expressly repudiated the theory of the three sacred languages, on the ground that God heareth prayer in every tongue; and Charles the Great, insisting (Capit. v. 161, in Baluze, i. 835) that all men should learn the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, makes provision for the case of those who know none but their mother tongue: "qui aliter non potuerit vel in sua lingua hoc discat." The same monarch further directs (Capit. vi. 185; Bal. i. 954) that every presbyter should teach men publicly in his church, in the tongue which his hearers understand, truly to believe the faith of Almighty God in Unity and Trinity, and also those things which are to be said to all generally; as of avoiding evil and doing good, and of the judgment to come in the Resurrection. He who cannot do this of himself is to get a proper form of words written out by some more learned person, which he may read; and he who cannot even do this must exhort the people in the words, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Herard (Capit. 55, Bal. i. 1289) ordered that no man should be admitted to be a godfather who did not understand the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in his own tongue, and the nature of the covenant made with God. A council at Rheims, A.D. 813 (c. 15), enjoined bishops to preach in the dialects of their several dioceses, and in the same year a council at Tours (c. 17) ordered bishops to translate their homilies into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue. So the council of Mayence (c. 2) in the year 847. At a still earlier date the council of Lestines, A.D. 743 (Concc. Germ. i. 51; Swainson, The Nicene and Apostles' Creeds, p. 22) had ordered the Renunciations and Professions in baptism to be made in the vernacular—which is given in the canon—of the Teutonic converts. These instances shew that, while care was taken to instruct the faithful in the cardinal truths of Christianity, the offices in general were in the ecclesiastical tongue, Latin.

When the Slavonic races were converted in the 9th century, pope John VIII. (A.D. 880) not only permitted but recommended that the divine offices and liturgy should be said in their vernacular. It is interesting to notice that he expressly repudiates the theory of three sacred languages and no more, saying that Scripture calls upon all nations and all peoples to praise the Lord, and that the apostles spoke in all tongues the wonderful works of God (Epist. 293, ad Swentopole. Migne, 126, p. 906). Nor is it (he continues) in any way contrary to sound faith and doctrine to say masses in the Slavonic tongue; or to read the gospel, or lessons of the Old or New Testament, well translated or interpreted; or to sing other hour-offices in it; for He who made the three chief tongues (linguas principales), Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, also made the others to His honour and glory. The pope however makes this reservation, that the gospel, to give it the more honour, should always be read first in Latin, and afterwards translated into Slavonic. Swentopulk and his judges may, if they please, hear mass in Latin. The Russian church retains to this day its vernacular services.

The following are instances of provision being made for the wants of a district where several languages were spoken. Theodosius the archimandrite built within the circuit of his monastery four churches; one for the brothers of the house, in which the offices were said in Greek; one in which they were said in the vernacular of the Bessae, a barbarous tribe of the neighbourhood; one in which they were said in Armenian; and a fourth in which the brothers who were vexed with devils, and those who had charge of them, had their special service. The ordinary daily offices were thus said severally; but when the eucharist was celebrated, the office was said in the several churches and tongues to the end of the gospel, and then the several congregations (except the demoniacs) assembled in the Greek—the proper monastic—church for the remaining portion of the celebration (Simeon Metaphr. Vita Theod. c. 24, in Surius, Jan. 11). It is not quite clear whether the restriction of the more solemn part of the mysteries to one church and one tongue arose simply from a desire to symbolise more emphatically the oneness of the community, or from a reluctance to recite the anaphora in any other than one of the recognised “sacred” languages; and the same ambiguity attaches to the following somewhat similar instance. St. Sabas is said (Cyril Scythop. Vita Sab. cc. 20, 32, in Cotelierius, Mon. Eccl. Graec. iii. 247, 264) to have provided the Armenians with an oratory, and afterwards with a church, where they might say the psalmody, the megalion, and other portions of the divine office separately in their own tongue, but at the time of oblation join the Hellenists and communicate with them. The same event is narrated in Surius (Dec. 5) in the following form. Sabas transferred the Armenian congregation to the church which he had built, on condition that the glorification and reading of the gospels should take place in their own tongue, while they should partake of the divine mysteries with the rest. And the writer adds, that when some adopted an addition made by Peter the Fuller to the angelic hymn [SANCTUS], Sabas desired them to chant that hymn in Greek, that he might know whether they adopted the correct version; he apparently did not understand Armenian.

LITURGY. (1.) The Greek words λειτουργία, λειτουργός, λειτουργεῖν, in their early usage are applied to the work or the agent in any public service. Etymologically we may compare δημιουργός. Λειτουργεῖν thus means to perform some service for the public. In Athens, it came to be used technically for the duty which wealthy men were especially called upon to render to the state, and the λειτουργία was the service which they rendered. [See “Leiturgia,” IN DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.]

(2.) Except in a passage of Plutarch, where the limitation is effected by the context, we do not find in classical Greek any sacred application of the word LITURGY other than is contained in the above. But in the Septuagint it is generally, though not exclusively, used in this behalf. Thus we have the word and its derivatives applied to the service at the altar; or to the service in or to the tabernacle; and in Daniel vii. 10, “Thousand thousands ministered unto Him.”

(3.) In the New Testament the usage of the words is less restricted. Thus, kings are ministers to God, in attending on the duties of their high office (Rom. xiii. 6). Hence we pass on to the parabolic use of the word λειτουργός, in Rom. xv. 16. “So that I should be a minister to Jesus Christ (λειτουργὸν Ἰ. Χ.) for the Gentiles, in administering in sacerdotal or sacred fashion (ιερουργούντα) the gospel of God, in order that the offering up of the Gentiles might become accepted, being sanctified in the Holy Ghost.” Another instance of this parabolic use is to be found in Phil. ii. 17. “But even if I am poured out as a libation over the sacrifice and ministry (λειτουργία) of your faith, I rejoice and congratulate you all.” Thus the special meaning of the word and its cognates in any particular passage must be determined (if at all) by the context. There can be no doubt of the meaning in Luke i. 23, “when the days of his ministration were accomplished.” Some doubt is felt as to Acts xiii. 2, “As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted.” Chrysostom explains the word by κηρυττοντων (preaching); it would rather seem to refer to some public ministration to the Lord, such as was accompanied with a fast. Of the Saviour it is recorded (Heb. viii. 6), that He has obtained a more excellent ministry than the ministry of Aaron: the explanation being given in vv. 1, 2. “He is seated on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle.” Thus the angels are ministering spirits, sent forth for service (εἰς διακονίαν), for the sake of those who are to inherit salvation.

(4.) In early Christian literature the word λειτουργεῖν was soon adopted in reference to sacred functions. Thus Clemens Romanus (l. c. 8) speaks of the old prophets as the ministers of the grace of God, speaking through the Holy Spirit. And in c. 44 he speaks of the office of the apostles as being their Liturgy or Ministry. In the process of time the word liturgy came, in practice, to be regarded as the appropriate designation of the Eucharistic office, but it is not quite clear when this limitation was generally accepted. At the council of Ancyra, (A.D. 314), a presbyter who had offered to an idol, was forbidden (c. i.) “either to offer or to address the congregation, or to minister any part whatever of the hieratic ministrations,” ἢ ὅλως λειτουργεῖν τὰ τῶν ἱερατικῶν λειτουργιῶν. Canon 2 enforced a similar rule on deacons who had lapsed. Athanasius speaks of the Arians stopping the bread (τῶν λειτουργῶν καὶ τῶν παρθένων) of the ministers and the virgins. In the acts of the council of Ephesus mention is made of the evening and morning liturgies, and Theodoret (iii. 114) is also quoted as speaking of the evening liturgy, i.e. the evening service. The same writer (iii. 1065) speaks of the liturgy of the Holy Baptism:

and Ep. cxlvi. p. 1032, he says that in almost all the churches the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 13) forms the introduction to the mystical liturgy. The additional mystical of course limits the term Liturgy, and, in fact, we shall find that this benediction stands at the commencement of the anaphora in most of the liturgies that will come under our review. It is not found in that of St. Mark, nor the Coptic St. Basil, nor in the Mozarabic. I may mention also here that it is not found in either the Roman or the Ambrosian or the Gallican Canon. Theodoret therefore refers to the liturgies of the Oriental churches proper.*

(5.) Turning now to the services for the administration of the Eucharist, which are specifically called LITURGIES, we may note in passing that the newly discovered complement to the first letter of Clemens Romanus contains liturgical phrases which we find also in the liturgy of the church of Alexandria, of which below. Apart from this, the earliest records of such service are contained in the letter of Pliny to Trajan, and the Apology of Justin Martyr. From the former, we know that the Christians used to meet on a stated day before it was light, and repeat alternately a hymn to Christ as God, and bind themselves sacramento that they would commit no crime; then they separated, and came together again a second time to partake of food, ordinary and innocent. The use of the word sacramentum here certainly seems to point to the reception of the Eucharist, for it is, of course, inconceivable that an oath to this effect should be repeated on every occasion:—it may, however, point to the Baptismal promise. But the accounts in Justin Martyr give us more information. He describes the service as it was performed after the administration of Baptism, and again on an ordinary Sunday. Combining the two accounts together we learn that during the service the records of the apostles or the writings of the prophets were read by a special reader, and, when he had ceased, the President instructed the congregation, urging them to imitate the noble things of which they had heard. United or common prayer was offered for those who were assembled, for those who had been baptized, and for all believers everywhere, that now that they had learned the truth they might by their good works be enabled to keep God's commandments so that they might attain to eternal salvation. The prayers were said standing, and apparently by all: and these being concluded they saluted each other with the kiss of peace. Then bread was brought to the president and a cup of wine and water; and now he, alone, with all his energy, sent up his prayers and thanksgivings, and the people assented with the word "Amen," and the deacons gave to each of those who were present a portion of the bread and wine and water over which the thanksgiving had been offered, and portions were also sent by their hands to those who were absent, and, Justin adds, the wealthy and willing give freely, each according as he wishes, and the collection is deposited with the president, and he assists the orphans and widows, those who are impoverished by sickness or other cause, those that are in prison, and strangers who may happen to be sojourning amongst them: and Justin twice announces that this is done on the day called Sunday. In his dialogue with Trypho we have frequent references to the Eucharist. From one of them we learn that at the time when the Christians offered their sacrifice to God, mention was made of the sufferings which the Son of God underwent (Dialogue, § 117).

(6.) A question has arisen whether this account refers to the service in Palestine—for Justin was a native of Samaria—or to the service near Rome, the seat of the emperors to whom his apology was addressed. The question seems to be settled by the following considerations:—The kiss of peace is given in the Roman church in the solemn mass after consecration: here it is before it. Again, it is one of the points which are noted as differing the Roman from the other missae, that in the Roman order there was generally no lesson from the prophets. Here there was such lesson every Sunday.

Thus we have apparently sufficient warrant for the conclusion of Palmer (Origines Liturgicæ, vol. i. p. 42) that Justin Martyr's account is of the liturgy of the patriarchate of Antioch. And it is interesting to note that later narratives agree with his description as far as it goes. All the points he introduces are found in the later liturgy of Jerusalem.

(7.) Liturgy of Jerusalem.—Passing over for the time the liturgy contained in the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions, we proceed from Justin Martyr, who must have written about A.D. 150, to the lectures of Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from the year 351 to 386. Cyril has left us seventeen lectures, delivered, apparently about the year 347, to the catechumens in the course of Lent, and five to the recently baptized, delivered shortly after Easter. In these five he gives descriptions and explanations of the sacramental offices, and, in the last of all, an account of the Communion Service. His hearers had been present at it, but they had not been taught the meaning of its several parts.

(8.) There can be no doubt that every marked feature of the office, as it then existed, is noted here by St. Cyril. He commences, however, after the dismissal of the uninitiated; at a point (that is) corresponding to the close of the sermon in the account of Justin Martyr. He describes the ablutions, possibly with LAVABO [II. 938], followed by the KISS of peace, and then proceeds to the Sursum Corda, Preface, Sanctus, Consecration, Intercession, Lord's Prayer [CANON, I. 269], Sancta Sanctis, Gustate, and COMMUNION [I. 413].

(9.) It is interesting to compare with this the liturgy of St. James,—the liturgy, that is, of the church of Palestine.

We have it in two forms: the one form from two Greek manuscripts (with a fragment of a third), of which the first was written during the 12th century at Antioch; the second MS. appears to have been transcribed at Mount Sinai during the 10th (Palmer, i. 21, 22). The second form, published by Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 29, is found in Syriac, and is still retained amongst the Monophysites or Jacobites in the East (Palmer,

* The use of Λειτουργία as embracing the evening service continued even to the end of the 6th century (see Eustratius; Migne, 86, p. 2380 n).

i. 16). The points of similarity are sufficient to prove that they had a common origin, and undoubtedly what is common to the two must have been in use in the united church at the beginning of the 5th century, i.e. before the schism of A.D. 451.

(10.) We see, therefore, here, on the one hand, how the service of Cyril's time was even in a hundred years augmented by many additions, and we find on the other that nearly everything which Cyril mentions remains untouched, both in the Greek and Syriac liturgies. We have the "Sursum Corda" in both,—the "Vere dignum," the "Sanctus sanctus"; the precise words that the Holy Spirit may make this bread the Body of Christ, and this cup the Blood of Christ, the prayers for the living, the commemoration of, and the petitions for, the dead. The very words used by Cyril are found in the Greek. And thus we take a step forward in our history; and it is interesting further to notice that Jerome in his controversy with the Pelagians (book ii. sect. 23; Migne, vol. xxiii. p. 587), mentions that the voices of the priests daily sing that "Christ is the only sinless One." We find the expression both in the Syriac and in the Greek liturgies before us: "He is the only sinless one that has appeared upon the earth." Again, in the same dialogue, book iii., sect. 15, p. 612, Jerome says that our Lord taught His apostles that "daily at the sacrifice or sacrament of His body (the manuscripts read sacramento) believers should dare to say—Our Father which art in heaven." He refers, no doubt, as before, to the liturgy of Jerusalem, for his work seems to have been written in the neighbourhood of the Holy City shortly after the opinions of Pelagius had received encouragement from the bishop Johannes. Once more in his commentary on Isaiah, book ii. chap. vi. v. 20 (vol. xxiv. 88 of Migne), Jerome says, "Quotidie caelesti pane saturati dicimus; Gustate et videte quam suavis est Dominus,"—words which occur (I believe) only in the liturgy of St. James. The whole psalm is recited in the Syriac St. James.

(11.) Further illustrations have been drawn from the Homiletic writings of St. Chrysostom, of which several were written when he was a presbyter of the church of Antioch (see Palmer, i. 80, and Bingham, Antiquities, book XIII. vi.). It will be unnecessary to carry out this comparison at length, but we may note that Chrysostom speaks of the whole congregation joining in common prayer for those who were afflicted by evil spirits and those who were in a state of penance; and then he reminds his hearers how, when only the initiated remain, they prostrate themselves on the pavement, rise together, and the priest alone offers up the prayers, and the people respond. He mentions the benediction, "The Grace of our Lord," and the address, "Up with our mind and hearts." He speaks of the reasonable service, the bloodless sacrifice; he speaks of the cherubim and seraphim, of the invocation of the Holy Spirit to be present and touch the gifts lying upon the holy table; he speaks of the commemoration of the living and the dead, of the Lord's Prayer, of the holy things for holy persons, of the breaking of the bread of the Communion. All these but one (of which below) are found both in the Syriac and in the Greek, and so far our position is strengthened—that much that is common to the two belongs at least to the 4th or 5th century.

(12.) Two points remain to be noticed. i. After the words of institution the oblation in the Greek is this: "remembering then His life-giving sufferings, His saving cross, His death and resurrection from the dead, and His ascension into heaven; His session at the right hand of Thee, O God and Father, we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice."

The words in the Syriac liturgy correspond almost exactly to these, except that the oblation is made to Christ: "We remember Thy death and resurrection, Thy ascension into heaven, Thy sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice." The difference is momentous, and the question at once arises which of the two is the more ancient form.

The Syriac is, as we have seen, in use at the present day. The Greek is, as we shall see, affected by later additions from foreign sources; but this fact alone would not, of course, decide the question as to the original form of this momentous formula.

(13.) ii. Our second point is this: Palmer draws attention (Origines, i. 24, 25) to several indications that the Greek liturgy of St. James has been affected by late interpolations. These we need not repeat here. I would add that the introduction of a Creed in the proanaphora is a further indication that the liturgy was altered after the date which I have specified. Another indication of change is this: that the prayer for the king, mentioned by St. Cyril and retained by the Syriac (p. 35), is omitted in the Greek, probably because the state rulers of Palestine favoured the Jacobites more than the orthodox. The appeal χαῖρε κεχαρισμένη, which is introduced, is entirely out of place, and ungrammatical; it must, therefore, be a late addition: and it is not in the Syriac. There is no prayer in the Greek for the energumens, nor for the penitents, nor for the catechumens, and no notice of their exclusion. This fact also shows that the text of the manuscripts which we possess had been altered at a period when the custom of excluding the two former classes had ceased to be observed.

(14.) The paucity of the Greek manuscripts of course indicates that the rite of St. James has long ceased to be of general observance; in fact, it was first interpolated out of the liturgy of Constantinople, and then gave way before it. Yet it is said to be still used in islands of the Archipelago and elsewhere on St. James's day, but no manuscripts of the modern form have been brought to the west. The conclusion is that the Greek use was generally discontinued before the 13th century. Charles the Bald stated that the rite was celebrated before him; and we learn from Theodore Balsamon and his contemporary Marcus, orthodox bishop of Alexandria, that it, or a rite which went by this name, was still used in the 12th century on great feast-days in the churches of Jerusalem and the rest of Palestine. It was at that time unknown at Antioch.

(15.) Liturgies of the Churches of Egypt.—It will be best now to turn to the liturgies of the churches of Alexandria, with which I would connect the liturgy of the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions. We have three notices of the celebration in this version; two of them analogous to that in the eighth book of the Greek version, which is called the Clementine liturgy, and is really an account of a service after the consecration of a bishop. There are several points of deep interest connected with the Coptic constitutions, not the least that the Copts had introduced into their language the Greek terms for presbyter, deacon, bishop, Spirit, Eucharist, offering, salutation; indeed we may say every technical term connected with the celebration. We read (Tattam, Apostolical Constitutions in Coptic, with Translation; Orient. Trans. Fund, 1848; bk. ii. p. 32), "After the salutation and the kiss of peace, the deacons present the offering to the newly-made bishop; he puts his hand upon it with the presbyters, and says the eucharistia." It begins with the prayer, "The Lord be with you all," and the people say, "And with thy spirit." The bishop says, "Lift up your hearts;" they reply, "We lift them up unto the Lord." He says again, "Let us give thanks unto our Lord;" the people say, "It is right and just;" and then he is directed to say the prayers which follow according "to the form or custom of the holy offering." It is quite clear that the service was in Greek throughout when this version of the "canons of the apostles" was made. But Archdeacon Tattam, to whom we owe our edition of the book, unfortunately missed some of the points in his translation; and thus, to the mere English reader, his words can scarcely be said to represent adequately the character of the original. Thus ευχαριμεν, he translates "Let us pray." It was really a mistake for εχομεν.

(16.) We have a further account in the same second book (Tattam, p. 62). This may be compared with the last lecture of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, for it is the account of the Communion as administered to the newly baptized. We have again the instruction that the deacon should bring the offering to the bishop, and that the latter should give thanks over the bread and over the cup of wine, because of the similitude of the one to the flesh of Christ, and of the other to the blood of Christ. Mention is made of an offering of milk and honey in remembrance of the promise made to the fathers: "I will give you a land flowing with milk and honey." Then the bishop divides the bread, and gives a portion to each. "This is the bread of heaven, the Body of Christ Jesus" (the last clause in Greek). The presbyter or deacon takes the cup, and gives them the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord, and the milk and the honey, saying, "This is the Blood of Christ Jesus," and he who receives says, "Amen."

The account concludes: These things have been delivered to you briefly concerning the holy Baptisma and the holy Offering.

(17.) There is yet a third account in the fourth book (§ lxx. p. 116). This is a second representation of the service after the ordination of a bishop; it is somewhat longer than the other, supplying additional details. Thus we have the direction of the deacon: "Let no unbeliever remain in this place;" the words bidding them salute one another with a holy kiss; the exclusion of the catechumens and the "hearers," and of all who were not partakers of the holy mysteries. The deacons bring the gifts to the bishop to the holy altar (θυσιαστήριον), the presbyters standing on his right hand and on his left, and the "high priest" prays over the offering that the Holy Spirit may descend upon it and make the bread the body of Christ, and the cup the blood of Christ. Then all partake; first the clergy, then all the people, and then all the women; a psalm was sung during the distribution, and when all was over the deacons called out, "We have all partaken of the blessed Body and Blood of Christ; let us give thanks to Him;" the bishop gives them the blessing, and they are told to depart in peace.

(18.) There can be no doubt that the rubrics of these second and fourth books represent the service at slightly different epochs; thus the word ἀρχιερεύς, which is limited to the Jewish high priest on p. 108, is given to the bishop on p. 122. The word θυσιαστήριον occurs, however, twice in the first book (p. 20). But the whole account will serve us as an introduction to the later liturgies of the church of Alexandria as we find them in the Greek and Coptic versions.

(19.) Of the Alexandrine Fathers, Clemens speaks (Stromat. i. 19) of those who use bread and water in the offering not in accordance with the canons of the church; and Origen of our offering sacrifices to the Father through Christ (on Isa. vi. 6; Homil. i. near the end; tom. xiii. Lommatzsch). Of the liturgies that have come down to us as connected with various branches or offshoots of the church of the patriarchate of Alexandria, Renaudot gives several, but they may be reduced to three distinct works:—

- (1) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril.
- (2) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Basil. This must be carefully distinguished, as we shall see hereafter, from the liturgy of the church of Caesarea.
- (3) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Gregory the Theologian, i.e. Gregory Nazianzen.

To these we must add what is called 'The Universal Canon of the Aethiopic Church.'

(20.) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic liturgy of St. Cyril are related to each other, as are the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. James; they have much in common; but the liturgy of St. Cyril has been used even to the present day by the Monophysites, who have formed the mass of the Egyptian Christians, whilst that of St. Mark was in use only for a limited time by the Melchites or orthodox. For the latter body being small in numbers, and weak in influence, have, for many ages, been drawn within the circle of the church of Constantinople, and have used the liturgy of that church. And thus it is that apparently only one copy of the Greek liturgy of St. Mark has survived. This was found in a monastery of the order of St. Basil, at Rossano, in Calabria. Renaudot saw it at Rome in the house of the religious of the same order. The MS. is of the 10th or 11th century. By comparing the two together, we are able to infer what was the common property of the whole patriarchate before the schism of A.D. 451, and thus also to discover what each body added at later periods.

The liturgies of St. Basil and St. Gregory are also used by the Monophysites (Renaudot, i. 154); the former on fast days, the latter on feast days, except in Lent and the month "Cohiac," during which the liturgy of St. Cyril is used.

(21.) We will turn first to the Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril. We have already mentioned that words recently discovered in the Epistle of Clemens Romanus are found here. These words are (Bryennius, p. 105), "Raise those that are fallen; bring back those who are wandering; feed those who are hungry; deliver those of us who are in bonds; comfort the feeble-minded." They are all found both in the Coptic (Renaudot, vol. i. p. 65), and in the Greek (Neale, Greek Liturgies, ed. 1868, p. 21). The Coptic has also: "Save those of us who are in trouble," which are also Clementine. This fact is interesting in more ways than one, as we shall see. I may mention now that it is a renewed proof of the connexion between the churches of Alexandria and Rome, to which Dr. Neale speaks in his 'General Introduction' (vol. i. p. 120). In the Greek St. Mark, we have the introductory or proanaphoral portion, which is quite distinct from anything in the Coptic. In point of fact, the liturgy of St. Cyril begins with the kiss of peace immediately preceding the Sursum Corda (Renaudot, i. 38). We are informed that the "Preparation" which is given in the Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, i. 1-82) is always used, whatever the liturgy proper may be. Passing on to the canon, I would observe that the intercessory prayers, which are offered by the priest after the giving of thanks in the "dignum et justum est," are addressed in the Greek liturgy to the Father, in the Coptic to our Lord. In both, the Virgin is commemorated, whilst the "Hail thou that art highly favoured," occurring in the Greek, is not found in the Coptic. This, therefore, is apparently of late introduction. In the Coptic the prayer is addressed to Christ to receive "the sacrifices and oblations of those who offer on His spiritual heavenly altar;" in the Greek a similar prayer is addressed to God. The petitions which I have mentioned just now as occurring in Clemens Romanus occur at this part of the service. The words of St. Paul with reference to Christ (Eph. i. 21) are found in both, and thus it is with reference to Christ that the words follow, "Thousand thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand of holy angels and archangels stand before Thee!" Then the words of institution follow. In both versions the appeal is made to God the Father that we are setting forth the death of His Son, and confessing His resurrection, and waiting for His second coming to judge the world; and with this before our mind "we have set before Thee Thine own of Thine own gifts." The epiclesis or invocation follows, the same in both, bearing, however, internal marks that it was composed after the council of Nicaea, a prayer for sanctification, and the Lord's Prayer. Here the Coptic of St. Cyril lapses into the Coptic St. Basil. The Greek, however, proceeds to the end. The "Sancta sanctis," on p. 28, and the "unus Pater sanctus," etc., on the same page; the benediction and the dismissal, p. 30.

(22.) By comparing the Coptic St. Basil with the Greek and Arabic versions of the same liturgy, we are again able, in some degree, to note the history of liturgic change. It would appear that many of the Greek phrases were continued in use in the Coptic church, as we have already noticed them in the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions (Renaudot, i. 13). Here, after the "Sanctus," the liturgy reverts to the history of our fall, our being placed in paradise, our transgression. It thus passes onwards with great beauty through the warnings given by the prophets to the birth of the Saviour, His love for us, His death, His resurrection, His ascension. Then it records how He left to us this great mystery of piety (the words of 1 Tim. iii. 16) and instituted the Eucharist, giving the words of the institution. Then it proceeds, as in the Greek St. Mark, only where that had "we have offered to Thee of Thine own gifts," here we read, "we do offer Thee." The Epiclesis follows, in the Coptic the appeal being to Christ, in the Greek and Arabic to God.

Then come the intercessory prayers (not before the words of institution, as in St. Mark and St. Cyril), and these are addressed to God. Commemoration is made also of the Virgin and other saints, including, in the Coptic St. Basil, several of a late date, and the diptychs are read and the Lord's Prayer follows; then an interesting absolution of a precatory character and the "Sancta sanctis." The fraction takes place and a confession (which we also find in the Gregorian liturgy), "that this is the flesh of Christ which He received from the Virgin, and made one with His divinity and delivered for us all on the cross." Further intercessions—in some respect like those of Clemens Romanus, but with the addition, "give rest to those who have fallen asleep before us"—follow in the Arabic, but are not in the Coptic. The dismissal of the people takes place, and then that of the deacons. This does not occur in the Coptic. The communion of the people is mentioned in the Coptic (p. 24), but not in the Greek or Arabic.

(23.) The liturgy of St. Gregory will not detain us long; it begins in the Greek and Arabic with a prayer which is also found in the Greek St. James (Neale, G. L., p. 54), with a few words interpolated that the "sacrifice may be for the rest and refreshment of our fathers who have fallen asleep before us, and for the strengthening of Thy people." Moreover, in the Greek "St. James" it is addressed to God, in the Egyptian "St. Gregory" to Christ. This liturgy resembles the Egyptian St. Basil rather than that of St. Cyril; after the "vere dignum," however, there is a hymn of thanksgiving which we do not find there, but, in some respects like the other, it passes on to a touching appeal to God. "No language can measure the ocean of Thy love: Thou madest me a man, not Thyself being in need of my service; . . . it is Thou who, in the bread and the wine, hast delivered to me the mystic participation of Thy flesh."

The account of the Institution follows in the form of a narrative addressed to the Saviour, and the priest continues: "Remembering Thy coming upon earth, Thy Death, Thy Resurrection, Ascension and coming Advent, we offer to Thee of Thine own gifts"; and he beseeches Christ to come and complete the mystic service, to send His Spirit and sanctify and change the gifts into the Body and Blood of our redemption.

Intercessory prayers now follow, and the commemoration of the saints departed: the diptychs are read, and another appeal to Jesus Christ. The Lord's Prayer follows, and after a while the thanksgiving after Communion; but here both the Coptic and the Arabic fail us, so that the prayers in the Greek which follow appear to be late.

(24.) It remains only to speak of the Ethiopic canon, which commences (Renaudot, vol. i. 472) with some beautiful passages from Holy Scripture. From p. 476 we have much in common with the Coptic St. Basil. The canon proper begins on p. 486, but it is strange that we have nothing corresponding to the "Lift up your hearts" of almost all the other liturgies. The intercessory prayers precede the words of institution, and then follows the appeal, "We are setting forth Thy death, O Lord. We believe Thy resurrection, ascension, and second advent, and keeping the memorial of Thy death and resurrection we offer to Thee this bread and this cup." The epiclesis follows: the prayer for pardon for the living, the prayer for rest for the dead. The Sancta sanctis with the confession as we found it in St. Basil, the Communion of the people, the thanksgiving after Communion and the Lord's Prayer—the only instance that yet we have met with of such position. We need not discuss the other Ethiopic forms; they are seven in number, but five have never been published (Neale, i. 325).

(25.) Some question has arisen as to the relative claims of these liturgies of St. Basil and St. Mark to be the primitive liturgy of the Egyptian church. Renaudot gives the place to "St. Basil," Palmer to "St. Mark." The latter founds his judgment in part on the comparison of both with the Universal Canon of the Ethiopians, which he considers to "agree exactly in order and substance with the liturgies of Cyril and Mark, and no others" (i. p. 90). An entirely independent collation leads the writer to reject this statement, and to regard the Alexandrine St. Basil, and the Ethiopian Canon as intimately connected with each other. A comparison of the liturgies with quotations by any of the Alexandrine Fathers, may facilitate our judgment.

(26.) We shall receive but little assistance from the general tone of Origen's treatise on prayer, except by noting that when he expresses (as he seems to do) his wish that prayer should be addressed mainly to the Father through the Son, his language would seem to intimate that in his time the general custom of his church was to address their prayers to Christ. His reference to the thousand thousands and myriads of myriads (against Celsus, viii. 34) may be paralleled out of all the liturgies. Cyril of Alexandria (we take these references from Palmer, i. 102-3) refers to the Seraphin (not Cherubin as Palmer has it) veiling their faces; this is not mentioned in "Basil," but it is mentioned in the others. The same father says (Epist. ad Johan. Anti-ch.), "We are taught also to say in our prayers, 'O Lord our God, give us peace: for Thou hast given us all things,'"—words to which we find the nearest resemblance in the Basilian Coptic and Greek. St. Mark has only "O king of peace, give thy peace to us in harmony and love." Origen on Jeremiah (xiv. § 14) remarks, "We often say in our prayers, Give me a portion with the prophets, give me a portion with the apostles." A petition resembling this is found both in the Coptic St. Basil and St. Cyril, and the Greek St. Mark. It would be scarcely fair to draw from this the conclusion that what is called St. Basil's Liturgy was used at Alexandria in the time of Cyril, rather than that which we call St. Mark's; but it would seem that when St. Cyril wrote the words I have quoted, the liturgy which bears his name had not been amended. Other references have been noticed in Dionysius of Alexandria, Isidore of Pelusium, and Athanasius, but they do not throw any light on the point before us. It is worthy however of remark that Isidore states distinctly that the sacerdos or bishop uttered the words "Peace be with you," from the extremity or highest point of the church, "imitating the Lord assuming His chair when He gave His peace to His disciples."

(27.) Liturgy of Caesarea.—There can be no doubt that St. Basil, who was bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia during the years 370-379, committed to writing, and delivered to the order of monks which he established, a liturgy. And when we look at the well-known words which have been often quoted from his treatise on the Holy Spirit [CANON, I. 269], we can scarcely doubt that this liturgy preserved (at least in its chief features) that form and order which had been traditionally used within the diocese or (possibly) the patriarchate of Caesarea. Our difficulty is to recover the service as it came from the hands of Basil. We have the form which passes by his name and now in the East shares with the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom the reverence of the churches. It is used, we are told, on all Sundays in Lent but Palm Sunday, on Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve, on the festival of St. Basil himself, and on the vigils of Christmas and of the Epiphany. Dr. Neale and Dr. Littledale (Greek Liturgies) have printed this from two recent editions, published the one at Venice, the other at Constantinople; whilst Daniel has given it in a form presenting considerable variations from both.

The Alexandrine liturgy assigned to Basil we have already noticed. With the exceptions mentioned below (§ 29), it differs entirely from the Greek St. Basil. Besides this there is a Syriac liturgy which goes by the name of Basil, a Latin translation of which Renaudot gives from Masius in his second volume. But most important for our purposes is the Greek copy, found in a manuscript of the end of the 9th century which belonged once to the library of St. Mark at Florence (introduced probably at the time of the council), but is now in the Barberini collection at Rome. This was printed for the first time in Bunsen's Hippolytus and his Age (vol. iv.), and again in his Analecta Antea-Nicaena (vol. iii. pp. 201-236), and it is strange that it has not attracted the attention it deserves.

(28.) This liturgy commences with the prayer which the priest offered in the sacristy, when he placed the bread upon the disc: this is followed by the prayers of the three antiphons. These are all found in the liturgy as published by Daniel, but we must exclude here, as throughout, almost all the rubrical directions relating to the action and language of the deacon. The prayer of Introit is given next, then the prayer of the Trisagion, and the prayer said by the bishop when he took his throne. This is now omitted, in consequence, no doubt, of the change of ritual. Prayers for the catechumens, for the faithful, for the bishop himself (the last connected with the cherubic hymn) follow, and then the prayer of oblation, which is distinctly stated to be a prayer of the holy Basil. The kiss of peace here follows, and the order to the deacons to look "to the doors;" and the people say the creed. Then come the apostolic benediction and the 'Sursum Corda.' The "dignum et justum est" is entirely eucharistic, and this is succeeded by an eucharistic introduction to the words of institution. But here, unhappily, a sheet (four leaves) of the manuscript is missing, and we are unable to say what was the exact form of the prayer of invocation, or of that of intercession until we come to the petition for the clergy, in the middle of which the next sheet commences. The words with which the Lord's Prayer is introduced are interesting. It is followed by a petition that Christ our God would attend to us from His holy habitation, and come to sanctify us, seated above with the Father, and invisibly present with us. Then the "sancta sanctis," and the "unus sanctus:" and the priest is directed to take portions from the holy Body, and place them in the holy cup. Then "after all have partaken," whilst the deacon is saying τὴν εὐχὴν, the priest ἐπεύχεται. This is a prayer of thanksgiving for the reception. Collects follow: one to be uttered outside the sanctuary, the other when the priest retires to the sacristy, and so the liturgy concludes. If we may supply from the more modern liturgy the parts lost in the missing sheet, availing ourselves of the analogy which the collations of the rest of the work suggest, we must conclude that the words of institution were embodied in an address to God the Father, and pleaded that "remembering the sufferings of His Son, His cross, His death, His resurrection, ascension, and second coming, and offering to God His own of His own—in all things, and because of all things—we bless Him, we glorify Him, we give thanks to Him." In the prayer of invocation the priest pleads that being admitted to minister at God's holy altar, not because of his own righteousness but because of God's mercy and pity, he draws nigh to it: and that having offered the antitypes of the holy Body and Blood of His Christ, he beseeches God that His Spirit should come on the congregation and the gifts and (ἀναθεῖται) exhibit the bread and cup as the precious Body and Blood of our Lord. There is a prayer that all who partake of the one bread and the cup may find mercy with all the saints (the Virgin and St. John the Baptist are especially mentioned), and then after a while the prayer passes on to petitions for the living.

(29.) Reverting now for a moment to the Alexandrine liturgy of St. Basil, we must notice that the three prayers, which in the Greek and Arabic are distinctly ascribed to the great bishop, i.e. the prayer of the Kiss of Peace (Renaudot, i. 60), the prayer at the breaking of the bread (p. 72), and the doxology (now in the Lord's Prayer) and prayer of bending the head (p. 76) are all of them found in the Barberini copy, and are all of them contained in the modern liturgy. Not one of them however is in the Coptic St. Basil; these facts may possibly allow us to infer that the Alexandrine Greek received its title from the prayers of St. Basil which it incorporated, but that the Coptic version was made before they were admitted. If so, we have some little light thrown upon the relative dates of the various documents, and it would appear that the Coptic is older than the Greek Alexandrine in its present form. We have already mentioned that in no other respect can we trace any similarity between the Alexandrine Basil and those which bear the great Bishop's name in the Barberini manuscript and in the modern Oriental Church.

(30.) Daniel has noted the portions which are common to the modern Basil, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. A comparison with the Barberini manuscript will help us to judge how far these portions are modern. For example, in both we have the apostrophe, "Let all human flesh be silent and stand with trembling, for the King of kings and Lord of rulers comes forward to be sacrificed, and to be given for the food of the faithful." In the liturgy of St. James this is found near the commencement of the service, when the priest is bringing in the holy gifts: in that of St. Basil, it is placed after the invocation, before the communion of the priest. It seems scarcely appropriate in either place. The fact is that it is not to be found either in the Syriac St. James, or in any of the liturgies that bear the name of St. Basil.

Daniel is silent on the comparison between the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. Basil (see Renaudot, vol. ii. 543). On comparing the latter with the Barberini copy (supplemented where it fails from the modern service), it will be found that from the apostolic benediction to the words speaking of the memorial of Christ's death and resurrection, the language is nearly identical (Renaudot, ii. 545-548; Bunsen, 214-223). This identity stops suddenly where the latter has, "We offer to Thee Thine own, of Thine own," the former passing on to an appeal for mercy and pardon. The invocation is nearly identical, but the Syriac immediately afterwards gives indications of being interpolated; it has a superabundance of epithetic additions. This is followed by prolonged intercessory prayers, one of which connects the liturgy with the church of St. Peter and St. James; but the collect introducing "Our Father" is, as we have said, the same. The prayer beginning "Father of mercies, God of all comfort," has received modifications. The distinguishing feature of the Syriac liturgy is, that the verbal oblation of the venerated and bloodless sacrifice is made after the invocation.

(31.) Liturgy of Constantinople.—The patriarchate of Constantinople dates from the year 381, and the churches subject to this metropolis have used for many years a liturgy which bears the name of St. Chrysostom. Lebrun contends that there was no liturgy ascribed to this great father for 300 years after his death; and it seems not improbable that the work which now bears his name received that name as being used in the city of which he was the most famous bishop in its earlier years. The modern liturgy of St. Chrysostom is used most extensively in the east; Dr. Neale says, through the four patriarchates and Russia, except on the days when the liturgy of St. Basil is used. To us this is a disadvantage, because, if this were the only evidence we possessed, it would be the more difficult to discover what parts of it are truly ancient. Dr. Neale gives the service as he found it in a work printed at Venice in 1840, corrected by a later edition from Constantinople; Daniel (vol. iv. 327-372) "ad normam ecclesiae Graecorum hodie acceptam et probatam." Dr. Neale's book was originally published in the year 1850, two years before Baron Bunsen printed in the fourth volume of his work Hippolytus and his Age, a transcript of this liturgy from the Barberini manuscript. It seems to be inexcusable, however, that Daniel, whose fourth volume came out in 1853, should have been content with the meagre collations with this MS. given by Goar in his Euchologion, and have neglected the transcript of Bunsen.

(32.) With the aid of this manuscript we may put upon one side as of uncertain date the thirteen paragraphs which occupy pages 337 to 339 in Daniel's book, and besides this, we must reject the eight succeeding pages, with the exception of one brief prayer. Almost all the rubrical directions (as in St. Basil) disappear; they belong to a period since the time of Charlemagne. Once more, the prayers which the deacon is requested to repeat outside, whilst the priest within the veil is praying μυστικῶς, must be rejected also as of later introduction; and the division of the consecrated bread into the four parts, each part containing two letters of ΙΧΘΥΝΙΚΑ [see ELEMENTS, I. 603; FRACTION, I. 687], is also proved to be later.

The rubric directing the elevation of the bread (Daniel, p. 365; Neale's G. L. p. 140) is also shewn to be modern; so too the introduction of the boiling water. And one thing more attracts attention. As in the rite of St. Basil so here, it was assumed that all would partake. This is altered now. Lastly, in the modern Greek ritual there is an appeal at the very close to St. John Chrysostom that, "having used his liturgy, we may have his intercession that our souls may be saved;" this is also proved now to be of later date than the year 900. Indeed, the liturgy itself is sine titulo (Bunsen, iii. 197). The very ascription of the Liturgy, therefore, to St. Chrysostom may be of a date subsequent to the time when this MS. was transcribed.

(33.) It only remains for us to note that in this the early edition of St. Chrysostom, the Kiss of Peace precedes the Creed, and the Creed precedes the Apostolic Benediction. The "dignum et iustum est" is truly eucharistic, and the "Sanctus, sanctus" is speedily followed by the words of institution. The text with reference to the bread resembles that accepted now in the Epistle to the Corinthians, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμά μου τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν. The liturgy proceeds: "Remembering His saving command and all things done by Him, and offering Thine own of Thine own, we praise Thee." The priest proceeds: "We offer to Thee, moreover, this reasonable and bloodless service, and we beseech Thee, send down Thy Holy Spirit on us and on these gifts that lie here before Thee, and make this bread the Body of Thy Christ . . ." The offering is represented as made on behalf of all who have gone to rest in the faith, "Fathers, patriarchs, prophets, especially the Holy Virgin." Then intercessions follow on behalf of the living;—amongst them, "for those in mountains, caves, and holes in the earth." (This is now omitted.) "For faithful Kings, and our Queen, lover of Christ." (This possibly points to a precise date when the original of this manuscript was prepared.) Then there is a prayer of commendation to God of ourselves, our lives, and our hopes, followed by the Lord's Prayer. Christ is entreated to come to sanctify us. At last we have the "Sancta sanctis," the "Unus sanctus," and the thanksgiving after the Communion.

(34.) Liturgy of the Nestorians or Chaldean Christians.—Notwithstanding the fearful massacres to which even during the last forty years they have been subjected, there still remain among the cities of Mesopotamia Christians who trace their origin to the influx of Nestorians after the council of Ephesus. They possess three liturgies, or rather three anaphorae, ascribed respectively to the Apostles (i. e. SS. Adaeus or Thaddeus and Mari), to Theodore of Mopsuestia, and to Nestorius himself. These are used at specified times of the year, but the pro-anaphoral and post-Communion portions of the liturgy of the "Apostles" are never omitted. Latin translations of the three from Syriac manuscripts brought into Europe by emissaries of the Roman church are given by Renaudot in his collection (vol. ii.).

An English translation of the services now in use has been recently published by Dr. Badger. Any effort to point out what portions of these are really ancient, apart from the instruction we have received from our previous investigations, must rest on hypothesis only; but the distinguishing features of the liturgy of the Apostles are (1) that in it our Lord's words of institution are not introduced at all, and (2) that the prayers of intercession both for the living and the dead are connected with the oblation which is made before the epiclesis. In the liturgies of Theodore and of Nestorius, the words of institution are found. It would certainly seem from this that, so far, the 'Liturgy of the Apostles' must be very ancient, as it is inconceivable that the words of our Lord, if at any time brought into the service, could at any subsequent period have been omitted (see § 59 below).

There are some points of difference between the liturgy as given by Renaudot and that given by Dr. Badger, indicating probably that even during the last few hundred years additions have been made to that which had been in use; but as these additions must fall into a period far below the 9th century, it is unnecessary to discuss them further here. We should mention, however, that the canon begins with the apostolic benediction, and we have, as everywhere else, the "sursum corda." The words are introduced simply in the liturgy of the Apostles; but in the liturgies of Theodore and Nestorius, as given by Dr. Badger, they are embodied in a highly rhetorical appeal. Some passages of a Nestorian tendency are discoverable in the last-named liturgy. The other two have no such traces.

(35.) Liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions.—It remains now only that we should briefly discuss the liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions, commonly called, "The Liturgy of St.

Clement." [APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS, I. pp. 119-126.] We have already given (§§ 15, 17) a brief account of the Eucharistic services as we find them in the Coptic edition of these constitutions. Ludolf, in his Commentarius ad Historiam Aethiopicam (pp. 324-327), gives a Latin translation of the corresponding passage in the Ethiopic version of the constitutions. This has been reproduced by Baron Bunsen in his Analecta Ante-Nicaena (vol. iii. pp. 106-126). It commences with "The Lord be with you, and with thy spirit. Up with your hearts," etc.; then an Eucharistic address to God for the gift and work of His Son, passing at once to the words of institution, which are given in the simplest form. The prayer proceeds, "calling to mind, therefore, His death and His resurrection," etc., "we offer to Thee this bread and cup, rendering Thee thanks that Thou hast made us worthy to stand before Thee, and to perform the functions of Thy priesthood." The Holy Spirit is invoked upon the oblations, but there is no prayer that He will make them the Body and Blood of Christ. The prayer is, "that those who partake of the gifts may be fulfilled with that Spirit." We have the "Sancta sanctis," and the "Unus Pater sanctus," etc., and the "Hymn of Praise;" the latter, possibly, consisting of the 148th Psalm. The people enter to receive the "medicine of their souls," and the thanksgiving follows with a collect. The service concludes, "Depart in peace, and so the Eucharist is accomplished." It will be noticed that the Lord's prayer is not introduced.

(36.) Neither is the Lord's Prayer introduced in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement. This liturgy is found in some MSS. of the eighth book of the Greek Apostolical Constitutions, but in the valuable Oxford manuscript (Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae) it is entirely omitted. There are other marks that it is an interpolation of late date. In the manuscripts where it occurs, it follows on the service for the consecration of a bishop, as it does in the Coptic and Ethiopic constitutions. The Greek liturgy begins with the apostolic benediction, and the unbelievers, the hearers, the catechumens, etc., are then dismissed in order. Then comes a long intercessory prayer, the "kiss of peace" is given, and the apostolic benediction is repeated in a slightly different form; we have the "sursum corda" and the "dignum et iustum." This is Eucharistic, detailing the blessings of the creation and the history of God's dispensations to mankind. When we reach the victories of Joshua, the ascription of glory by the Cherubim and Seraphim, "Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus," is introduced, and the Thanksgiving passes on to record the mercies of the incarnation, death, burial, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord; then the bishop introduces the words of institution, and recites how, "Remembering His sufferings, His resurrection, His ascension, and second coming, we offer to Thee, our King and God, according to His appointment, this bread and this cup, giving thanks to Thee by Him;" then follow the epiclesis and the great intercessory prayer, the various clauses of which are introduced by the words, "We pray Thee," or "we entreat Thee," or "we offer to Thee," or "we beg Thee." After this come the "Sancta sanctis" and the "Glory to God in the highest." All the people receive in order; first, presbyters, then deacons, sub-deacons, etc. The psalm, "I will always give thanks to thee," (which includes the words, "O taste and see,") is sung during the Communion. The post-Communion service begins with a prayer of thanksgiving, the benediction from the bishop follows, the deacon says, "Depart in peace."

(37.) Considerable doubts are felt as to whether the liturgy was ever celebrated after this fashion. At all events we have here the advantage of examining a rite, as it was proposed at some time not later than the 4th century. It can scarcely have been altered or interpolated since that time. It is worthy of mention that the liturgical expressions, which have been noted in the recently recovered pages of the genuine Epistle of Clemens Romanus, are not found here as they are found in the Alexandrine service books; this would be an additional proof, if proof were wanting, that the ascription of the liturgy to St. Clement is purely fictitious.

(38.) Liturgy of the Churches of Carthage, etc.—In passing from Alexandria along the coast of Africa to Carthage we pass from an order of things of which the characteristics were Greek to another whose characteristics were Latin. The early writers of the Carthaginian churches are so important and so voluminous that from their works which have come down to us we can supply many details of the Carthaginian services—our sources of information being perhaps more trustworthy than any "liturgy" would be which professed to have been prepared by St. Augustine. Thus we know from Tertullian (Apology, xxxix.) that in the gatherings of the faithful, "the most approved seniors presided." The same chapter in the Apology mentions that at their gatherings the Christians in one body sued God by their prayers. They prayed for the emperors and for their ministers, for the state of the world, for the quiet of all things, "for the delay of the end." The sacred writings were called to remembrance, selections being made apparently with a view to the emergencies of the times,—and an exhortation followed. Then we infer that all were directed to leave the church who were under censure. A collection of money was made on one day of the month, the money collected being used for the relief of the poor, and for the succour of those who were suffering for conscience sake. No doubt Tertullian is describing features of the ordinary Sunday Eucharist. The section passes on to speak of the Agapae. Elsewhere we learn that the passages from Scripture were taken from the Prophets, from the Epistles or Acts of the Apostles, and from the Gospel (Apology, xxii.), and that psalms or (Ad Uxor. ii. 9) hymns intervened between these sections. Tertullian frequently insists that these rites had been "handed down to us." In praying they turned to the east (Apology, xvi.), lifting up their hands to God the Father (Idolat. vii. 7). We have two ascriptions of glory, one (Ad Uxor. i. 1) "To whom be honour, glory, majesty, dignity, and power, for ever and ever." The other (De Oratione, iii.), "To whom be honour and power for all ages."

With regard to the second part of the eucharistic office, to which he apparently gives the title 'Officium sacrificii' we have additional evidence. The prayers for the emperor seem to have been repeated here; the words Sursum suscipientes (Apology, xxx.) probably refer to the Sursum corda, which we know was used at Carthage in the time of Cyprian. The Lord's Prayer formed part of the prayers; after it the faithful drew near and gave to each other the kiss of charity (de Oratione, xiv.). The communion followed. This part of the service was undoubtedly kept as a mystery from unbelievers. At some time during the service apparently, special mention was made of individuals by whom or on whose behalf the oblations were offered. With reference to the living, this seems to have been done on the day, monthly or otherwise, when they made their gifts; on behalf of the dead, on the anniversary of their removal.

(39.) Cyprian, who died in 258, gives us information which indicates the progress of ritual even in the few years which had elapsed since the writing of these works of Tertullian's. The offerer is the bishop (sacerdos) or the presbyter, "they offer the sacrifices to God" (Epistles iv. and lxviii.). The sacrifice was celebrated daily (Ep. liv.). The lessons were read from a pulpitum. The Sursum corda and Habemus ad Dominum are spoken of explicitly in the treatise on the Lord's Prayer. The mixed cup was used, signifying, as Cyprian stated, "the union of Christ with His people." The sacrament was given into the hands of the people; and frequently, if not generally, they took a portion of it home, reserving it in a small box, and partaking of it from day to day. The bread and wine used for the sacrament were taken out of that which had been offered, and Cyprian complains of the rich as at times consuming a part of the sacrifice which the poor had offered.—Towards the end of the 4th century (A.D. 398) the well-known laws were enacted, forming part of the canons of the African church, by which the offerings at the sacrament were restricted to bread and wine mixed with water, and the sacrament was always to be received fasting, except on Maundy Thursday, and at the altar prayer was always to be addressed to the Father. These are frequently spoken of as if they were canons of the universal church. As a body they seem, however, in the first instance, to have been observed only in the country where they were enacted, and we have had numerous instances already which shew that the last canon was never accepted in the churches of the East.

(40.) We come now to St. Augustine, from whose voluminous writings we may learn much on the subject before us. Mone (Lateinische und Griechische Messen) has collected from Augustine's sermons the chief passages there found bearing upon the liturgy, and to him I am indebted for much contained in this and the preceding paragraphs. The exclusion of all save the initiated and those in full communion with the church from being present at the Eucharist, was still most rigidly maintained in the province of Carthage. The three lessons from the Prophet, Epistle and Gospel were now taken apparently according to a fixed rule; between the Epistle and the Gospel a psalm was sung (Sermon clxv. 1): and this was the daily use of the church. The second part of the service (Sermon 311) commenced with the Sursum corda, in which the answer of the people was Habemus ad Dominum; the priest responded, "Let us give thanks to our Lord God" (68, 5). The people attested, "It is meet and right so to do" (227). In the canon the martyrs were mentioned, but prayer no longer was made on their behalf. The prayer of consecration is called the Sanctificatio, and Augustine reserves to the priests, as distinct from the laity, the function of offering the sacrifice. After the consecration followed the Lord's Prayer, apparently said by the clergy alone. The Pax vobiscum followed, and the kiss of peace (Sermon 227). Then the communion, then the dismissal. Apparently there was at some period a confession of sins, beginning with the word confiteor (Sermon 67), at which, as well as at the petition Forgive us our debts, the people smote their breasts. Augustine's sermons give us of course ample illustrations of the addresses which were made to the people on these occasions, no doubt at the early part of the service, as in the time of Tertullian; and the great bishop tells us (Sermon 49), that post sermonem fit missa catechumenis: manebunt fideles.

It will be noticed that we have had no intimation here of the apostolic benediction, with which the Greek liturgies generally commence, nor a word informing us of the character of the prayer of consecration. There is no intimation of any epiclesis or invocation; no hint given as to the sanctus. Of course we must remember that the Communion office proper was essentially a mystery, and we have no right to expect à priori that the sermons would give us as much information regarding it as in fact they do. We might surmise that Augustine's private letters would prove a more fertile field of information than his sermons.^b To these, therefore, let us now turn.

(41.) I would mention, therefore, first, that we read in Letter cxxiv., addressed to Apringius, the pro-consul, that Augustine "invoked Christ on his behalf in the holy mysteries." Thus we have an instance here of a prayer addressed to Christ. A reference to the feasts held in the churches, and deemed by the ignorant people to be "solatia mortuorum," will be found in No. xxii. Infants communicated, indeed their communion was deemed to be necessary for their salvation (Epist. clxxiii. § 5, and clxxvi. § 29). The offering was considered to be of the Body and Blood of the Lord; and Augustine mentions that, on one certain day of the year (of course Maundy Thursday), it was received in the evening. His sermons have not spoken of any benediction, but Letter clxxix. (§ 4) shews that there was one, and tells us what the form of the benediction was. The bread used at the Communion appears to have been brought to the church in the form of one loaf. At all events, Augustine says (Epist. clxxv. § 50, p. 994 of Gaume) that the one bread is the sacrament of unity. Letter ccvii. (Gaume, p. 1212) speaks of the priest at the altar exhorting the people to pray for unbelievers, that God would convert them to the faith; for the catechumens, that He would inspire in them a desire for regeneration; and for the faithful, that by ^b The sermons ad infantes de Sacramento (227 and 272) contain, however, much information to our purpose.

His gift they may persevere in that which they have begun—a prayer analogous to what we have seen in the liturgy of St. Clement. The Domine Deus Sabaoth, and the Holy, Holy, Holy, are introduced in his interesting letter to Januarius (lv.), in which mention is also made of the Alleluia, and of the custom of praying standing between Easter and Pentecost.

In the Oriental liturgies mention was made of the church dispersed throughout the world; the words are found in Letter lxxxvii. The custom of adoring is referred to in more than one place. But the classical passage is in his famous letter to Paulinus (No. cxlix.), in which he tries to explain the meaning of the different words in 1 Tim. ii. 1, prayers, orations, supplications, etc. If we take the words as they are found consecutively in our version, he would say that the supplications embrace all that is done in the celebration of the sacrament before that which is on the table of the Lord begins to be blessed,—the prayers, when it is being blessed and sanctified and broken for distribution, the part “which ends in almost every church with the Lord’s Prayer,”—the intercessions, when the people is being blessed by the imposition of hands and commended to God’s great mercy,—the giving of thanks, concluding all.

(42.) We thus have the following clearly laid down as contained in the African Liturgy in the time of St. Augustine. The preliminary part included lessons from Scripture, hymns, sermons, and the prayers for the unbelievers, catechumens, and believers which we have described above.

Then, all being excluded except the initiated, the oblations of the people appear to have been made, and the opening words, “Sursum corda,” with the “Vere dignum et justum est,” with this we connect of course the “Sanctus.” Then came what Augustine would call the “sanctification of the sacrifice,” concluding with the fraction, and probably a prayer of fraction, such as we found in the Alexandrian liturgies; the Lord’s Prayer ensued. Then came the kiss of peace, this being followed by the benediction of the people, “whom the priest offers up to God;” then the participation of the sacrament and the giving of thanks,—the last part of the service before the dismissal. The three petitions mentioned by Augustine (Letter cxlix.) are also mentioned by Fulgentius of Ruspe in his letter to Bitellus (No. cvii.); two of them are alluded to in a treatise of the same bishop, De bono perseverantiae. It is probable that no great change was introduced into the liturgy for many years after the death of the great bishop Augustine.

(43.) Spanish Liturgies, of the time of Isidore.—The liturgy of the Spanish Church in its earlier years has a singular interest in several respects. It is quite clear that it was framed in the first instance independently of the Roman Church, although in the time of Innocent the First great efforts were made to render it similar to that of the church of the prince of the Apostles. But time was required for these efforts to succeed. Thus Guéranger (vol. i. p. 133) refers to a council of Gironne, held in the year 517 (Labbe, vol. i. p. 568), the first canon of which directed that throughout the province of Tarragona the use of the metropolitan church was to be observed. The council of Braga, in the year

565, passed an enactment of the same character for the province of which it was the metropolis, which would be nearly continuous with Gallia. The same lessons were to be read at mass through all the churches; all the bishops or presbyters and the people were to retain the salutation, “The Lord be with you,” “And with thy spirit,” “in the manner that all the East observed it from apostolic tradition,” but at the same time directions were given that the masses were to be celebrated in the order which their late bishop, Profuturus, had received in writing from the authority of the apostolic see. In 633 a uniformity was established, not in each province severally, but throughout the whole extent of the peninsula or, as it is called, through all Spain and Gaul (that is Gallia Narbonensis); and amongst other things it is mentioned about the same time that the Kyrie Eleison was repeated, and the “Sicut erat in principio” was added to the “Gloria Patri,” to meet the heresy of the Priscillianists. “as it had been done not only at the apostolic see, but also throughout all the East, Africa, and Italy.”

(44.) Isidore, the famous archbishop of Seville, who presided in one or more councils at Toledo, has left us two books on the ecclesiastical offices, which are supposed to have been written about the year 633. (He succeeded Leander as bishop in the year 595, and died in the year 636.) In the thirteenth and three following chapters of the first book, he gives us information as to the liturgy of his day. He mentions that, “In Africa the Alleluia was sung only on Sundays, and on the fifty days after Easter; but with us, according to the ancient tradition of the Spains, it is sung at all times, except the days of Lent and other fast days.” It would appear also, that what was called the offertorium was sung. With reference to the order of the mass, or “the prayers with which the sacrifices offered to God are consecrated,” he claims that St. Peter was the author of the service which was celebrated throughout the whole world. He speaks of there being seven prayers or orations, the first being one of exhortation to the people, inciting them to earnest prayer to God; the second is a prayer to God, that He will mercifully receive the prayers and oblations of the faithful; the third is poured forth either for those who offer, or for the faithful who have departed this life, that by the same sacrifice they may obtain pardon; fourthly, comes, connected with the kiss of peace, a prayer that all, being mutually reconciled to each other, may partake worthily of the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, because the indivisible Body of Christ admits not of dissension. Then follows, fifthly, the illatio, which answers to the PREFACE in the Roman Missal. It is described by Isidore as connected with the sanctification of the oblation in which “the whole universe of terrestrial creatures and heavenly powers are urged to join in the praise of God,” and the “Hosanna in the Highest” is sung. Then succeeds, sixthly, that which in some manuscripts is described as the “confirmatio” of the sacrament, in others, the “conformatio,” that “the oblation which is now offered to God, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, may be conformed to the Body and Blood of Christ.” Seventhly, the Lord’s Prayer follows, in which he notices likewise seven petitions—the first three for things eternal, the last four for things temporal. In chapter xvi. Isidore speaks of the Nicene Creed as proclaimed to the people at the time of the sacrifice, and in the next, of the priestly benedictions. In chapter xviii. he teaches on the nature of the sacrifice. [Compare ELEMENTS, I. 602.]

(45.) Isidore does not mention the part of the service at which the Nicene Creed, as he calls it, was recited; but we know that at the third council of Toledo, in 589, king Reccared had ordered that the creed of the hundred and fifty should be recited "in the liturgy before the Lord's Prayer throughout all the churches of Spain and Gaul, according to the form of the Oriental churches." [CREED, I. 491.] This position of the creed is not that which was adopted by the Roman church, but it is that which the creed of the hundred and fifty occupies in the liturgy which we must proceed now to discuss, namely—

(46.) The Spanish or Mozarabic Liturgy.—The Mozarabic Liturgy was first printed under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes, in the year 1500. The manuscript which he used must have been of a comparatively late date; for as Lorenzani, subsequently archbishop and cardinal, noticed in the preface to his edition (which was dedicated to Benedict XIV. and has been reprinted in Migne's series, vol. lxxv.) the book makes mention of St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Anthony of Padua, all belonging to the 13th century, to which I would add, that in the first part, amongst the greater festivals, there is a mass for the feast of Corpus Christi, which we know was not introduced until the same century. It would be extremely difficult, therefore, to say what parts of the services are ancient, and what portions fall below the chronological limit by which we are bound; and it must be understood that much that follows is stated under reservation.

(47.) On comparing, however, the account given by St. Isidore, with the masses which we find in the Mozarabic Liturgy (as given by Lorenzani, Migne, p. 109; compare Daniel, i. p. 65, etc.), we have every point mentioned by Isidore reproduced in the liturgy. The exhortation to the people is found almost everywhere, under the heading Missa. We have the Alleluia at the beginning, apparently, of every mass, except those to be used in Lent (Daniel, pp. 55–57). We have the prayer that God would receive the oblation (ibid. p. 67). We have the prayer for the offerers (ibid. p. 69). The prayer for the Holy Spirit must have been displaced, for in the modern form it follows here. We have the "Dominus vobiscum" and "Et cum Spiritu tuo" (p. 71). That connected with the kiss of peace, which is the fourth prayer mentioned by Isidore, follows on p. 77. Then the "Illatio" follows, p. 79. It is, as Daniel describes it, a somewhat long ascription of glory, beginning with the "Dignum et justum est," varying almost every Sunday of the year, but always ending with the "Sanctus, sanctus" and the "Hosanna in the Highest." The "Confirmatio," or "Conformatio," consists of the narrative of the institution. The choir recite the creed whilst the priest elevates the consecrated elements; the Lord's Prayer follows, and the benediction before the communion. Thus, with the one exception of the invocation of the Holy Spirit, the position of each prayer mentioned by Isidore is found here to be the same as that to which he assigned it.

(48.) There are some points which have not yet been mentioned which establish still more closely the connexion of this liturgy with those of the Oriental churches. We have three Lessons at least—four in Lent. The first, or first two, from the Old Testament; the next from the Acts of the Apostles or the Epistles; the last from the Gospel. The offering was distinctly made before the consecration, the choir retained the use of the Greek words, "Agyos, Agyos, Agyos." The Apostolic Benediction is found as in the Greek liturgies. After the Kiss of Peace we have the "Sursum corda" and the "Habemus ad Dominum." In the other Latin liturgies the words of institution are always introduced thus: "Qui pridie quam pateretur." In the Greek liturgies it always was, "Who, in the night in which He was betrayed." The Mozarabic follows the Oriental form, and this serves as an indication that, at all events, in some points the Spanish has never been altered, for the prayer which follows is (I believe) throughout the volume entitled Post pridie: oratio, i. e. the modern rubric assumes that the prayer of consecration had run in the Roman form. [CANON, I. 272.] Once more, we have the Sancta sanctis here, and the choir sings, Gustate et videte quoniam suavis est Dominus. I think I might add that we have the words, "Give redemption to the captives, health to the infirm," as we had them in the liturgy of St. Mark, and "Rest to the departed," as we found the addition made in another of the Oriental liturgies.

(49.) But most curious of all is the rite which is peculiar to the Mozarabic Liturgy, of dividing the bread. [FRACTION, I. 688.]

(50.) One point more remains to be noticed: That the prayer "Post nomina" is very frequently addressed to Christ, and in many of the petitions so addressed our Lord is entreated to "accept the offering now made to Him;" the same may be noted in the petitions Post pridie, in which our Lord is entreated to sanctify the sacrifices. (See for examples, Migne, pp. 129, 138, 175, 195, 202, 204, etc.) Thus it is apparent that the canon of the church of Carthage, to which attention has been drawn, was not observed in Spain at the time when these services were framed.

(51.) Gallican Liturgies.—We know from the correspondence which passed between Gregory the Great and the missionary Augustine that the customs of the churches in Gaul and at Rome were different, even in the Mass or Eucharist. (Greg. Ep. xi. 64; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 19.) The difference continued during the seventh and the greater part of the eighth centuries; but the introduction of the Roman chant into Gaul in the time of Pepin was followed up by a command of Charlemagne that every presbyter should celebrate the Mass according to the Roman order (Capitul. v. cap. 219–371), and for this purpose Charles obtained a copy of what professed to be the Gregorian Sacramentary from his friend Pope Hadrian. This order was not carried out without some heartburnings, for we find in the next century the abbat Hilduin remarking to Loui's the Pious that the older rites had been observed in Gaul from the very earliest times, and, as a proof, he referred to "the missal books, which were most ancient and were almost eaten up by age." (Hilduin, Vita Dionys. Areop., in Surius, Oct. 9; Palmer, i. 145.)

(52.) We must, of course, conclude that these "missal books" were not reproduced in the schools founded by Charlemagne and watched over by Alcuin and others. Indeed, they became so rare before the accession of Charles the Bald, that that monarch mentioned in his famous letter to the clergy of Ravenna (quoted by Mabillon, Lit. Gall. p. 20) that he was indebted to the clergy of the church of Toledo for his knowledge, that "up to the time of his grandfather, the Gallican churches had celebrated the divine offices in a manner different from those adopted in the churches of Rome and Milan." We cannot be surprised, therefore, at finding that the liturgical remains of the early Gallican church are very scanty, and we shall welcome with the greater thankfulness the discoveries of Thomasius, Martene, Mabillon, and Mone.

(53.) If we remember the early connexion of the churches of Lyons and Vienne with the East, we shall of course expect that the ritual of these churches must exhibit some points of resemblance with the ritual of the church of Ephesus. From the undoubted writings of Irenaeus (I abstain from using the so-called Pfafrican fragment), we learn but little of the eucharistic office of his day, but we do learn that it contained the words εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, that the service included an offering or sacrifice to God through Christ Jesus of the first fruits of His creatures, that there was an invocation (ἐκκλησις or ἐπίκλησις) on the bread and the temperamentum offered (i. 3. 1; iv. 17. 5; 18. 4, 5). These points remind us of the Oriental rites. Later allusions to the Gallican service, found in the writings of Gregory of Tours and others, have been collected by Mabillon in his learned work, de Liturgia Gallicana, published in 1685; and additional light is thrown upon the subject by the discovery in the library of St. Martin's, at Autun, of two letters, ascribed in the MS. to Germanus, the famous bishop of Paris, who died in the year 576. The discovery was made by Martene, who published the document verbatim et literatim in his Thesaur. Anecd. tom. v. They are reproduced in Migne's series (vol. lxiii. pp. 83-98), and Migne has given as an appendix to them Mabillon's work de Liturgia Gallicana (pp. 101-447), and also the same writer's further work, entitled Sacramentarium Gallicanum (pp. 448-576).

(54.) We have altogether in these reprints:—

a. The letters of St. Germanus, of which I have spoken. They seem to be somewhat fragmentary, and I am disposed to regard the former as giving an account specifically of the service on Easter Eve and Easter Day. (Migne, ut sup. pp. 89-98.)

b. A Lectionary of the Gallican church, which Mabillon found at Luxeuil, and which he assigned to the end of the seventh century. (Migne, pp. 171-216.)

c. A Missal, entitled in the manuscript, though in a later hand, Missale Gothicum. This is considered by the learned as representing the ritual of the south of France about the beginning of the eighth century. (It contains a service for the martyrdom of St. Leodgar, who was killed in 678.) The volume is very interesting, exhibiting indisputable marks that the services it contains were framed not merely at different times, but on different principles. Several holy days are noted by Mabillon as having been introduced at a period subsequent to the Lectionary, which he described as above. (Migne, pp. 225-318.)

d. Then follows a missal entitled Missale Francorum, in consequence of petitions that it contains for the king and kingdom and rulers of the Franks. This missal concludes (at least in its present form) with a fragment of the Roman canon as it exists in the Gregorian Sacramentary; the earlier part is occupied with very interesting ordination offices. Morinus considered the MS. to be of the sixth century, but Mabillon puts it later. It evidently belongs to an epoch at which the Roman services were ousting those of the Gallican church. (Migne, pp. 318-340.)

The MSS. (c) and (d) are now in the Vatican. The former is numbered Vat. Reg. 626, or Alex. Vat. 317 (the accounts differ); the number of the other is apparently Alex. Vat. 257. They must have come from the Library of Fleury, which was dispersed by the Huguenots.

e. The Missale Gallicanum which follows in Mabillon (Migne, pp. 340-382) is also at the Vatican (Vat. Pal. 493); it came from the library at Heidelberg. It contains interesting expositions of the Creed and Lord's Prayer, and, almost unutilized, the services for Easter Day. It is believed to represent the use of Mid-France in the eighth century.

f. To these must be added the Sacramentarium Gallicanum, above referred to. It was found by Mabillon at Bobio, and was regarded by him, as by others, as indicating the services of the neighbourhood of Besançon. It commences with the Gregorian Canon under the title Missa Romanensis cotidiana (Migne, pp. 451-580).

g. And M. Mone, the librarian at Carlsruhe, discovered in the library under his care palimpsests from which he was enabled to decipher several old masses. The volumes came from the famous Benedictine convent of Reichenau, the island near Constance. Baron Bunsen has thrown additional light upon them in the third volume of the Analecta Ante-Nicæna.

(55.) A comparison of these manuscripts shews that if the suppositions regarding their origin are correct, there must have been a great variety in the details of the Eucharistic services in the various dioceses or provinces of France. Taking, however, the liturgy of St. Germanus as our guide, we learn that in his time, on the day or days of which he describes the services, when the priest came from the sacristy the clerk sang a kind of introit, and then the deacon proclaimed silence. The salutation followed, Dominus sit semper vobiscum, with the usual response. Lectures were read from a Prophet, an Apostle, and a Gospel. The "Aius," or "Αἴγιος, in Greek and then in Latin, preceded the "prophet," and the Song of Zacharias followed it. The Benedictio followed the Apostle, the "Aius" being again sung before the Gospel. The book was carried to the pulpit, preceded by seven candles, signifying the seven gifts of the Spirit. [Compare GOSPEL, I. 743.] A homily followed upon the Gospel, and a prayer by the deacon. Then, Germanus says, intimation was given that the catechumens must leave the church; but his words seem to shew that though the form was kept up, the occasion had ceased. The oblations were now brought in (they are designated as being the Body and Blood of Christ, which seems to me to indicate that we have here the service of Easter Eve) amidst the singing of the choir; the Lauds or Alleluia followed, "as in the Revelation" (iv. 8-11), and the Angelic Hymn; and the names of the departed saints were recited, "as if heaven were opening at the second coming of Christ." The Kiss of Peace was given, and then the Sursum corda, the "confractio et commixtio corporis Christi" (the breaking being connected with a strange legend), whilst the prostrate clerks were singing an anthem (apparently the Sanctus, Sanctus). On this followed the Lord's Prayer, the benediction of the people ("Pax fides et communicatio corporis et sanguinis Domini sit semper vobiscum"), and the communion. Then, what Germanus called the Treacanum, which he describes as containing "the mystery of the Trinity," in such words as seem to me to suit only the εἰς ἄγιος κ. τ. λ. of the Oriental liturgies; and with this Germanus's account of the form of the service terminates. It will be noticed that he omits to inform us of the moment when the consecration took place, although we find in an earlier part of the letter that "pridie quam pateretur Dominus," our Saviour said, "Hic est calix sanguinis mei mysterium fidei qui pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum:" which are the words of the Gregorian Canon. This omission and other reasons prevent me from accepting this account as a description of the ordinary liturgy of the Gallican church at the time of Germanus. The account seems rather to be that of one of the services at the season of Easter.

(56.) With this we may compare the results of Mone's discoveries amongst the palimpsests at Carlsruhe. We should not be justified in regarding the originals of these as all of one date, but we may supplement the account of Germanus by what we find here. It would appear that there was occasionally or generally a prayer post prophetiam, and, after the catechumens were dismissed, a præfatio, which was an address to the congregation, explaining the service which followed, and calling upon them to join heartily in it. This was followed by a collect. The oblations were then made, and the names both of living and departed members of Christ's body were read, prayers being offered both ante nomina and post nomina. Then came the kiss of peace and the prayer ad pacem, and the service proceeded with the Sursum corda, etc. (though this is not mentioned) and the contestatio, which answered to the modern preface. Of these contestations there was evidently a great variety. This of course led up to the Sanctus, and we have various collects entitled post sanctus; the words of institution (we have not them at length) were introduced "qui pridie," and part of them seem to have been uttered secreto, for, after them, comes in one missa a "post secreta." (We have three instances here of an invocation.) Then came the Lord's Prayer with variable introductions, all entirely different from the Gregorian, and a variable EMBOLISMUS. Then must have followed the Communion, for the next prayer is entitled generally postcommunio, once only post mysterium; then came the collect and the final benediction.

(57.) The first sacramentary published by Mabillon entirely upholds the correctness of our inferences drawn from these palimpsests, and at the same time exhibits marks of progress towards later modes of thought. In these missals, which were prepared for the Sundays and older established festivals, we have the præfatio, still the title for an address to the congregation: the collectio post nomina frequently shews that the names recited had been names of the living who had made their offerings or sacrifices, at the same time that it included at times a prayer for the dead. The Vere dignum et justum est is entitled (generally in the older services) immolatio missae, sometimes contestatio. The form of the mysterium or secreta always begins Qui pridie. The words of consecration are not given. The post secreta is either a prayer or an expression of belief. There seems to have been two benedictiones populi, one a prayer before communion, the other a blessing before dismissal. The general character of the Missale Gallicanum (Migne, pp. 339, etc.) is the same. We still find the titles immolatio and contestatio prefixed to the Vere dignum et justum est, but there are a few indications that a change of service was being introduced when the manuscript was prepared, such as immolatio nunc missae or contestatio nunc, and in a very few instances the post communionem is altered to post eucharistiam. The character of the collects post nomina is the same as in the Gothic missal.

(58.) The other two sacramentaries i.e. the Missale Francorum, and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (which Mabillon found at Bobio) contain, either in whole or in part (the former manuscript being mutilated), the Gregorian canon. We must therefore assign them to the ninth century (or the later years of the eighth) at the earliest. In the former the title super oblat. has replaced the words post nomina, and the offerings have become the oblations of God's people. The names of the offerers are no longer recited: and the Memento etiam appears in the canon, after the consecration. We have still benedictions "ad plebem," pp. 336, 337.

From the letter of the Monks of Mount Olivet to pope Leo III., we know that the creed of Constantinople was used in the chapel of Charlemagne. [CREED, § 15, I. 492.] We find no notice of it in any of the manuscripts.^c

(59.) Roman Liturgy.—We must now turn to one of the most difficult subjects,—the history and characteristics of the liturgy in use in Rome. We have seen evidences that it differed materially from the Liturgy of Gaul in the middle of the 8th century, and we know, with considerable accuracy, the form which it assumed before the end of the 9th century; but the evidence is very limited as to its previous growth. In the accounts of the 9th century we meet with statements that Alexander (A.D. 100 to 106) combined the history of the Passion of our Lord with the prayer of the priest, when the masses were celebrated (see § 34); that Xystus (107-116) directed that during the service the people should sing the hymn Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, etc.; that Telesphorus (117-127) ordered that at the commencement of the sacrifice the angelic hymn Gloria in excelsis Deo should be sung on the night of the Nativity alone. These and similar statements, found in the works of Walafrid Strabo and others, indicate a belief that the portions referred to were of great antiquity. Greater credence may perhaps be given to details such as these which follow. Caelestinus (422) is said to have directed that Psalms of David should be sung before the sacrifice, in addition to the reciting of parts of St. Paul's Epistles and the Holy Gospel. Of Leo the Great (440-462), it is distinctly stated that he added the words "sanctum sacrificium et caetera:" and of Gelasius (about 495), that he framed with great caution prefaces for the sacraments. The letter of Vigilius to Profuturus, Bishop of Braga, has been already referred to: he sent to the Spanish bishop the text of the "canonical prayer," "which by God's mercy we have received (he said) from apostolic tradition." The letter is preserved, the enclosure unhappily is lost. But in the letter he gives the important information that "in the celebration of masses, at no time and on no festival was the order of the prayer different. They always consecrated in the same form the gifts offered to God." Then we come to the work of Gregory the Great, of whom it is stated by the Deacon John that he made additions to the ritual of the church, that he ordered the ALLELUIA [I. 56] to be said at other times beside Pentecost, the Kyrie eleison to be sung, and the Lord's Prayer to be recited immediately after the canon over the sacrifice. (The Canon here would seem to be the list of saints commemorated in the Nobis quoque peccatoribus. For an example of this limited meaning, see Muratori de Lit. Rom. i. 555.) Gregory is also declared by his biographer to have reduced into one volume the Gelasian codex of the solemnities of the mass, by removing many things, altering a few, and adding others "pro exponendis Evangelicis lectionibus." His letter to John the bishop of Syracuse (Epist. ix. 12) seems to shew that the Deacon John was correct in his account of the alterations which Gregory had introduced, and several writers agree in narrating that Gregory added the words "disceque nostros in tua pace disponas." They are found in the prayer Hanc igitur. With these brief hints we shall be better able to examine the documents which have come down to us.

^c A prayer in the earlier MS. (p. 227), "Give deliverance to the captive, sight to the blind," may remind us of a similar petition in the Alexandrine liturgies. The prayers post nomina, ad pacem, post secreta, are also frequently addressed to our Lord. There is a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pages 246, 257, and on page 266 (the Thursday in Holy Week) I notice the "Agnus Dei."

pared by some ecclesiastic for his own, either private or public, use. It is mutilated at the commencement, and does not give the canon of the Mass. It contains, however, a collection of prayers such as were used at the eucharistic services, one or two collects for the day, a prayer of oblation, a Vere dignum, a prayer after communion, and a benediction. Of these there is an immense variety; thus there are eight "sets" of prayers for the festival of St. John and St. Paul, and twenty-eight for that of St. Peter and St. Paul (Migne, lv. pp. 47, 49, etc.). Titles to the prayers occur very rarely; we have, however, preces for the collects on p. 110; super oblata on pp. 106, 110; and on the same pages, postcommunio and super populum. We are thus severed from the post nomina of the Gothic sacramentary, and brought more into connexion with the Missale Francorum and the Bobio manuscript. The Ballerini have remarked that in a mass for Pentecost the prayer Hanc igitur is represented as preceding the Communicantes (p. 40). On p. 70 there is an embolismus (the only one I have discovered), and on p. 75, "Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, quaesumus, mente capiamus," etc., and a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pp. 79, 147 (compare p. 139). On p. 117 we find two prayers, still more resembling the Gregorian Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem; the former has the words "disce meos clementissima gubernatione disponas"; in the latter it seems to have been assumed that the reader needed only the first few words, his memory would supply the rest. If so, we carry the petition, Quam oblationem, back to a period before the time of Gelasius.

We meet with so many prayers for the rulers or princes of the "Roman Name" that we can have no difficulty in assigning the book to some Roman priest or bishop; and the manner in which the Roman primacy is urged (as we find it in no other sacramentary) may be deemed to justify Blanchini in his opinion that Leo might have been the compiler. We learn from Gerbert (Vetus Liturgia Alemannica, i. 80) that the effect of the discussions which followed his publication on the mind of Blanchini was this: he became persuaded that the work was still more ancient than at first he deemed it to be, and attributed it to Sylvester, who was pope from 314 to 355. One thing is clear, that, when the book was written, the liturgy at Rome had not assumed the character which Vigilius ascribed to it in the middle of the sixth century, unless we limit most rigidly his language as to the form of consecration.

(61.) In the year 1680 the learned Thomasius (afterwards Cardinal) published the contents of a manuscript which, having belonged to Petau, was then in the library of Queen Christina, and is now in the Vatican (Vat. 1455 according to Daniel, 316 according to Muratori). This part of Thomasius' work was republished by Muratori in the first volume of his learned work Liturgia Romana Vetus, and with it, in Migne's series, vol. lxxiv. p. 847, etc. The manuscript is of the tenth century, and is entitled, Liber Sacramentorum Romanæ Ecclesiæ ordinis anni circuli. It contains several prayers for the princes of the Roman kingdom and the governors of the Roman empire (Muratori, pp. 729-731); but one of the well-known collects for Good Friday (p. 561) has the prayer, "Respice propitius ad Romanum sive Francorum benignum imperium." Thus the Roman work had been adapted for use in France in the ninth or tenth century, and it is impossible to say how far this adaptation extended. We know that there were in the monastery at Centula (St. Richierus near Corbey) in the ninth century, fourteen Gelasian and three Gregorian missals, and thus it was inferred by Thomasius that this manuscript might represent the Gelasian order. All doubt on the subject was removed in the year 1777 by Gerbert, who discovered three similar books in the libraries of Switzerland, and the sacramentary, as distinct from the Canon of the Mass, may now unhesitatingly be described as Gelasian. It consists of three books, the prayers for great festivals, ordinary holy days, and ordinary Sundays, being arranged separately. Scattered over the work we have the word oratio prefixed to the collect of the day; the secreta as now in the Roman missal; the Vere dignum varying with almost every festival; on p. 553 the words infra actionem form a rubric to the Communicantes, and the Hanc igitur is similarly introduced. Then we have post communionem, and lastly ad populum. Thus the benediction followed the communion. There is no mention anywhere of the use of the Constantinopolitan Creed in the service (perhaps we might scarcely expect such mention), but in the Order for the preparation for Baptism (which had commenced on the Monday in the third week in Lent, on p. 533), after the "opening of the ears," the acolyth recited this Creed in the name of the children, and the clause on the Procession ran in Greek, "τονεϋπατρος εμπερευομενον"; in Latin, "ex Patre procedentem" (compare Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica, p. 158, or the writer's *Credo*s, p. 138). The omission of the clause Filioque is a further indication of the connexion of this volume with Rome.

(62.) But when we come to the canon of the Mass, the "Canon actionis" as it is called, which is to be found in the third book (Muratori, p. 595), we find the words, "diesque nostros in tua pace disponas;" and, with the exception I shall mention just now, this canon agrees in every respect with what was deemed in the tenth century to be the Gregorian canon. It will be remembered that the Gregorian canon is also to be found in the "Missale Francorum" and the "Missale Gallicanum" of Besançon, although the books in other respects differ from the Roman use. It seems probable, therefore, that the work before us indicates that, although the Gelasian Prefaces etc. were used in some parts of France in the ninth or tenth century, still the directions of Charlemagne had been carried out completely, and the Gregorian canon had replaced all others.^d

^d Some questions on this point seem to be set at rest by observation of the following fact. Ratram, in his letter to the Emperor Charles the Bald on the Body and Blood of our Lord, § 2, refers to two collects used by the priest in the service of the Mass. Of these collects one is in the Gregorian Sacramentary, and indeed is used to the present day. Both are contained in that published by Thomasius and Muratori as the "Gelasian," and they are found nowhere else. Thus we may conclude that this really was the Gelasian sacramentary as used in France in the ninth century; and that this Gelasian

(63.) The exception to which I have referred is this. In the prayer Communicantes of the Gregorian canon the twelve martyrs commemorated were all connected immediately with the church in Rome. In the MS. before us mention is also made (either in the text or margin) of Dionysius, Rusticus, Hilary, Martin, Augustine, Gregory, Jerome, Benedict, Eleutherius. Of these, Hilary and Martin are also named in the Missale Francorum; and they, with Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, Jerome, Benedict, in the Bobio or Besançon copy. Thus these names carry us down to a period far later than Gelasius. Indeed, at p. 515 we have capitulum Sancti Gregorii Papae.

(64.) Again, there is here no Memento etiam of those who have "preceded us with the sign of faith and rest in the sleep of peace." It seems, however, that this is missing from several important manuscripts of the Gregorian canon (see Daniel, i. 38), and thus the omission cannot be regarded as a point of difference between it and the text before us. The same may be said of the clause, Pro quibus tibi offerimus in the Memento Domine. Thus we have no satisfactory direct evidence of the contents of the canon as left by Gelasius.^e But I must mention that, as we have it here, we find that after the Lord's Prayer and the embolismus the Peace was given by the priest, with the usual response; announcements were made of festivals or fasts, and of sick persons to be prayed for; post haec communicat sacerdos cum omni populo; fourteen collects are given under the title, "Post commun." and as many more under the words, "Item Benedictiones super populum post communionem."—There is no account of these benedictions in the brief summary of the Gregorian rite to which I must now proceed.

(65.) After these remarks the Gregorian Liturgy will not detain us long. Muratori speaks of four or five MSS. which were known in his time; to these the search of later investigators has added several more, so that Daniel professes to give the various readings in the Ordo and Canon of nineteen MSS. Of these several present similar titles: "Liber sacramentorum de circulo anni expositum a sancto Gregorio Papa Romano editum ex authentico Libro Bibliothecae Cubiculi scriptum." Muratori thinks (not unreasonably) that this repetition of the same grammatical error indicates that these were all (or, all but one) transcripts of one copy taken from the cubiculum of the custodians of the relics at St. Peter's. The copy which he uses in his margin, has editus. But, as Muratori says, no one can believe that we have the book as it came from the hand of Gregory. The masses vary in the several editions; some copies have only nine prefaces; others have many more. The festivals vary; all (as I understand) include a commemoration of St. Gregory himself. Even the account, "Qualiter missa Romana cele-sacramentary continued in use in combination with the Gregorian canon. And it follows that we have no distinctive copy of the true Gelasian canon. (The passage from Ratram may be seen in Gieseler, third period, division i, § 14, note 6; and the collects referred to in Muratori, i. 657. 671.)

bratur," varies in the details which I shall mention as I proceed.

(66.) What is now called the Ordo (of which we have no notice in the Gelasian Sacramentary) is given briefly but satisfactorily. Mention is made of the Introit, the Kyrie eleison, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to be used on Sundays and festivals if a bishop is present, otherwise only at Easter. When the Litany is said, neither the Gloria in excelsis nor the Alleluia is sung. Then followed the Oratio or Oratio Missalis, i. e. the collect for the day; the Apostolum (sic) or Epistle; then either the Gradalis or the Alleluia; then the Gospel. This was followed by the offertory, and the prayer super oblata, which varied; it is called the secreta in one MS. It concluded with the words, Per omnia saecula saeculorum, which were recited aloud. The absence is noted (Gerbert, p. 301) of the salutations before the Epistle and before the Gospel, of the Creed, and of the Sermon. Then the canon commenced, but the records end with the salutation after the embolismus; i. e. we have no account of the communion, or the kiss of peace, or the benediction. The Vatican MS. used by Muratori has, however, one line more, Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis, which is also contained in two or more other MSS. In the body of the books we have for each day a prayer ad complendum, answering to the similar prayer in the modern missal.

(67.) I think it is certain that all the known MSS. of this sacramentary were used north of the Alps, yet not one of them refers to the use of the "Nicene" Creed in the service of the Mass. We know, however, that the Gallican churches used the Gloria in excelsis every Sunday, and that the recitation of the creed spread very much after the fall of Felix and Elipandus. The collects super oblata have never (I believe) any reference to the offerers. This had been discouraged by Pope Innocent I. The persons named in the Te igitur are different in the different manuscripts. In some places the king was prayed for; in others the emperor: many omitted the petition, pro omnibus orthodoxis, and all the MSS. but one (the Vat. Othob.) omit the words, Pro quibus tibi offerimus.[†] The Memento etiam on behalf of those who have died with the sign of faith is absent from five of the MSS., and in two other early copies it is inserted in the margin. The names adduced in the prayer commencing Nobis quoque are again all Roman. (This collect is referred to by Innocent III. as indicating the growth of the Roman service.)

(68.) Ambrosian Liturgy.—The church of Milan was said to have been founded by Barnabas, and it seems to be undoubted that it was regarded as entirely independent of Rome until Gregory in 593 attempted to exercise patriarchal privileges within the province. Milan certainly had a liturgy of its own, which, notwithstanding repeated efforts on the part of the Roman patriarch, was, though with some modifications, retained until our own times. One of the most important of these efforts was encouraged by Charlemagne, who, in his anxiety to compel the Lombards to follow the example he had set to his earlier subjects, carried off to Rome all the service-books he could collect at Milan, with the intention of replacing them by Roman offices (Mabillon, Iter Ital. tom. i. part ii. p. 106, etc.). Eugenius, a Gallican bishop, induced Leo to exercise some forbearance in the matter, and thus the Milanese rite was preserved; but, as the account proceeds, only one copy of the earlier service-book could be discovered, so that from it the more recent copies must have been taken.

(69.) This statement seems to be in some degree corroborated by the fact that no manuscript of very ancient date has been discovered containing the Ambrosian rite. The sacramentary published by Pamelius in 1571 differs considerably even in the canon from the modern rite given by Daniel, and it differs too in the service for the Thursday before Easter from that which Saxe, the librarian at Milan, furnished from a very old manuscript to Muratori (de Lit. Rom. i. 131). The text of Daniel approximates more nearly to that of the modern Roman Ordo and Canon than that given by Pamelius, shewing, I conceive, that the efforts of various popes to induce the Milanese to resign their inheritance have tended to encourage the admission of details from the Roman liturgy. Thus, the text of the Confiteor (Daniel, p. 50) and the absolutions, the Munda cor meum (p. 62), the Hanc igitur (p. 84, in which the well-known Gregorian words Diesque nostros in tua pace disponas are to be found), the Supplices te rogamus (p. 90), the Libera nos (p. 96) do not occur in Pamelius, nor do other prayers of great importance given by Daniel (pp. 100, 102, 104): and the language of many others differs considerably.

(70.) Taking the text of Pamelius as our guide, we observe that, after two private prayers said by the priest before and whilst he draws near to the altar, an Ingressa takes the place of the Roman Introit; and that before the Gloria in excelsis there is an oratio super populum, corresponding to our collect for the day. The salutations, Dominus vobiscum, etc., are very frequent; after the Gloria in excelsis (in which, as in the older copies, the Qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis is not repeated) the Kyrie eleison follows. (In the Gregorian it precedes the Angelic Hymn.) Three lessons were read, as in the Gallican and Spanish rites—the Prophecy, the Epistle, the Gospel; a Psalmus, consisting of two (or more) verses suited to the Prophecy, was sung after it; a Benedictus preceded the Epistle, and a verse for the day with the Alleluia followed it; the first few words of the Gloria in excelsis and a suitable benedictory prayer preceded the Gospel; salutations, the Kyrie eleison, and an antiphon succeeded it. The oblations of the bread and the cup were then made, and they were made even until our own day in a manner recalling the earlier conceptions of the church: they were brought in, not by the deacon, but by ten aged men and as many women, and presented by them to the priest. He had previously offered an oratio super sindonem, which varied with the day or season; then came the orationes secretae ad munus oblatum, and a prayer resembling the suscipe Sancte Pater of the Roman office, and two others commencing Et suscipe Sancta Trinitas (these differ in very interesting details from those which in the Roman book follow the recitation of the creed). According to the book before us a prose hymn entitled offerenda was then chanted (it began Ecce apertum est templum tabernaculi testimonii, and ended with the Sanctus of the Apocalypse), and this introduced the creed. Then followed the varying prayer super oblatam repeated aloud, and the "preface to the canon" followed. The prefaces (they are so entitled) are numerous. The canon commenced in a manner similar to the Gregorian, but the Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem were replaced by a single prayer commencing Fac nobis. (This is not in Daniel, nor is there notice there of the washing of the fingers of the priest which here ensued, its position differing from that in the Roman book.) Then immediately ensued the consecratio panis per verba Christi and the consecratio calicis, and the commemoratio passionis resurrectionis et ascensionis Domini—all differing from the Gregorian text; but we have the Memento etiam and the Nobis quoque. The Per quem differed materially: there was a special prayer for the confection and commixtion, and the Lord's Prayer followed with a doxology. The Pacis nuntiatio, including a prayer, Pax in caelo, pax in terra, pax in omni populo, pax sacerdotibus ecclesiarum Dei; pax Christi et ecclesiae maneat semper nobiscum. Then followed prayers of the priest before and after he communicated, and the communion of the bystanders (V. Corpus Christi, R. Amen). With the last exception, and that of the offering of the priest after his reception, Deo gratias, Deo gratias, etc., the modern or Daniel's text here differs almost entirely from that of Pamelius, which has nothing analogous to the prayers of the Roman Liturgy. Then, an appeal to the church to rejoice, entitled transitorium; a varying prayer post communionem; Dominus nobiscum; Kyrie eleison; Benedicat et exaudiat nos Deus; Procedamus in pace, R. in nomine Christi, and the service concluded.

(71.) The importance of our subject is such that it is necessary to say a few more words on the canon which Muratori printed in his famous work (p. 131), from the copy furnished to him by Saxe. Here we find the Hanc igitur oblationem adapted for the day, and the Quam oblationem, neither of which is in Pamelius; but there is a prayer commencing Haec facimus, to which I know of nothing analogous anywhere else. The service is represented as then passing on to a prayer resembling in some respects that commencing Per quem, and on this the Lord's Prayer follows. Thus then (if Muratori's account may be implicitly trusted) we have no offering after consecration, no prayer for those who have departed with the sign of faith, no commemoration of the (Roman) martyrs, no ceremony of fraction before the Lord's Prayer; all of which are contained in the rite as published by Pamelius. The fact is remarkable, and the discrepancy seems to require some explanation. We have an indication in both services that, as we have them, they are later than 800; for in both we have a prayer for the emperor, and Charles was not crowned emperor before that year.

(72.) We have no account of the early liturgy of the patriarchate of Aquileia.

(73.) Liturgies of the British Islands.—We are in almost entire ignorance of the character of the liturgies of the ancient British and Celtic churches. It is of course most probable that they resembled in some degree the uses of the churches in Gaul or Spain, but of the extent of this resemblance it is impossible to speak precisely. A curious document originally published by Spelman, and much used by Ussher, Stillingfleet, and others, may be found in Haddan and Stubbs (i. 138–140). It seems to have been written in the latter part of the seventh or in the eighth century, and professes to give some notes on the various 'courses' in use in Western Europe. The 'Cursus Gallorum' is referred to St. John, and it is stated that it was used widely. The 'Cursus Scottorum,' of which a marked feature was that the Sanctus, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, the Lord's Prayer, and the Amen were chanted by all the congregation, male and female, is assigned to St. Mark; and its introduction into Britain and Scotland is attributed to Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus, who visited the islands about the year 429. It thus (as Professor Stubbs says) is silent on the liturgy of Britain before 429, and its evidence, so far as it is worth anything, only "asserts that the Irish liturgy used by St. Patrick was neither Roman nor Gallican, but Alexandrian." Coming down to the next century, we find an assertion attributed to Gildas, that the Britons were opposed to the whole world and to the Romans in particular, "in the mass" (H. and S. i. 112). The date is questioned by Mr. Stubbs, who would refer the assertion to a later period; but, of course, if true in the seventh or eighth century it must have been true in the sixth as to the opposition to Rome. The words of Gregory to Augustine (ib. iii. 19) authorised the latter to form a purely Anglican rite, and we know from his proposals to the British bishops (Bede, E. H. ii. 2, in Palmer, i. 178), that in matters of custom, in which at the time "the latter differed from the use of Rome and of the church universal," Augustine would give up all points but three. He insisted that they should celebrate Easter at the proper time, should baptize after the Roman ritual, and should join him in preaching the word of the Lord to the English nation. "Everything else, however contrary to our customs, we will bear with equanimity." Of course as long as the Britons and Celts refused to observe the Roman Easter, they must have refused to adopt the Roman ritual for the Eucharist. And we know that the Roman Easter was not observed either in Scotland or Ireland before the beginning of the eighth century. Bede (H. E. v. 15, see Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 110) states that Adamnan came to Aldfred, king of the Angli, about the year 704, and whilst staying with him saw the canonical rites of the church, and was then persuaded how undesirable it was for him and his people, very few in number and living in an extreme corner of the earth, to retain customs which were opposed to those of the whole Christian world. Adamnan succeeded in inducing the North Irish churches to adopt the Roman Easter, but he died before he could persuade his own monastery at Iona to do the same. It yielded, however, about the year 716 (H. and S. ii. 114). The British churches persisted for a few years longer, but at length, between the years 755 and 850, the bishops in Wales gave way one by one (ib. i. 203, 204), following the example of their countrymen amongst the West Saxons, who had yielded to the persuasion of Aldhelm in 705 (ib. i. 674).

(74.) One Tirechanus, writing about the year

750 (H. and S. i. 115, 141, 154), stated that the second order of Irish saints (beginning from the year 544) receive their office of the Mass from David, Gildas, and Cadoc. Dr. O'Connor, in the year 1819 gave some account of a manuscript (then in the library at Stowe, now in the collection of Lord Ashburnham) which contained a missal that must have been in use in Ireland. His account has been supplemented and corrected by Dr. Todd. We are still, unhappily, in great ignorance as to the character of the service contained in the MS. Two things of moment, however, are known. First, that a copy of the Nicene Creed is found in it, omitting the word Filioque. But we are not told whether this is in the office of the Mass or in the scrutiny in preparation for baptism. If the latter, we are reminded of the Gelasian or Gregorian Sacramentary, for the exclusion of the Filioque points to a mark of difference in the Irish church from the churches of Spain and Gaul. We are told, secondly, that there are several collects in this missal before the Epistles; and we know that at a synod of Mâcon, held about 624, the objection was raised against the famous Columbanus, that he celebrated the solemnities of the Mass with a multiplicity of prayers or collects. Eustatius, who was then abbat of Luxeuil (the convent had been founded by Columbanus), defended the use. Additional confirmation is furnished by the two very interesting books of Mullen and Dimma, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. They are undoubtedly Irish, and although they contain only services for the visitation of the sick, yet these services bear very strong resemblance to each other, and the words, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine, tibi semper dicamus, Domine, alleluia, alleluia (which are repeated), are found, almost identically, in the words of the Spanish Liturgy, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine, te laudamus Domine, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia. A post-communion collect commencing Refecti is frequently found in the Gallican and other services, but the jubilant alleluia is connected with it only in the Mozarabic rite. I have not seen in the Spanish books the concluding thanksgiving, Deus tibi gratias agamus, etc.

Mabillon (De Liturg. Gall. lib. i. col. iii. § 2) shews that the Roman order was not introduced into Ireland before the 12th century.

(75.) Mr. Haddan (H. and S. ii. p. 275) considered that the one fragment of Scottish-Celtic liturgical documents, that has as yet seen the light, is contained in the book of Deer;—a portion of the service for the Visitation of the Sick. It resembles closely that contained in the books I have just named, and thus it seems probable that the service was known from Aberdeen to Wexford. We thus connect the early Scottish rites also with those of Spain. It seems that in the 12th century the bishop of Glasgow introduced, with the consent of Pope Alexander III., the Sarum offices into his cathedral, and that his example was followed by other bishops in the next century (H. and S. 275 and 33). As the Sarum missal contains the Gregorian Canon, the inference is that the Scotch use up to that time must, like the Irish, have continued to differ from that adopted in Gaul and England.

(76.) Returning to England, we have only to notice that the Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford uses, which continued until the 16th century, all agreed in adopting the text of the Gregorian Canon. We must conclude that that canon had been introduced universally before the end of the 10th century, and thus we have proof that the 13th canon of the council of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) had secured complete obedience, and that "in the celebration of the masses all things were then done after the example which they had in writing from the Roman church." This canon seems to refer only to days kept in memory of events in the life of our Lord, but the spirit of the enactment is manifest. And doubtless when the Welsh bishops finally adopted the Roman Easter, they adopted simultaneously the Gregorian Liturgy. [C. A. S.]

LOAVES, MULTIPLICATION OF. Representations of this miracle are very frequent in early Christian art. Perhaps the most common form of treatment is that given by Bottari (pl. lxxxv.), in which the Lord lays one hand on the loaves and the other on the fishes presented by two disciples, whilst at his feet are the "baskets" containing the "fragments." A sarcophagus in the Vatican, however, presents a noteworthy variation from this type (Id. pl. xix.). Here the loaves are placed in three baskets at the Lord's feet; in His right hand He holds a rod, which He extends over them, whilst He lays His left hand on the fish, presented by a disciple (see woodcut). The principal symbolic use of this subject was doubtless to keep before the minds of the faithful the perpetual supply of the heavenly bread provided in the Eucharist for the nourishment of their souls. Hence we find the second of the two recorded miracles of multiplication is the one usually chosen for representation, as in it the loaves multiplied are supposed to have been of wheat, the "barley loaves" being expressly mentioned on the first occasions. The seven baskets, which are of almost invariable occurrence in these representations, show unmistakably that the second of those miracles is referred to. [Compare MANNA.]

From Bottari (Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus).

The Lord almost always appears with a rod in his hand (Buonarr. Vetri. tav. viii.). Upon a sarcophagus given by Bottari (iii. p. 201) the Lord holds a rod in one hand, and from the other rays of light appear to stream upon three baskets of loaves. This subject is represented in paintings, in sarcophagi (v. Bosio, passim) and sepulchral slabs (Perret, vol. v. pl. xlvii, 18), on glasses (Buonarr. loc. laud.), and on mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Monim. ii. 98). On a curious sarcophagus in the Vatican the Jews appear to seize the Lord, perhaps to take him by force and make him a king (St. John vi. 15). [C.]

LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF. The procession of the Lite which occurs in the office of Great Vespers [v. art. LITE] returns into the nave of the church while the Aposticha are being sung; and each one puts down his candlestick^a on either side of a table^b, already prepared by the Cellarite (or steward), on which stands a dish with corn and five loaves, such as we are in the habit of offering in church; and on either side of the dish are two vessels (ἀγγεῖα); the one on the left filled with wine, the other on the right with oil. The priest with the deacon stands within the beautiful doors (τῶν ὡραίων πυλῶν)^c. When the Aposticha are finished, Nunc dimittis, the Trisagion, and the Lord's prayer are said; and after certain troparia belonging to the day, and certain ceremonies which are detailed in the rubrics, relating mainly to the censuring of the loaves, the priest takes one loaf in his hand, and says the following prayer in a loud voice:

"O Lord Jesus Christ, our God, who didst bless the five loaves in the desert, and didst feed five thousand men; do Thou bless these loaves also, the corn, the wine, and the oil; and multiply them in this holy monastery [or in the city], and throughout the whole world which is Thine, and sanctify the faithful who partake of them. For Thou art He that blesseth and sanctifieth all things, Christ our God; and to Thee we offer up [ἀναπέμπομεν] glory, with Thine eternal [lit. without beginning] Father, and Thine all Holy and Good and Life-giving Spirit, now and to all ages. Amen."

Then Psalm 33 [34 E. V. Benedicam Domino] is said as far as the words, "Shall want no manner of thing that is good."

And the priest goes from his place, and stands before the Holy doors looking West. And after the end of the psalm he says:

"The blessing of the Lord and His mercy come upon you, by His grace and love for men now and ever and to all ages."

And the dismissal takes place.

A note at the end of the office of vespers adds: "Be it known that the bread which has been blessed is a preservative against all sorts of evils, if it be taken with faith."

The following form of "Blessing bread and distributing it to the poor on the feasts of the Ascension or Pentecost" is from an old Pontifical of Narbonne, and is stated [Martene, iii. 193] to have been used in other churches.

After rubrical directions for the procession, and other ritual observances, the deacon reads the gospel from St. John vi. 1. The officiating priest or bishop (Sacerdos vel Pontifex) begins, and the choir continues the antiphon De quinque panibus, &c.

The Priest. Dispersit dedit pauperibus.

V. Beatus qui intelligit super egenum et pauperem.

R. In die mala liberabit eum Dominus.

V. Numquid panem poterit dare?

R. Aut parare mensam in deserto?

V. Pluit illis manna ad manducandum,

R. Et panem coeli dedit eis,

V. Cibavit illos ex adipse frumenti,

R. Et de petra melle saturavit eos.

V. Manducaverunt et saturati sunt,

R. Et desiderium attulit eis.

V. Panem angelorum manducavit homo.

R. Misit eis cibaria in abundantia.

V. Domine exaudi orationem meam.

R. Et clamor meus ad te veniat.

And the form concludes with two collects (the former of which is substantially the same as the Greek prayer already given, in a Latin shape) for blessing the bread, and that it may convey spiritual and bodily health and protection against all diseases to those who partake of it.

LOCALIS ORDINATIO. By ancient custom, no priest, deacon, or other ecclesiastic was permitted to be ordained without having a definite sphere in which to exercise his ministry, or, in the later phrase, without a title to orders. This was termed in the Western Church localis ordinatio, and the clergy, because ordained to the charge of a particular church or monastery, were termed locales. And it was specially forbidden that a clerk should be ordained to two churches, "cauponarum enim est" (Syn. Nic. II. can. 15). The first Council of Arles (A.D. 314) recognises this custom incidentally in its 22nd canon, ordering that priests and deacons who should relinquish the churches to which they were bound by their ordination (in quibus ordinati sunt) should return and officiate there only, and that those who did not obey should be deposed. And the Council of Valencia in Spain (A.D. 524) expressly forbids ordination unless the candidate should have first promised to keep to a single post (se futurum localem) in order that none ordained might be able to transgress ecclesiastical rule and discipline with impunity by removing from one church to another. To the same effect the Oecumenical Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) in its 6th canon, forbidding any to be ordained ἀποελυμένως, i.e. absolutely and without a title. It annuls ordinations performed in breach of this rule. By the two following canons it declares all clergy residing in monasteries or serving chapels of the martyrs, to be locales. And we find pope Leo (Ep. 92, ad Rustic. c. i.) instructing his correspondent accordingly that ordination without this designation to a particular place was null, "vana est habenda ordinatio, quae nec loco fundata est, nec auctoritate munita."

^a τὰ μοναῳλία. So called because carried in the hand.
^b τραπεζίδιον. Called in the parallel rubric in the office for Vespers ἀναλόγιον, which word is explained as pulpitum portabile.

^c It is disputed what is meant by this term. Here it evidently means the doors which separate the body (ναός) of the church from the narthex; for the rubric on the procession of the Lite, which starts from the interior of the church, says—διελθόντες διὰ τῶν ὡραίων πυλῶν . . . ἵστανται ἐν τῇ νάρθηκι, whence they are now returning. Dr. Neale, however, holds that these doors are the exterior doors of the narthex. The question appears to be connected with some ambiguity in the use of the term narthex, and probably with some structural variation in different churches. See Ducange, Constantinople and Gloss. Gr. barb. 986; Goar, Euch. pp. 12, 14, &c.; Neale, Intr. pp. 197, &c. [Doors, p. 574.]

The principle in fact was that such ordinations had no mission, and this idea kept in mind will in every instance give the reasons of the rule. It is not to be understood as binding a priest to the same church throughout his life, but it would seem that he was expected to keep as a general rule to the same diocese. He owed obedience to the bishop who ordained him to his first grade, and was bound to go and exercise his ministry whither he was sent by him. The 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) obliged Julian, a bishop, to send back to another bishop, Epigonus, a youth whom the latter had ordained as reader, although Julian had advanced him to the diaconate, and so might seem to have a claim upon him (can. 44). It was not usual for a bishop to promote to a higher grade a clerk ordained by another bishop. This was expressly forbidden by the ninth canon of a synod held at Angers, and by the tenth of another held at Vannes in Brittany. It was the breach of this well-known and understood rule that occasioned the loud complaints made by Demetrius of Alexandria when Origen, who was one of his deacons, was raised to the presbyterate in Palestine by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem. We find Gregory the Great (A.D. 590) writing to the bishop of Syracuse, requesting him to send back to their ordinary certain clerks who had taken refuge with him, having been ordained by another bishop (Epist. iii. 42).

Canonical penalties were imposed for breaches of this rule. The Council of Herda (Lerida, A.D. 524) suspended the bishop so offending from the power to ordain (can. 12). The third of Orleans (538) sequestered him altogether from officiating for six months (can. 6). The civil power appears at some periods to have been called in to relegate wandering clerks to their own diocesan (Conc. Tolet. xiii. A.D. 683, cann. 11, 12). The number of these seems to have been very great throughout the Western Churches. Isidore, writing in A.D. 595, calls them Acephali, and speaks of them as disgracing the church, and hardly deserving the name of clergy at all (Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Offic. lib. ii. c. 3).

The same Gregory wishing to appoint the archdeacon of Catania to the vacant see of Syracuse, formally asked for him a release by the bishop of Catania from this bond of localis (Epist. iv. 30). In like manner the assent of the archbishop of Ravenna was formally applied for before the appointment of Florentius, archdeacon of Ravenna, to the see of Ancona (Epist. xii. 6). Many such instances occur in history. Charlemagne himself presided over a council held at Frankfurt in 794, when complaint was made of the wandering habit of a part of the clergy, and sundry prohibitions of this were repeated (Cap. Frankf.). That neither bishop, presbyter, nor deacon should migrate from city to city, but remain attached to their own church according to rule (can. 7). That bishops should not receive wandering clergy (can. 27). That none should be ordained unattached (absolutè) (can. 28).

in order to escape this bond of localis (Syn. Caesaraugust. can. 6; Conc. Chalced. can. 7; Justinian, Novell. vi. c. 7, de clericis in aliam vitam formam transeuntibus). But the clerk could not be removed from his church or preferment at the mere will of the bishop (Greg. Mag. Epist. i. 19; iii. 13), though he might be transferred, "non invitus," from one to another (Conc. Carthag. iv. can. 27). The bishop might not in ordinary cases send a clerk into another diocese (Conc. Antioch. can. 22; Can. Apost. c. 35); but he might send him on a mission to the heathen, as e. g. Gregory the Great sent Augustine to the heathen English.

The priest might not travel without the licence and commendatory letters of his bishop under penalty of suspension (Conc. Laodic. A.D. 361, can. 42; also can. 41; and especially Concil. Milev. A.D. 416, can. 20, which is very express and detailed on this point). Similar canons were passed by the second of Seville (A.D. 619, can. 3; Worm. 868, can. 19). In 506 the Council of Agde imposed by its 64th canon the penalty of three years' suspension upon priests for absence from their churches for even three weeks.

The clerk seems not to have been quite helpless before the power of his bishop. The Council of Sardica (A.D. 381) gave permission to a clerk unjustly accused to appeal to neighbouring bishops, and to these a discretion to hear and judge of such a case (can. 17). But it is very cautiously worded, and seems to point rather to the rehabilitation of the clerk in his own diocese, than his admission to another. The thirteenth of Toledo, however, in its 12th canon gives to clerks a distinct right of appeal to the metropolitan and even to the sovereign. And see also a letter of Pope Leo I. (ad Anastas. c. 9), which imposes upon the metropolitan the obligation of compelling such a fugitive to return to his own church. And Conc. Wormat. can. 18.

There were occasional exceptions to this rule of making all clergy locales. Paulinus, bishop of Nola (A. D. 353-431) writes in his first letter to Sulpicius Severus that he was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona upon the express condition that he should not be bound to that church. But his was altogether a special case; that of a man of high rank and large fortune who was induced to take upon him the priesthood by the urgent persuasions of the people. The case of Jerome (A.D. 340-420) again is peculiar. He was ordained a presbyter by Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, having previously stipulated that he should not be obliged to quit his monastic life. He says (Apol. ad Pammach. tom. ii. p. 181) that he told Paulinus "si tribuis presbyterum ut monachum nobis non auferas, tu videres de judicio tuo." And from the tone of his description it would seem that like Paulinus of Nola, he too had been solicited to receive ordination. Yet we learn from Epiphanius that it struck him as very unusual and improper that Jerome and another presbyter, Vincentius, lived in retirement, discharging none of the duties of their function; not even celebrating the holy communion; a very remarkable thing at that time. But Jerome, whatever may have been his actual motive, was really in agreement with the principle of the canon of Chalcedon referred to above, which forbade men, ordained as he had been, to exercise their office. Theodoret (Hist. Relig. c. xiii. 3) records that Flavian, another bishop of Antioch, sent for Macedonius, a famous monk out of the neighbouring desert, and having ordained him a presbyter against his will, allowed him to return.

It is evident that even these exceptions are more apparent than real; that the rule of localis was absolute, and was strictly observed.

It extended also to bishops. No bishop was to be consecrated, except to a particular diocese, and to that he was to confine himself. We find the 1st Council of Nicaea (can. 15) recognising this fact in the plainest manner, and applying it to all the clergy, bishops, priests, or deacons. The above refers to clergy obtaining these removals, so to speak, by fair means: can. 16 of the same council deals with the case of presbyters and deacons breaking the rule of localis altogether lawlessly. Justinian promulgated a law (Novell. lib. iv. c. 2) forbidding bishops to be absent from their dioceses more than a year, except by command of the emperor. The 3rd of Carthage (397) forbids (can. 38) the translation of bishops; and this canon recites the case which formed its occasion, viz. that Cresconius, bishop of Villa Regia, had left his see, and settled himself over that of Tubunae, contrary to the rule. For a bishop might not be transferred from his original see without the approval of a provincial synod (iv. Carth. can. 27, which no doubt embodies an earlier rule).

Yet even here we meet some exceptions. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. vi. c. 34) relates that Barses and Eulogius, monks of Edessa, and Lazarus, a monk of Mount Sigoron, were raised to be bishops, not of any diocese, but purely and simply as an honour, οὐ πόλεως τινὸς, ἀλλὰ τιμῆς ἕνεκεν. These appear, however, to be the only cases expressly recorded of a honorary episcopate, until a much later period. In the 2nd Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) there were three bishops present who subscribed the acts of the council "non habentes sedes." The Council of Vermeria [Verberie, dioc. Soissons] (A.D. 752) complains of the number of vagranti bishops, and refuses to recognise the ordinations performed by them (can. 14), and three years after (A.D. 755) one at Verneville appealed to such bishops not to ordain in the dioceses of others (can. 13). For the case of the chorepiscopi, or assistant bishops, see CHOREPISCOPUS. Their want of title and jurisdiction in the Western Church was, in the reign of Charlemagne, held to be fatal to their episcopal character, "nam episcopi non erant, qui nec ad quandam episcopalem sedem titulati erant, nec canonicè a tribus episcopis ordinati." The whole class were therefore to be recognised as presbyters only, and their ordinations were to be disallowed "pro inanibus vacuisque habitae." [S. J. E.]

LORD (κύριος, δεσπότης, Dominus). On the Old Testament (LXX) usage of these several words, see DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, art. Lord.

I. Dominus, see under that heading in vol. i.

II. Kýrios is a general title of respect, and, when employed in the vocative, exactly like Sir in English (St. John iv. 11, xii. 21).

Δεσπότης is employed sometimes in the same connexion: the use of dominus in later times is exactly similar.

Δεσπότης, κύριος, and dominus are bestowed upon bishops. In a letter from Eusebius of Nicomedia to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, we find him styling his correspondent lord (κύριος). This was probably an excess of adulation. The Proemium to the acts of the 1st Council of Arles (A.D. 314) speaks of pope Sylvester as "Lord" (Dominus). Similarly the epistle of the synod at Gangra (324) speaks to the bishops of Armenia, as "dominis honorabilibus consacer-dotibus." A letter of the Egyptian bishops to pope Marcus (336) asking for copies of the Nicene canons, is addressed (if we may trust the text) "domino sancto et Apostolici culminis venerando papae. And he, in replying, used a similar formula, "dominis venerabilibus fratribus." So the epistle of the Orientals to pope Julius I. (337).

In and after the time of Constantine we find many examples of this usage. St. John Chrysostom, writing to pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417, Episc. 122, ad Innoc. Episc. Rom.), superscribes his letter "τῷ δεσπότη μου τῷ αἰδεσιμωτάτῳ καὶ θεοφιλεστάτῳ ἐπισκόπῳ . . . Ἰωάννης ἐν Κυρίῳ χαίρειν." In fact henceforward it was applied to men of high rank, both in church and state, "pariterque caeteri principes atque nobiles tum ecclesiae tum reipublicae" (Spelman, Glossar. s. v. "Lord").

But yet the designation "Lord" was not universal in addressing bishops: many letters are found without it: and it is remarkable that St. Jerome, writing to pope Damasus, although he was his superior and patron, calls him merely "beatissimus papa." (The letter is curious, as being written to suggest that the "Gloria Patri" and Alleluia should be added to the psalms when sung; which had not, up to that time, been done at Rome.) Yet in the very next letter we find Stephen, archbishop of Aphricae (? Antiphras in Libya), addressing the same man in a synodical letter, as "lord" (dominus). So also this very Damasus in a letter to the bishops of Bithynia calls them "domini venerabiles."

The truth seems to be that whenever any one, cleric or layman, addressing a bishop, wished to be particularly respectful, he said "dominus" not otherwise.

By the early part of the 6th century it had become, in some parts of the church, an official style of those in high position, whether ecclesiastical or civil. The early Frank kings both received it themselves and bestowed it upon others. (Epist. Clodov. Reg. Franc. ad Syn. Aurel. I.) Compare SUPERScription.

III. Kýrios, Dominus, was especially a title of the emperors, both in earlier and later times, before and after the Christian era. Augustus, indeed, forbade by an edict the addressing of himself as Dominus (Suet. Vit. August. c. 53), probably from a prudent political motive; and Tiberius (Suet. Vit. Neron. c. 27) renewed the prohibition. But afterwards the use of the title became very common; and Domitian caused himself to be styled, not only "Dominus" but "Deus" (Suet. Vit. Domit. c. 13). Tertullian (Apolo. c. 34) praises the moderation of Augustus, and explains in what sense he himself employed the word; "dicam plane imperatorem dominum, sed more communi; sed quando non cogor ut Dominum Dei vice dicam. Ceterum liber sum illi; Dominus enim meus unus est, omnipotens Deus aeternus. . . . Qui pater patriae est, quomodo dominus est? Sed et gratius est nomen pietatis quam potestatis: etiam familiae magis patres quam domini vocantur."

Arius and Euzoius, writing to Constantine about A.D. 326, call him "dominus noster." The bishops of the Council of Rimini (A.D. 359) address Constantius as "domine, amabilis Deo Imperator."

IV. Lord (dominus) appears to be sometimes used during this period in the sense of "saint." (Epist. Cabilon. Conc. ad Theod.) [S. J. E.]

V. Liturgical use. The word Kýrios is applied both to the first Person of the Holy Trinity, as in St. James, c. 26 (Daniel, Codear. iv. 105), where God the Creator is invoked as Kýrie ó Θεός; to the second, as in St. James, c. 5, where He is addressed as ó Kýrios καὶ Θεός ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός; and to the Holy Trinity itself, as in St. James, c. 10, where Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to whom the hymn is sent up, are addressed as Kýrie ó Θεός ἡμῶν. Δεσπότης is similarly used; in St. James, c. 21, for instance, we find it Δέσποτα ó Θεός ó παντοκράτωρ, ó Πατήρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ σου, where God the Father is addressed; in St. James, c. 3, the Son is addressed as Δέσποτα Kýrie Ἰησοῦ Χριστέ. In Latin, the word Dominus is used as an appellation both of the Father to whom the prayer is addressed, and of the Son through whom it is offered.

In most Western rites the reader, when about to recite a lection, says "Jube, domine, benedicere." It has been doubted whether this is addressed to God or to the priest. It probably, however, as archdeacon Freeman (Divine Service, i. 113) has pointed out, is a request to the priest that he would desire a blessing, and might be rendered, "Sir, desire God to bless us" (compare Leslie's Portiforium Sarisb. p. 5, and note, p. lii.). The corresponding Greek form is simply εὐλόγησον δέσποτα, as (e.g.) in the Byzantine liturgy (Daniel, iv. 327, 329, etc.), where the δεσπότης is clearly the priest. It is noteworthy, that in the East the priest responded to the request by blessing God (εὐλόγητος ó Θεός), in the West by blessing himself and the congregation. See on this point the Regula Benedicti Commentata, note on c. 9, in Migne, Patrol. vol. lvi. p. 272. [C.]

LORD'S DAY. (ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα, Dominicus or Dominica dies.) The origin of the name is undoubtedly to be found in the well-known passage (Rev. i. 10), ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ. Even if that passage stood alone, it would be difficult to accept either of the rival interpretations, one of which refers the name to the Sabbath, and the other to the "Day of the Lord." But taking into consideration the remarkable catena of patristic usage which, from Ignatius downwards, establishes the regular and technical use of ἡ κυριακή for the "first day of the week," it is not too much to say that these interpretations may be dismissed as unworthy of serious attention. The same usage, moreover (especially in connection with the history of the Paschal controversy), seems effectually to dispose of a third interpretation, which understands by the τῇ κυριακῇ the annual festival of the Resurrection, or Easter day. (On these points see Dr. Hessey's article "Lord's Day" in Smith's DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.) We accept, therefore, unhesitatingly the traditional interpretation which sees in this passage of St. John a reference to the weekly Lord's day, as a well-known and established festival in the apostolic church. The more common scriptural designation of that day is the ἡ μία ἢ μία σαββάτω (Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; John xxi. 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) In one passage, Mark xvi. 9 (the disputed passage at the close of the Gospel), we have πρώτη σαββάτου or σαββάταν. The use of the ἡ κυριακή by St. John marks transition to the common post-apostolic usage. In one well-known passage in the (so-called) Epistle of Barnabas (c. xvi.), for a reason suggested by the context, we find the day, in contrast with the Jewish sabbath, called the ὀγδοὴ ἡμέρα, an expression taken up and amplified into the ὀγδοὴ ἡμέρα ἡ καὶ πρώτη of subsequent Fathers. At a later period, when the hebdomadal division of the time began to prevail in the Roman empire, we find Christian writers designating the day by its heathen name (the ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρα of Justin Martyr). And from the time of the celebrated edict of Constantine, which speaks of the "venerabilis Solis dies," the two names were much interchanged, Christian writers sometimes using (though less frequently than we do) the name "Sunday," and on the other hand the Christian designation making its way into the statute book, as in the edict of Gratian, A.D. 386 ("Solis die, quem Dominicum ritè dixere majores"). [WEEK.]

(I.) Turning from the name to the thing, it seems impossible to doubt that from the earliest existence of the church the Lord's day was observed as the characteristic Christian festival, hallowed as a commemoration of that Resurrection of the Lord, which was the leading subject in the earliest forms of Christian preaching. To this primary consecration of the day was added a second, in the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, which in that year fell on the first day of the week. The passage in the Epistle of Barnabas referred to (διδὼ καὶ ἄγομεν τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ὀγδοὴν εἰς εὐφροσύνην, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνέστη ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν καὶ φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς) seems even to indicate the notion that it was the day of the Ascension also. We may naturally ask, How could a day so hallowed fail of reverent festal observance? We trace indications of such observance, brief indeed, but unmistakable, in Holy Scripture itself (see Dr. Hessey's article in his Bampton Lectures); and these are still further illustrated by the testimony of early writers.

But the undoubted fact of this observance by no means involves the inference often drawn from it, that the keeping of the Lord's day must be traced to an apostolic decree, transferring to it, directly or by implication, the sanctity of the Sabbath, which was familiar to the early Christians, as being themselves Jews, or having been converted under Jewish influence. It is almost needless to say that of such a decree we have no evidence whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Church History. Now in regard to Holy Scripture, it would, indeed, be most unsafe to allege its silence as conclusive against the existence of such a decree; although that silence must to some degree tell against it, especially when we consider the many references in the Pastoral Epistles to details of church order and practical religious life. But we are not left here to negative evidence. There are positive indications of an absolute freedom of dealing with such subjects, quite incompatible not merely with the existence of a formal apostolic decree, but even with the idea that the observance of the Lord's day had yet attained to the supreme and unique sanctity accorded to it in later ages.

St. Paul's treatment of the general question of the observation of days in Rom. xiv. 5 (ὃς μὲν κρίνει ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν, ὃς δὲ κρίνει πᾶσαν ἡμέραν ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοῷ πληροφορεῖσθω), and his unqualified condemnation of the "observing of days" in Gal. iv. 10—to say nothing of the tone of his celebrated reference to the abolition of the sabbath in Col. ii. 16—appear decisive on this point. Granting that the especial reference of the apostle was in all cases to the Jewish festivals, it is instructive to compare with his sweeping treatment of the subject the apologetic comments on these very passages, made by patristic writers, at a time when the Lord's day and other Christian festivals had established themselves in definite observance. See, for example, St. Jerome's twofold attempt to answer ("simpliciter" and "acutius respondere") the objection, "Dicat aliquis; Si dies observare non licet . . . nos quoque simile crimen incurramus, quartam sabbati observantes et Parasceven et diem Dominicam" (Comm. in Gal. lib. ii. ad c. iv. 10). If we pass from Holy Scripture to the writers of the early church, the fact of utter silence on this subject becomes more and more significant, when we remember their natural anxiety to appeal on all points to apostolic authority, their constant declaration or assumption that all Jewish observances had passed away, and their delight in tracing in these transitory observances types of the higher Christian ordinances, which were not to pass away. Hence we must, indeed, fully agree with those who urge that the celebration of the Lord's day is one of these essential and principal elements of the religious life of the church, which can plead apostolical authority. A priori we should hold it all but impossible that the day should have been neglected among the followers of Him who "was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." From the indications in holy Scripture, which have been so often commented upon, we cannot doubt that it was so regularly hallowed, as to make its observance, both to Christian and heathen, a distinctive mark of Christianity. But the notion that the Lord's day, in that completeness of sacred distinction from all other days which is now universal among all Christians, was formally established by apostolic decree is probably, in relation to historical truth, much what the old legend of the composition of the Apostles' Creed is to the actual process of its formation. In both cases what are chief treasures of our later Christianity grew up by the natural fitness of things and were never formally made. It is obvious that the true view of their genesis detracts nothing from their sacredness, nothing from their claim to be of the essence of the Christian system.

The history of the celebrated Paschal controversy is singularly instructive on this very point. If the Lord's day had been already stamped by definite apostolic decree as the one great Christian festival, deriving its sacredness from the resurrection of the Lord, it would have been impossible for the churches of Palestine and Asia to dream of keeping the annual commemoration of the resurrection itself on any day, except the Lord's day. But the gradual acceptance of the Roman view, disregarding all Jewish associations in consideration of the greater fitness of the Lord's day^a is exactly that which we might expect to result from such a process of gradual establishment of the Lord's day, as has been described above.

(II.) It is likely that in this case, as in so many others, the close of the apostolic age was a period of rapid development of formal church ordinance. The existence in A.D. 170 of a regular treatise on the subject by Melito, bishop of Sardis (see Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 26), connected apparently with the Paschal controversy, seems plainly indicative of such a development. The well-known passage of Justin Martyr in his Apology, describes how "on the day called Sunday" there was a religious assembly of those who dwelt either in the cities or in the country. It notes the chief points of an established service—viz. the reading of the Apostles or the prophets, the sermon, the prayers, the partaking of the bread and wine consecrated by thanksgiving and prayers, and the giving of alms, containing the germ of the clearly ancient liturgies. Nor is it possible to doubt that this celebration had become so marked as to impress the mind of the heathen with the distinctive character of the status dies of Pliny's famous letter to Trajan. In the passage from Dionysius of Corinth (A.D. 175), quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), the keeping of the Lord's day is spoken of as a matter of course (τὴν σήμερον κυριακὴν τὴν ἁγίαν ἡμέραν διηγάγομεν), very much as we might speak now. And in the method of its observance (the celebration of the Holy Communion being, of course, excepted) much was probably borrowed from the practice of the synagogue on the sabbath day. But it must not be supposed for a moment that such observance was identified in any degree with sabbatical observance, or based on formal obligation of the fourth commandment. On the contrary, the principle of its observance is exactly that which is indicated in the celebrated passage of Ignatius (ad Magn. ix.), μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν^b ζῶντες, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν ἀνέειλεν δι' αὐτοῦ. To "sabbatize" is the mark of the Jew; the Christian is to live κατὰ κυριακὴν, i.e. not only in the observance of the Lord's day, but according to the spirit of that day, as something wholly diverse from the conception of the sabbath. The very types of the observance of the Lord's day, often fanciful enough, which were traced in the Old Testament, mark an entire separation in thought from the idea of the sabbath. In the Epistle of Barnabas (c. xvi.) for instance, the sabbath is a type of the millennium after the six thousand years typified in the six days of creation; the Lord's day, as the eighth day, is the beginning of another world (ἄλλου κόσμου ἀρχή).^c Justin Martyr, when he describes the special celebration of public service of the "day called Sunday" derives its sacredness, first, from its being the first day on which God, dispelling darkness and chaos, made the world, next, from the resurrection on it of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is in his Apology, addressed to the heathen (Apol. i. 67). Where he argues with the Jews, he actually makes the eighth day of the circumcision a type of our receiving the true circumcision of the heart through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead on the first day of the week, which after the completion of the cycle of the days is the eighth day, though it is still the first (Dial. with Trypho, sect. 19).^d This conception, fanciful as it is, is taken up more than once by later writers. Thus St. Augustine asks of circumcision, "Quare ergo octavo die? Quia in hebdomadibus idem primus qui octavus . . . Finitur septimus, Dominus sepultus: reditur ad primum, Dominus resuscitatus. Domini enim resuscitatio promisit nobis aeternum diem, et consecravit nobis Dominicum diem" (Serm. de Script. cclix. 1170 c). Hence our Lord Himself, as being the rest of the just, giving them a σαββατισμός in the millennial kingdom, is occasionally called the Great Sabbath, of which the "little sabbath" of the Jews is but a type. The idea is perhaps suggested by Col. ii. 10, where the sabbath and the other Jewish festivals are "the shadow of things to come, but the body" (or substance) "is of Christ." And His rest in the tomb marked what was technically known as the Μέγα σάββατον, the last of the ancient sabbaths; His rising from the dead on the Lord's day began the new Christian era. The notion afterwards embodied in the title of the "Christian sabbath"—that the Lord's day is a spiritualized sabbath, to which the obligation of the fourth commandment is transferred, perhaps a revival of a patriarchal sabbath of all mankind, which had been for a time overborne by the rigid legalism of the Mosaic sabbath—has no locus standi whatever either in Scripture or in primitive antiquity.

But it should be noticed that the development of the Lord's day in relation to the sabbath would naturally differ considerably in Jewish and Gentile Christianity. To the Jewish Christians, in the earliest stages of the history of the church, the sabbath and the sabbatical rest would remain unaltered. Just as they united the "being with one accord in the temple" with the "breaking of the bread at home," so the cele-

^a In the treatise of Bede, de Aequinoctio Vernali, there is a curious account of a council of Caesarea, held under Theophilus, on the Paschal controversy. In the course of it (see Labbe, Concilia, i. 714) the bishops are represented as declaring the Benedictions of the Lord's day. (a) Because on it the light was created. (b) Because on it the people passed to freedom through the Red Sea. (c) Because on it the manna was given. (d) Because Moses (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 7, 8) commanded to keep "the first and the last day" (hoc est dominicus et sabbatum). (e) Because in Ps. cxviii. the words are spoken of it: "This is the day which the Lord hath made." (f) Because the Lord on it rose from the dead. The historical value of the account is of course more than questionable. But the light which it throws on the traditional ideas of the Lord's day is very interesting.

^b The ζῶντες found here in the ordinary text is probably to be omitted, as in the Latin. If it be read it must be taken with ζῶντες.

^c Compare St. Aug. Serm. de Tempore, cclix. 2 (vol. v. p. 1548 A Ben. ed. 1838): "Octavus dies in fine saeculi novam vitam significat: septimus quietem futuram sanctorum in hac terrâ." The sermon was preached on the first Sunday after Easter (the octave), and begins—"Hodiernus dies magno sacramento perpetuae felicitatis est nobis."

^d Even in the eight saved in the ark for a new world he finds a type of the eighth day, on which Christ, the head of a new humanity, arose from the dead. (Dial. with Trypho, c. 138.)

bration of the new Lord's day would present itself to them as something co-existing with the sabbath, incapable of being confounded with it.^e The idea of Christian worship would attach mainly to the one; the obligation of rest would continue attached to the other; although a certain interchange of characteristics would grow up, as worship necessitated rest, and rest naturally suggested worship. Under these circumstances the two days would be regarded as festivals, perhaps at first almost co-ordinate; afterwards the dignity of the Lord's day must have continually increased, and that of the sabbath as continually decreased. Even after Jewish Christianity, as such, had passed away, the effect of this original attitude of mind might easily remain. To it may probably be traced the well-known continuance of the sabbath as a festival in the Eastern church (with the sole exception of the great sabbath of Easter Eve). Even the tradition that Marcion kept the sabbath as a fast, because it was the festival of the God of the Jews, to whom he refused all homage, perhaps illustrates, by its spirit of antagonism, the connexion of the festal observation of the sabbath with the old Jewish influence upon the church. The quasi co-ordination of the Lord's day with the sabbath in the 'Apostolical Constitutions' brings it out in its most striking form. [On this subject see SABBATH.] But it concerns our present purpose chiefly to remark that this preservation of the ancient sabbath in the church must have acted as a constant witness against any tendency to "sabbatize" the Lord's day.

Among purely Gentile Christians it would be far otherwise. To them, except for its sacred historic associations, the sabbath would have no existence. The attempt to "exercise dominion over them in respect of the sabbath day" was one of the Judaizing usurpations which St. Paul bade them repel. Hence to them the Lord's day would be the one sole weekly festival. The sabbath appeared simply as the eve of the Lord's day; even for that reason it might naturally be kept as a fast, according to the general though not universal custom of the Western church; and, wherever strong anti-Judaic feeling developed itself, it would incline men to adopt the same practice out of sheer antagonism. But for this very reason, paradoxical as the statement may seem, the tendency to sabbatize the Lord's day would be far stronger than under the other condition of things. The study of the Old Testament, and especially the recognition of the decalogue as the code of divine morality, must have suggested that the weekly celebration of a hallowed day of rest was a moral duty, concerning all mankind as such, to be regarded, indeed, as a privilege, but yet, if necessary, to be enforced on the disobedient as a law. Where could such a day be found but in the Lord's day? Round that day would gather naturally and insensibly all the ideas which once attached to the sabbath. It would be felt that such a transference of idea could only take place mutatis mutandis. Such distinctions would be made between the characteristic principles of Jewish and Christian observance as we find in St. Jerome on Gal. iv. 10, asserting the greater elasticity and spirituality of the Christian system. But these would not prevent a certain tendency to sabbatize the day, from which the very preservation of the ancient sabbath would guard the churches, in which Jewish influence had been strong.

In this process of development the difference in character and tone between Eastern and Western Christianity is remarkably shewn. The Greek mind, as represented by the Alexandrian school, inclined more to theoretical principle; the Latin mind, as in the school of Carthage, to practical rule. Clement of Alexandria, for instance, urges that to the true Gnostic every day is a holy day, and when he alludes to the Lord's day he deals with its observance (just as with the fasts of the Wednesday and Friday) transcendently (Κυριακὴν ἐκείνην τὴν ἡμέραν ποιεῖ, ὅταν ἀποβάλλῃ φαῦλον νόημα καὶ γνωστικὴν προσλάβῃ, τὴν ἐν αὐτῷ τοῦ Κυρίου ἀνάστασιν δοξάζων, Strom. vii. 12). At the same time his implicit opposition of the Lord's day to the sabbath, as of the positive to the negative, is notable, as unconsciously preparing for the "spiritual Sabbath" of the future. He speaks of the seventh day as being a rest only in the sense of an abstinence from evil, but it is said to introduce the first day, which is our "real rest," and the true birthday of light (ἐβδόμη τοῦτον ἡμέρα ἀνάπαυσις κηρύττεται ἀποχὴ κακῶν, ἐτοιμάζουσα τὴν ἀρχιγονοῦν ἡμέραν τὴν τῷ ὄντι ἀνάπαυσιν ἡμῶν τὴν δὴ καὶ πρώτην τῷ ὄντι φωτὸς γένεσιν, Strom. vi. 16). His idea is to contrast the whole of the lower system of the law with the higher light of the gospel. But the passage, as it seems to suggest the representation of the one by the sabbath, and the other by the Lord's day, might lead naturally to the conception of some substitution of the one day for the other. Exactly in the same spirit Origen, in defending the Christians against Celsus, quotes the dictum: ἐορτὴ οὐδὲν ἐστὶν ἢ τὰ δέοντα πράττειν, and urges that the true Christian is always keeping Lord's days; and referring to Gal. iv. 10, apologises (much as St. Jerome does) for the setting apart of the "Lord's days and the Fridays, Easter and the Pentecost," as a necessary discipline for the less perfect. But he, like Clement, contrasts the Lord's day with the sabbath, as superior to it in nature, when in mystical commentary on Exod. xvi. 4, 5, he finds a foreshadowing of its superiority, in the gift on that day of the manna withheld on the sabbath. He makes the manna symbolic of the bread of heaven, the Word of God, unceasingly showered down on the Lord's day, and interprets "in the evening ye shall know that I am the Lord," of the rolling away of the stone and the earthquake at the close of the great sabbath on the eve of the first Lord's day (see vol. ii. p. 154, Bened. ed. 1733). And again, on John i. 6, in a curious mystical interpretation of the names of Zacharias, Elizabeth, and John, he describes the end of the old dispensation as the σαββατισμοῦ κορωνίς, and declares that from it we cannot derive τὴν μετὰ τὸ σάββατον ἀνάπαυσιν, the gift of which is connected with conformity, as to the death, so to the resurrection of Christ (see vol. iv. p. 86). Even in these writers we see a spiritual gravitation towards a virtual substitution of the Lord's day for the sabbath, not prevented by the assertion of the same superiority over it which the gospel manifests over the law. If we turn to Tertullian, the same conception of substitution presents itself in a more concrete form. He is anti-Judaic enough; the sabbaths and all the ceremonials of the law are, in his eyes, absolutely gone; they were but preparatory, and cannot continue when their function is completed. But in pleading against frequenting idolatrous festivals he makes the keeping of the Lord's day and the Pentecost the badge of Christianity, contrasting them with the heathen festivals on one side, and the sabbaths and "feriae aliquando a Deo dilectae" on the other. In speaking of the habit of standing in prayer on the Lord's day, he urges that on that day we should cast off all worldly anxieties, "differentes etiam negotia ne quem diabolus locum demus" (de Oratione, c. 23). The rest enjoined is, no doubt, simply a means, not an end; but it is notable as the first direct recognition of a sacred rest, as inseparable from the idea of the Lord's day. In a time like Tertullian's, when the church system was fully, even rigidly, organised, it is not difficult to trace here a preparation for some sabbatarianism hereafter.

In fact, two lines of thought must have co-existed in the church. On the one side there was the conviction, not only that the Jewish sabbath had passed away, but that the spirit of strict legal observance, especially in any negative aspect, was foreign to the whole spirit of the gospel. On the other side, there was the tendency to more regular and formal Christian observance, gathering naturally round the recurring weekly festival of the resurrection; and allied with this, the perception of the value of an ordinance of weekly rest, such as that ordained in the fourth commandment, to man as man. From this, by a natural transition, would grow up the disposition to set up the Lord's day, first for religious worship and then for rest, in some rivalry to the ancient sabbath, as being, indeed, superior in dignity and spirituality, but yet a supreme and unique festival, to be observed with equal strictness. These last lines of thought might enter sometimes into alliance, sometimes into conflict. Each would in turn emerge into prominence, and the conception of the Lord's day would fluctuate accordingly.

(III.) But with the beginning of the conversion of the empire a crisis came. The most important epoch in the history of the Lord's day is marked by the issue of the celebrated edict of Constantine: "Omnes iudices urbanaeque plebes et cunctarum artium officia venerabili die Solis quiescant. Ruri tamen positi agrorum culturae liberè licenterque inserviant, quoniam frequenter evenit ut non aptius alio die frumenta sulcis aut vineae scriptionibus mandentur, ne occasione momenti pereat commoditas coelesti provisione concessa" (see Cod. Just. book iii. tit. 12, 3). This edict was clearly intended to pay honour to the great Christian festival, although, in accordance with Constantine's general policy, it declined to identify the emperor with the religion, which he desired only indirectly to support, and only gradually to establish. The use of the heathen name of the "solis dies," with the vague title "venerabilis"—a title rendered the more ambiguous by the known reverence which Constantine had delighted to pay to the Sun-god—was probably something more than conventional. But the effect of the edict, at a time when Christianity was rising as rapidly as heathenism was sinking into decay, must undoubtedly have told mainly on the Christian festival. It would invest the observance of the Lord's day with all the strength (and the weakness) which the sanction of civil law to religious observance must necessarily produce. But more particularly by the prominence given to the idea of rest from ordinary work, which was emphasised all the more by the exemption granted to agricultural labour on the plea of necessity, it introduced a new conception of the day itself. The advocates of the sabbatarian view in later times were not wholly wrong when they compared Constantine to Moses, on the ground that he instituted a kind of new sabbath in the Christian church. For whatever tendency there was already existing to sabbatize the Lord's day would be enormously increased by this interference of the temporal power. The idea of rest would become primary instead of subsidiary; the observance would have more of the law, less of the spirit.

The tendency towards sabbatarianism was evidently slow, for it had the old and well-established conception of the day to overcome. But, although slow, it appears to have been sure.

The edict itself was only the beginning of a long series of imperial laws, constantly increasing in stringency and in unambiguous connexion of the solis dies with Christianity. Eusebius (de Vit. Const. iv. 18, 19, 20) declares that Constantine himself went much farther in this course, as his adhesion to Christianity became more decided. He speaks of two edicts to the army, enjoining rest from arms on that day and celebration of religious worship, by the Christians in the church service, by the pagans in the fields, offering to the supreme Deity a prayer authorised by the emperor. This prayer he quotes. It is a prayer in which nothing occurs distinctively Christian, but which is essentially monotheistic and entirely unconnected with the pagan mythology. In speaking of the ordinance for the Christians, Eusebius calls the day the Σωτήριος ἡμέρα ἣν καὶ φωτὸς εἶναι καὶ ἁλίου ἐπ' ὀνόματι συμβαίνει: in reference to the heathen, simply ἡ τοῦ φωτὸς ἡμέρα. He then adds, διὰ τοῖς ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμῶν ἀρχὴν πολιτευομένοις ἅπασιν σχολὴν ἔχειν ταῖς ἐπ' ὀνόματι τοῦ Σωτῆρος ἡμέραις ἐνούθετε. ὁμοίως δὲ τὴν πρὸ τοῦ σαββάτου τιμὰν μνήμης.

† In another law of Constantine, A.D. 321, there is a recognition of the fitness of certain exceptional legal operations for this day: "gratum et iucundum est, eo die quae sunt maximè votiva compleri, atque idè emancipandi et manumittendi die festo cuncto licentiam habeant" (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 1). This appears to have been borrowed from older practice as to heathen festivals. But it is not improbable that in this case there was a special reference to the characteristic idea of the Lord's day, as the day of the completion of our redemption.

ἐνεκά μοι δοκεῖν τῶν ἐν ταύταις τῇ κοινῇ Σωτῇρι πεπραχθαι μνημονευομένων. This passage extends the statement to the civil population, and adds the celebration of the Friday to that of the Sunday. It is true that these edicts of Constantine are not found in the codes, and that Eusebius is anxious to make the most of the Christianity of the subject of his panegyric. But it is incredible that he should have been either misinformed or insincere in the main substance of his statements; and it would have been quite accordant with Constantine's temporising policy to issue such commands, as special edicts, not to be enrolled among formal laws. However this may be, under Constantine's successors there were reiterated enactments in this direction, free from the ambiguity of the original law.

Thus we have two laws prohibiting exaction of debt on that day, one under Valentinian and Valens (A.D. 368), protecting Christians against being forced into litigation on that day, the "dies solis, qui dudum faustus habetur" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 1); the other under Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 386), extending this immunity to all, calling the day plainly the "dies solis quem Dominicum ritè dixere majores," and branding any infringer of the law as "non modo notabilis, verum etiam sacrilegus" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 2). The progress marked by the contrast of these two laws is significant. The former, recognising the Christians as a sect, is exactly of the same nature as a law of Honorius and Theodosius in 409, protecting the Jews from being forced to work or litigation on the sabbath or other of their sacred days (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 3). The latter accepts Christianity as the religion of the empire, and enforces on all by law the sacredness of its chief festival.

Again, the celebration of the day was gradually separated by law from all heathen and even secular associations. In 389, under Theodosius, the "solis dies" and the "Sancti Paschae dies" (the weeks before and after Easter) are included with the harvest and vintage seasons, the Kalends of January, and the days of the foundation of Rome and Constantinople, as forensic holidays (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 2). In 386 it was ordered that no one should present to the people any spectacle on the "dies solis," "ne divinam venerationem confectâ solemnitate confundat" (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 2). In 425, under Theodosius the younger, we find a law enacting an entire abstinence from all amusements of the theatre or the circus, on the "Dies Dominicus," Christmas day, Epiphany, Easter, and the Pentecost, in order that the whole minds of Christians may be devoted to worship of God. It denounces any infringement of the law by "the infatuated impiety of the Jews or the stolid error and madness of heathenism," and orders the celebration even of the emperor's birthday to be set aside for the sake of the Christian holy day (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 5). The same law is reiterated in even stronger terms under Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 469), in reference to the Lord's day, which is to be kept absolutely sacred, not only from business, but also from "obscene pleasures" of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre (Cod. Just. lib. iii. tit. xii. 11). Nor should we pass over a remarkable law of Honorius and Theodosius (A.D.

409), which expressly orders that on the Lord's day the judges shall have prisoners brought before them, to inquire whether they have been treated humanely, to see that food is given to the destitute, and that the prisoners be allowed, under guard, to go to the bath. The bishops were to put the judges in mind of this duty (Cod. Just. i. tit. iv. 9). It may be noted that at a later period (A.D. 529) under Justinian, the bishops were ordered to visit the prisoners on Wednesdays or Fridays (the Lord's day being probably thought to be too much occupied), to inquire into the cases of the prisoners, and to see whether any neglect of duty on the part of the magistrates had taken place (Cod. Just. tit. iv. 22). But the fifth council of Orleans, twenty years later (A.D. 549), orders the arch-deacon or provost (praepositus ecclesiae) to make the visitation on the Lord's day itself, with a view to the relief of necessitous prisoners (see Labbe, Councils, vol. ix. p. 134). It should be observed that these laws recognise the positive duty of works of charity on the Lord's day, precisely as He Himself had recognised it on the sabbath.

This long series of temporal enactments (in considering which we have, for the sake of exhibiting them as a whole, anticipated chronological order) must have told very powerfully upon the conception of the Lord's day in the church itself, not only tending to formalize its celebration, but to invest it in great degree with the character of a sabbath. Still, however, there was no connexion of its observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment, and therefore no application to it either of the laws of the Jewish sabbath, or of our Lord's teaching on the subject, as modifying and spiritualizing these laws.

But when the legal enforcement of rest on the Lord's day was once established, the next step would not unnaturally follow. In fact, the conception of it, as formally sanctioned by a divine law, would recommend itself to different schools of thought. It would be a refuge to any who scrupled to accept in respect of Christian festivals the authority of a merely temporal power, not yet absolutely identified with Christianity. It would appear to earnest-minded men as a short and ready way of maintaining a high spirituality of tone, in the face of the conventional and insincere observance to which the imperial interference would probably give rise. It would afford to the courtly satellites of the emperor an opportunity of flattering his desire of being "a bishop as to things and men without," by representing him as being the restorer of a half-forgotten divine law. From various causes it would make its way; and, if once admitted, its simplicity and cogency would help it to supersede other pleas for the sacredness of the day.

(IV.) This effect is not at first visible in the great leaders of ecclesiastical opinion and faith. In them we find the same general line of thought which has already been described. It will be sufficient to quote a few leading examples from the East and West. St. Athanasius delights to trace signs of honour done prophetically to the Lord's day, the resurrection day of the Lord (ἀναστάσιμος ἡμέρα), as in the title of the sixth Psalm, "Upon the eighth" (which, however, seems to have no reference to the eighth day at all) or in the celebrated passage of Ps. cxviii. 24, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," which he connects with the "stone made the head of the corner" (see v. 22). In the treatise "de Sabbato et Circumcisione" (which is ascribed to him, and questioned by the Benedictine editors somewhat hesitatingly), there is a curious passage, comparing the sabbath and the Lord's day. His idea is that the first creation had its end, and therefore its sabbatical rest; the second or new creation has no end, and "therefore God rested not in it, but worketh hitherto" (ἐὼς ἄρτι ἐργάζεται), referring, of course, to John iv. 17. Accordingly (he says) "we keep no sabbath day (οὐδὲ σαββατίζομεν ἡμέραν), but we look forward to the sabbath of sabbaths" in heaven, which "the new creation does not accept as its end, but its manifestation and perpetual festival." But he adds, "as God commanded men formerly to keep the sabbath day as a memorial of the end of the older dispensation, so we keep the Lord's day as a memorial of the beginning of the second new creation" (οὕτως τὴν Κυριακὴν τιμῶμεν μνήμην οὖσαν ἀρχῆς δευτέρας ἀνακτίσεως). (See vol. iii. pp. 42, 43, 44, Bened. ed.) On the subject of circumcision, he repeats the old symbolism of the eighth day, as signifying the Lord's day; and adds significantly, ἡ ὀγδόη τὸ σάββατον ἔλυσεν καὶ οὐ τὸ σάββατον τὴν ὀγδόην. But though in all this there is some suggestion of future ideas, there is still no view of the Lord's day as a sabbath. The passage in the Homily de Semente (falsely ascribed to him), in which we find the words, "The Lord changed the sabbath day into the Lord's day" (μετέθηκε δὲ ὁ Κύριος τὴν τοῦ σαββάτου ἡμέραν εἰς Κυριακὴν) speaks obviously in this the language of later times; and is as absolutely at variance with the tone of his teaching on this subject as with his general style and line of thought.

This same idea is still more fully and strikingly worked out by Epiphanius. He calls the sabbath of the Jews the "little sabbath," and, referring to the disciples' supposed breach of the sabbath in the corn-fields, he says that it signified the relaxation of the bond of this little sabbath, because "Christ, the great Sabbath was come," of whom Noah was a type and Lamech's words (Gen. v. 29) a prophecy; who is the great sabbath, first, because He gives us rest from our sins, and next, because the Father and the Holy Spirit have rested in Him (ἀναπέπνυται ἐν αὐτῷ), and in Him all saints found rest" (adv. Haer. lib. i. tom. ii. p. 32). He refers, indeed, to the Lord's day, as of apostolic celebration, but in this he joins with it the Wednesday and Friday (adv. Haer. lib. i. tom. ii. pp. 23, 24); and mentions the occasional festal observance of the sabbath, and Marcion's deliberate protest against this by keeping it as a fast. From him alone we should hardly gather even what we know to have been true of the gradual emergence of the Lord's day into an unique observance, both as to worship and as to rest.

In connexion with this period it may be well to glance at the remarkable treatment of this subject in the "Apostolical Constitutions" which [see APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS] must be referred to about the fourth and fifth centuries. These exemplify in the clearest way the statement above made, that the preservation of the observance of the old sabbath tended to give clearness and certainty to the true idea of the Lord's day. In Book ii. c. 59, 2, we find the sabbath and "the day of the resurrection, the Lord's day" joined in an exhortation to special religious assemblies, which, however, goes on to dwell especially on the Lord's day, as that to which "the reading of the prophets, and the proclamation of the gospel, and the offering of sacrifice and the gift of spiritual food" peculiarly belong. In Book v. c. 18, 19, we have a vivid description of the fast of the "Great Sabbath," "when the bridegroom was taken away," and of the vigil of the Easter day, ending in the "offering of the sacrifice." Otherwise the general command is to keep both the sabbath and the Lord's day as feasts, the one in memory of the work of the Creator, the other of the resurrection (see Book vii. c. 23, 2). In a prayer of thanksgiving given in Book vii. c. 36, there is a remarkable passage on the sabbath and the Lord's day, which tells how the "sabbath is the rest from creation, the completion of the world, the seeking of God's laws, the praise of thanksgiving to God for all that He has given us. But rising above all these ideas, the Lord's day manifests to us the Mediator Himself, the guardian and lawgiver of men, the source of resurrection, the firstborn before all creation, God the Word, man born of the Virgin Mary, . . . who died and rose again; and so commands us to offer to God the highest of all thanksgiving." In Book viii. 33, 1, we find a command given in the names of St. Peter and St. Paul, "Let servants work five days, on the sabbath and the Lord's day let them rest, with a view to instruction in godliness in the church." This command introduces a series of commands to rest on holy days. It is notable, as looking like an apostolic extension of the enactment of the fourth commandment. But when the decalogue is expounded, we find that commandment explained thus, "Thou shalt keep a sabbath, on account of Him who ceased from creation but not from providence, a sabbath not of idleness of hands, but of meditation on his laws" (ii. 361). There is no idea of its transference for a Christian to the observance of the Lord's day.

In St. Chrysostom there is perhaps the first indication of the idea that the sabbath was so far of perpetual obligation, that the one day in seven should always be set apart. In his 10th Homily on Genesis, c. 1, we find him declaring that "God from the beginning teaches us figuratively, instructing us to set aside one day (or 'the first day') in the cycle of the week, and to devote it to work in spiritual things; for it was for this reason that God hallowed the seventh day" (ἤδη ἐντέθειν ἐκ προομιῶν αἰνιγματώδως διδασκαλίαν ἡμῖν ὁ Θεὸς παρέχεται, παιδεύων τὴν μίαν ἡμέραν ἐν τῷ κύκλῳ τῆς ἐβδομάδος ἅπασαν ἀνατιθέναι καὶ ἀφορίζειν τῇ τῶν πνευματικῶν ἐργασίᾳ, διὰ γὰρ τοῦτο ὁ δεσπότης, κ.τ.λ.) (See Bened. ed. vol. iv. p. 80.) This treatment, however, of the subject is but slightly indicated, and it exists side by side with teaching of a more ancient type. Thus the sabbath is to him also the type of eternal rest in heaven (Comm. on Heb. iii. 8, vol. xii. p. 63). In his 39th Homily on St. Matthew, he speaks of the formal sabbath as a condescension to the hardness of the hearts of the Jews, and urges that we should always keep festival by abstaining from evil, and "be idle with a spiritual idleness" (ἀργῶμεν ἀργίαν πνευματικὴν), by keeping our hands from recklessness (vol. vii. p. 435). Still it is significant; it appears to indicate a transition towards the later idea of connecting the fourth commandment directly with the observance of the Lord's day. The circumstances of his time, and the evils with which he had to grapple, may have suggested this short and easy way of maintaining the sanctity of the great Christian festival.

We turn to the West, and take as specimens of church opinion, the three whom Milman has called the great organizers of Latin Christianity.

St. Ambrose (on Ps. xlii.) holds, like St. Athanasius, that the Lord's day is "the day which the Lord hath made," of Ps. cxviii.; of all the days on which God works mighty works, it has the leadership (praerogativa), because illuminated by the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. In his commentary on Ps. xlviii. we observe a marked instance of the tendency to supersede the sabbath by the Lord's day. The Psalm is to be sung "Secundā Sabbati." What (he asks) is this but "the Lord's day, which followed the sabbath?" He clearly means that it followed it in old times, not only in order, but in dignity; for he goes on to speak of the "eighth day, at once the eighth and the first," as "sanctified by the resurrection," and now accordingly having "ex numeri ordine praerogativam, et ex Resurrectione Domini Sanctitatem." He actually interprets the σαββατον δευτερόπρωτον as signifying that "the sabbath, which was once first, now begins to be but the second after the first;" and lastly, he uses the phrase "Prima requies cessavit, secunda successit," connecting with this the declaration of the "sabbath keeping for the people of God" (in Heb. iv. 8, 9). Similarly commenting on the passage "Vespere Sabbati, quae lucescit in primam Sabbati," he remarks, "Before the resurrection the Evangelist spoke of the sabbath; after the resurrection he called it the first day of the week." It is true that he speaks of the "rest in Christ" as the true and "great sabbath," in the same sense as Epiphanius (de Obitu Theod., vol. ii. 1206 B, Bened. ed. 1690). But, while he would have doubtless repudiated the idea that the Lord's day was the "Christian sabbath," his words certainly prepare for it.

St. Jerome's treatment of the subject is markedly characteristic. He (adv. Jovin. ii. 25) deals with the six days of work as representing this life, the seventh the "true and eternal sabbath," in which we shall be free. In the passage already referred to (in Galat. lib. II. vol. vii. p. 456, Bened. ed.) he lays it down that, strictly speaking, all days are equal to a Christian, "nec per Parasceven tantum crucifigi Christum et die Dominicā resurgere, sed semper sanctam resurrectionis esse diem et semper eum carne vesi Dominicā," and he goes on to contrast the strict limitation of the Jews to certain days with the freedom of the Christian to fast, to pray, to celebrate a Lord's day by receiving the Body of the Lord, at all times. On Ezek. xx. 10, 11, he has a curious passage, declaring the sabbath and circumcision to have been given as signs, "ut sciamus nos perfecto et aeterno sabbato requiescendum a saeculi operibus." "Unde in sex diebus operantes septimo die requiescimus, ut nihil aliud die ac nocte faciamus, nisi omne quod vivimus, debere Domino noverimus, et redeunte hebdomade totos nos nomini ejus consecremus." While he bears constant testimony to the solemn observation of the Lord's day by religious worship, it is truly remarked by Dr. Hessey (Bampton Lectures, Lect. III.) that he describes the Egyptian coenobitae, as after church making garments for themselves or others, and tells the story of his visits to the tombs of the apostles and martyrs, not as religious ceremonies, but as seemly recreations. Throughout, both as to theory and practice, his view of the Lord's day is highly spiritual, with no tendency whatever to legal or sabbatical observance.

The same remark applies to the teaching of St. Augustine, who constantly refers to the question of the sabbath, and not unfrequently to the Lord's day. He expresses himself with singular clearness against any continuance of sabbatical obligation. In his De Genesi ad Litteram (Book iv., Opp. vol. iii. 208) he expressly says that in the time of full revelation of grace, that method of observance of the sabbath, which was symbolized by the rest of a single day, was taken away from the observance of the faithful (observatio illa sabbati, quae unius diei vacatione figurabatur, ablata est ab observatione fidelium). Similarly in his Epistle to Januarius (Ep. lv. vol. ii. 203) he expressly distinguishes the fourth (or, as he calls it, the third commandment, connecting it mystically with the third Person of the Holy Trinity), as one to be observed figuratively, from all the others, which are to be observed literally. In both passages he urges on the faithful a perpetual sabbath, partly of rest from the "old works," partly of working whatever good they work with a view to the eternal sabbath of heaven. The Lord's day (he adds) was declared not to the Jews but to the Christians by the resurrection of the Lord, and from that time only began to have its festal character. There was indeed a mystical signification of the eighth day (octavi Sacramentum) under the law, which he traces fancifully enough, but it was reserved and concealed, and the sabbath alone given for celebration. Exactly in the same way he declares against the Manicheans (contra Adimantum, sect. 2, 16, and contra Faustum, book vi. vol. viii. 209, 240, 343), that the literal or carnal observance of the sabbath is abolished, while its spiritual significance remains, in the acceptance of the invitation, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." His principle is formally enunciated thus, "Apostolicam interpretationem spiritualiter teneo; Carnalem Servitutis observationem libertate contemno." In his treatise de Spiritu et Littera, sect. xiv. (vol. x. 328) he takes it so absolutely for granted that the observance of the sabbath according to the letter is carnal, that he thinks it necessary to plead that the principle, "the letter killeth," applies not only to the fourth commandment, but to the other nine. The sabbath day, he says elsewhere (on Ps. cl. vol. iv. 2411), signifies rest, the Lord's day, resurrection. The two ideas are in his view contrasted, as the old and new covenants are contrasted. Such is his genuine teaching. There is, indeed, a passage in one of the Homilies de Tempore (Hom. 251), attributed to him, but unhesitatingly rejected by the Benedictine editors, and assigned by them to the 9th century, in which he is made to say that "the doctors of the church decreed to transfer all the glory of the Jewish sabbath-keeping to the Lord's day, so that what they celebrated in figure, we might celebrate in reality" (see vol. v. p. 3101). But this is in direct opposition to St. Augustine's general teaching; it clearly breathes the spirit of a later time, and shews traces of a well-known passage of Alcuin.

(V.) In these leading representatives of Christian thought, we find, therefore, not only a preservation of the older and truer ideas, but, generally speaking, a care (possibly prophetic) to enforce the spirituality of the Lord's day more carefully than ever. It is rather in the enactments of councils, embodying the common opinion of the church at large, that we trace the changes of conception which have been described above.

The great Council of Nicaea, taking the Lord's day and its observance for granted, merely directs that on the Lord's day and within the Pentecost, all shall pray standing (Canon 20). Subsequent councils, however, of the 4th, 5th and 6th centuries legislate frequently on the subject.

The first class of enactments is directed to the enforcement of ritual and devotional observances. Thus absence from the church on their Lord's days is made a ground for excommunication; fasting on the Lord's day is denounced as savouring of Manicheism; the refusal to join the prayers and receive the Holy Eucharist, and the practice of leaving the church during preaching, are censured and punished; all frequenting of the games or the circus on the Lord's day is strictly forbidden (see Hessey's Bampton Lectures, Lect. III.). These enactments have no special significance as to the conception of the day. They simply take for granted its religious celebration after the primitive fashion; their existence only indicates that this celebration was becoming more and more a matter of legal regulation and enforcement.

There is, however, another class of enactments intended to secure and guard a quasi-sabbatical rest. To this the well-known canon of Laodicea (A.D. 363) seems certainly to belong. (See Labbe, Concilia, vol. ii. pp. 564, 565.) It declares that Christians "are not to Judaize and rest on the sabbath day, but to work on that day, and preferring the Lord's day in honour, on it, if possible, to rest as Christians (τὴν δὲ κυριακὴν προτιμῶντες, εἴγε δύναιντο, σχολάζειν ὡς Χριστιανοί). Obviously there is a marked distinction intended between the Jewish and Christian idea of rest; but still the result is to transfer a sabbatical rest to the Lord's day, and so to make it a kind of spiritualized and Christianized sabbath. This step being once taken, its necessary consequences follow, accumulating regulations of prohibition or injunction, until the original distinction is obscured or lost. The councils, in fact, were placed between tendencies to extreme observance and to extreme neglect. Thus at the third Council of Orleans (A.D. 538), we see that a certain public opinion had been growing up (persuasum est populi) that on the Lord's day no horse or ox or carriage should be used, no food prepared, nothing done for the cleanliness of the house or person. This the council wisely desires to check, and protests that such minute regulations "savour rather of Jewish than Christian observance" (ad Judaicam magis quam ad Christianam observantiam pertinere). It is accordingly laid down, somewhat vaguely, that the freedom hitherto used on the Lord's day should be preserved (quod antea fieri licuit, liceat). But in the very same canon abstinence from rural work in general is not only advised, in order that men may have leisure for church-going and prayer, but, in case of neglect, enforced by ecclesiastical censure (see Labbe, vol. ix. p. 10). On the other hand, the second Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) declares itself driven to legislation, because "the people rashly profane the Lord's day, and as on ordinary days (privatis diebus) devote themselves to unceasing work." Accordingly the first canon pleads eloquently for the observation of the Lord's day, "which has given us the new birth and freedom from all our sins" (quae nos denuo peperit et a peccatis omnibus liberavit); on it "being made free from sin and become servants to righteousness, let us show the service which is perfect freedom" (liberam servitutem exhibeamus). "The day is the day of perpetual rest, which is suggested to us by the type of the seventh day in the law and the prophets." Hence it is urged that men should abstain from litigation and pleading, and should not even allow themselves on plea of necessity to yoke their oxen. Their whole soul is to be absorbed in hymns and praises; their eyes and hands raised all day to God. Not that there is value in bodily rest (corporali abstinencia), but in an obedience by which earthly actions may be set aside, and the soul raised to heaven. All this is spiritual exhortation; but it is significantly added that disobedience will be punished primarily by God, secondarily "by the implacable anger of the priest;" pleaders shall be non-suited, peasants or slaves severely scourged, clerks or monks suspended for six months from communion with their fellows. (See Labbe, ix. 947.) It will be observed that in this canon there is a vague reference to the seventh day's rest, laid down in the fourth commandment, as foreshadowing the Lord's day. But this is a tentative step anticipatory of the future. Every enactment of quasi-sabbatical rest prepared for a sabbatarian theory; but it was far from being as yet established.

This is clear, if we turn to the writings of Gregory the Great, the foremost man of his day in character as in office, and the unconscious founder of the future papal power. He obviously followed St. Augustine in his view of the Lord's day and its significance, and in some of his references to Old Testament types of its sacredness^h (see Hom. in Ezek. ii. 4). In a celebrated letter to the Romans (Epist. xiii. 1), written in reference to some introduction of strict rest on the sabbath, he declares that it is Antichrist, who "at his coming shall cause the sabbath day, and the Lord's day to be kept from all work"—in the one case, he adds, for the sake of Judaizing, in the other, because he himself shall pretend to die, and to rise again. In regard to the sabbath, which is his chief subject, he lays down the broad principle that the laws of the old covenant were but typical, and in the light of Christ's coming can be kept only in spirit. "Our true sabbath is the Lord Jesus Christ Himself." He then protests against a prohibition of the bath on the Lord's day (evidently on sabbatarian grounds), in a tone which would apply to many other such ordinances. He is content to lay it down that on the Lord's day we are to cease from all earthly work, and to devote ourselves altogether to prayer (atque omni modo orationibus insistendum), in order that any spiritual neglect in the six days may be atoned for on the day of the resurrection. It would have been impossible for him so to have written, had the idea of the transference of the obligation of the fourth commandment to the Lord's day attained to anything like general acceptance.

There is a curious passage in a letter of Gregory to St. Augustine of Canterbury (considered to be of doubtful authenticity) which deals with fasting, and, referring apparently to Sundays in Lent, draws a singularly unpleasant picture of Sunday festivities. "De ipsa vero die Dominica hæsitamus quidnam dicendum sit, cum omnes laici et saeculares illa die plus solito caeteris diebus accuratius cibos carniū appetant, et nisi nova quadam aviditate usque ad mediam noctem se ingurgitent, non aliter se hujus sacri temporis observationem suscipere putant; . . . unde nec a tali consuetudine averti possunt, et ideo cum venia suo ingenio relinquendi sunt, ne forte peiores existant si a tali consuetudine prohibeantur" (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 54; Greg. Opp. ii. 1302, in App. ad Epist. xiii., from Gratian, Dist. iv. can. 6). It is possible that this practice indicates a reaction against the sabbatarianism referred to in Gregory's letter. Curiously enough, it exactly corresponds to those excessive sabbath festivities with which the Fathers of the 5th century reproach the Jews.

Meanwhile the current of opinion and legislation still continues to set in the sabbatarian direction. Legends of miraculous judgment on those who work on the Lord's day become rife. In the Life of St. Germanus of Auxerre (written by Venantius Fortunatus in the 6th century) we are told how the hand of a man at Essone, working on the Lord's day, and of a girl at Melun, spinning on the same day, were suddenly contracted (ita contrahitur digitus ut unguium acumen partem transiret in alteram), and how both were miraculously healed by St. Germanus (cc. 14, 16; Migne, Patrologie, lxxii. 61). As time goes on, such portents become more numerous and more striking; the hand which chops wood cleaves to the hatchet, or is withered; a cake made on the Lord's day streams with blood; a mill-wheel set in motion refuses to turn (see Heylin, On the Sabbath, part ii. c. v. 3, and Hessey's Bampton Lectures, lect. iii. n. 261).

Naturally the decrees of councils and the commands of secular authority follow in the same course. Thus in England, in the 7th and 8th centuries, the laws of Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 690), lay it down that "If a 'theowman' work on Sunday by his lord's command, let him be free, and let the lord pay xxx shillings as 'wite' [fine]. But if the 'theow' work without his knowledge, let him suffer in his hide, or in 'hide-gild' [ransom]. But if a freeman work on that day without his lord's command, let him forfeit his freedom, or sixty shillings; and let a priest be liable to twice as much." (See Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 215.) A law of about the same date makes the observation of the eve of Sunday, as well as the Sunday itself. "If an 'esne' do any servile labour, contrary to his lord's command, from sunset on Sunday eve till sunset on Monday eve [i.e. sunset on Saturday to sunset on Sunday], let him make a 'bote' of lxxx shillings to his lord. If an 'esne' do so of his own accord on that day, let him make a 'bote' of vid. to his lord, or his hide" (Laws of Wiltred, K. of Kent, A.D. 696, ll. 9 and 10, in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 235).

In the Council of Clovesho (A.D. 747) it is ordered that all abbots and presbyters shall remain in their monasteries and churches on the Lord's day, abstaining from all business and from all travelling, except on inevitable necessity. But the object is stated to be that the Lord's day may be wholly dedicated to the worship of God, and that they may be ready to teach and to minister. Of the laity it is only said that on the Lord's day and other great festivals the people shall be invited by the priests to assemble in church for the hearing of the word and the celebration of the mass. (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 367.) About the same time we find a "Judicium Clementis" (supposed to be Willebrord, A.D. 693), indicating a still greater extent of sabbatarian rigour. "If on the Lord's day any one by negligence works or bathes or washes his head, let him do penance seven days; if he repeats the offence, forty days; if he does so contumaciously (si per dampnationem facit hoc die) and refuses to amend, let him be expelled from the Catholic church like a Jew." (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 226.)

(VI.) Still, however, it will be observed that even now no connexion of the Lord's day with the fourth commandment is avowed; and the process of sabbatarianism is therefore not complete. There is some reason to think that in this, as in some other ecclesiastical matters, we are to look to the time of Charlemagne for the final step. So late, indeed, as A.D. 797, a celebrated decree of Theodulf of Orleans (Capitula, n. 24; see Labbe, Councils, vol. xiii. p. 999), which was apparently observed beyond the limits of his diocese, speaking of the Lord's day, preserves the old teaching as to the grounds of its consecration, and deals with its observance freely and spiritually: "Diei vero Dominici, quia in eo Deus lucem condidit, in eo manna in eremo pluit, in eo Redemptor humani generis sponte pro salute nostra a mortuis resurrexit, in eo Spiritum Sanctum super discipulos infudit, tanta esse debet observantia, ut præter orationes, et missarum solemnias, et ea quæ ad vescendum pertinent, nihil aliud fiat. Nam et si necessitas fuerit navigandi, sive itinerandi, licentia datur, ita duntaxat, ut horum occasione missa et orationes non prætermittantur. Conveniendum est sabbato die cum lu-minaribus cuilibet Christiano ad ecclesiam, conveniendum est ad vigilias sive ad matutinum officium. Concurrentum est etiam cum obligationibus ad missarum solemnias. Et dum ad ecclesiam convenitur nulla causa dici debet vel audiri, nulla jurgia sunt habenda: sed tantummodo Deo vacandum est, in celebratione videlicet sacrorum officiorum, et exhibitione elemosynarum, et in Dei laudibus cum amicis, proximis, et peregrinis spiritualiter epulandum."

But Alcuin, Charlemagne's great ecclesiastical adviser, speaking of the Jewish observation of the sabbath, says expressly, "cujus observationem mos Christianus ad diem Dominicum competentius transtulit" (Homil. xviii. post Pentec. quoted by Heylin). It is true that this is said to have been done by custom; there is no word of scriptural authority, or even of any institution of the apostles. But still this passage seems to enunciate for the first time the idea of "the Christian sabbath."¹ And its meaning is illustrated by the laws of the time. A law attributed to Clotaire lays it down that no one should work on the Lord's day, "quia hoc lex prohibet, et Sacra Scriptura in omnibus contradicit." Under Pepin (A.D. 791) a council at Friuli had strictly enforced the observance of the day, with some special restrictions apparently taken from the observance of the sabbath. But Charlemagne opens an imperial edict on the subject with the express words, "statuimus secundum quod et in lege Dominus praecepit," and proceeds to minute prohibitions against various kinds of work and to injunctions for attendance at divine service. (See Heylin, part ii. c. v.)

It is notable that not long after an edict appears at Constantinople by the emperor Leo Philosophus (A.D. 884) for the observance of the Lord's day, referring to the old edict of Constantine as too lax in its exemptions, and declaring absolute rest for labour, as "decreed by the Holy Spirit and the apostles taught of Him" (quod Spiritui Sancto ab ipsoque institutus apostolis placuit), arguing that "if the Jews honoured their sabbath, which was but a shadow of ours, how much more should we honour the day which the Lord hath honoured, and on it delivered us from dishonour and death!" (Constit. 54, see Heylin, part ii. c. v.). We note here that it is on apostolic authority that the sanctity of the Lord's day is based, although at the same time the Jewish sabbath is looked upon as the shadow of the Christian. The period is, in fact, one of transition. That the sabbatical authority of the Lord's day was not held in theory is clear, from the fact that the general teaching of the schoolmen follows the express declaration of Aquinas that "the observance of the Lord's day in the new law supersedes the observance of the sabbath, not by obligation of the (divine) law, but by the ordinance of the church and the custom of Christian people" (non ex vi legis sed ex constitutione ecclesiae et consuetudine populi Christiani), or as it is elsewhere expressed, "non de jure divino, sed de jure humano canonico." But the "custom of Christian people," when once directed in the line of quasi-sabbatical observance, would be apt to ground itself naturally on the divine law, which such observance seemed to suggest, and to which reference is certainly made in the decrees already quoted.

It lies beyond the limits of this article to trace the steady and excessive development of festal observance in the mediaeval church, the tendency to place other holy days on nearly the same level as the Lord's day, and to guard all alike by quasi-sabbatarian regulations of an elaborate and burdensome nature. Nor can we do more than allude to the twofold protest made against this at the Reformation. On the Continent generally, it tended to reject all holy days, and treat the Lord's day itself as a matter of simple church ordinance, which any church at its will might alter; in England, Scotland, and Holland, it singled out the Lord's day, placing it on a scriptural basis, as the Christian sabbath, ordained in the fourth commandment, and surrounded it too often with a more than Judaic rigour.

The conclusions, to which within the historical limits assigned to this article we must come, may be thus briefly recapitulated.

(a) The Lord's day must be regarded as a festival, coeval with the existence of Christianity itself—growing up naturally from the apostles' time, gradually assuming the character of the one distinctively Christian festival, and drawing to itself, as by an irresistible gravitation, the periodical rest, which is enjoined in the fourth commandment on grounds applicable to man as man, and which was provided for under the Mosaic law by the special observance of the sabbath.

(b) The idea of the Lord's day is wholly distinct from that of the sabbath, never for a moment confused with it in the early church, in which, indeed, the observance of the sabbath long survived, sometimes as a festival, sometimes as a fast. Wherever rest is associated with it, such rest is invariably regarded as entirely secondary, as simply a means to a higher end. Accordingly the original regulation of observances connected with the Lord's day is positive and not negative, and directed by principle rather than by formal rule.

(c) The tendency to sabbatize the Lord's day is due chiefly to the necessities of legal enforcement—first, as exemplified in the series of imperial laws, then in the decrees of councils, generally backed by the secular power—dealing inevitably in prohibition more than in injunction, and so tending to emphasize negative instead of positive observance. For such enactments the law of the Old Testament "mutatis mutandis" became naturally a model, and the step was an easy one, from regarding it as a model to taking it as an authority.

(d) The direct connexion, however, of such observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment can claim no scriptural and no high ecclesiastical authority. Either the observance of that commandment is expressly declared to be figurative (consisting of rest from sin, rest enjoyed in Christ, and rest foreseen in heaven), or careful distinction is made between the moral obligation of religious observance in general, and the positive obligation, now passed away, to keep the sabbath in particular. The notion of connecting it with the keeping of the Lord's day grows up in the first instance through the natural supersession of the sabbath by the Lord's day in the Christian church, and the temptation to transfer to the latter the positive divine sanction of the former; and, once introduced, maintains itself by the very fact of presenting a strong and intelligible plea against any degradation of the high Christian festival.

On this subject the following works may be consulted with advantage: Heylin's History of the Sabbath, part ii., full of learning, though defective in arrangement and criticism; Bingham's Antiquities, book xx. c. ii., containing much valuable matter, though needing some correction; Dr. Hessey's Bampton Lectures on Sunday, presenting the literature of the subject accurately and popularly; Probst, Kirchliche Disciplin der Drei ersten Jahrhunderte (pt. iii. c. i. art. 1) discuss the principal passages bearing on the question found in the writers of the first three centuries; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part i. c. 4. In all there is much common material, derived from the obvious source of information on this subject—the writings of the Fathers, the edicts of the Imperial Codes, the canons of councils, and the mediaeval laws so often based upon them. The distinction is chiefly in the inferences drawn from these historical materials. [A. B.]

LORD'S DAY (LITURGICAL). The observance of Sunday began after None on Saturday, "ut dies Dominica a vespere usque in vespem servetur" (Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 794), and the reason is given by Durandus (Rat. v. 9, 2): "Quia vespertina synaxis seu hora primum est officium diei sequentis." The Sunday office was longer and more solemnly observed than that of other days. The number of psalms and lessons, and the number of nocturns at the night office was increased. The Gregorian distribution of the Psalter gives eighteen psalms and nine lessons in three nocturns, instead of twelve psalms and three lessons in one nocturn: and the Benedictine twelve psalms, and three canticles, with twelve lessons in three nocturns instead of twelve psalms and three lessons, in two nocturns on week days. Te Deum was said at the end of Matins, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter.

The nocturnal office and that of Lauds were to be said (Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 9) with modulation tractim, which word is explained as lenta ac morosa modulatione. Incense was offered (oblatum) at each nocturn, and the high altar censured at Benedictus at Lauds. The solemn benediction of the holy water "salis et aque," a custom which is considered to have been introduced by pope Leo IV. A.D. 847–855, took place before mass; with which ceremony a procession was in many places joined. At the mass Gloria in excelsis was said except during Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter Eve; and the creed was said at the mass and at Prime in the Sunday office throughout the year. The reserved Eucharist was renewed. Many other distinctions between the Dominical office, and that for week days, might be pointed out. Those already enumerated are among the most conspicuous.

In the Ambrosian use the Dominical office differs from the Ferial in several points, of which the following are the most prominent. No psalms are said at matins, but in their place three canticles, one in each nocturn.

In Nocturn II. The Cantic of Hannah, 1 Reg. II. Confirmatum est.

In Nocturn III. The Cantic of Jonah, cap. 1. Clamavi; or, during the winter: i.e. from the first Sunday in October till Easter, the Cantic of Habakkuk, cap. ii. Domine audivi.

Each of these canticles has its proper antiphon, and is followed by the usual form. V. Benedictus es, Deus. R. Amen.

After the third cantic three lessons are read, each with its response. These are not, as on week days, taken from scripture, but from a Homily on the Gospel of the day, and correspond therefore to the lessons in the third nocturn of the Roman Breviary. These are followed, except during Advent and Lent, by Te Deum, which is not said in the ferial office, and if Lauds are said separately, the office ends with a collect, and the customary form. V. Benedicamus Domino. R. Deo Gratias.

At Lauds after Benedictus, which begins the office both in the Dominical and the Ferial office,^a follow, each preceded by its oratio secreta, and with its proper antiphon, the cantic of Moses (Exod. xv.) Cantemus Domino and Benedicite. In the place of these, on week days other than Saturday, Ps. l. (li.) Miserere is said, and on Saturday, Ps. cxvii. (cxviii.) Confitemini.

At the other hours there are certain differences in the disposition and number of the collects and antiphons, by whatever names they are called, but, as the general character of the office is unaltered, it is not necessary to enter minutely into them. Certain greater festivals, called Solemnitates Domini, have the office nearly identical with that of the Sunday.

In the Mozarabic rite the daily office differs throughout so much for the ordinary Western type that it is not easy to point out clearly in a few words the variations between that of Sunday and other days. The most conspicuous variation is at the beginning of matins, which on Sunday (after the opening) begin with the hymn Aeternae rerum conditor, followed by its oratio, and the three Psalms; iii. Domine quid, l. (li.) Miserere, lvi. (lvii.) Miserere mei, each with its antiphon and oratio, while on week days the corresponding portion of the office is an antiphon called matutinarium, and Ps. l. (li.) Miserere,^b with its antiphon and oratio. Sundays were of different degrees. The classification varied at different times, and in different churches, but the general Western division was into Greater Sundays: Dominicae majores v. solemnes v. privilegiatae: and

^a Except on Sundays in Advent, when the Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.), Attende Coelum, is said. On Christmas Day both are said.

^b This is the direction given in the Regula printed at the head of the Breviary. In the body of the Breviary the Psalm appointed for a week-day varies among the three Sunday psalms; and the matutinarium occurs later in the office, in the course of Lauds. The Mozarabic ritual directions are sometimes difficult to reconcile.

into Ordinary Sundays: Dominicae communes, v. per annum. Martene, de Ant. Mon. rit. iv. § 4, from the statutes of Lanfranc, says, "Quinque dies Dominici sunt, qui communia quaedam inter se habent separata a caeteris diebus Dominicis, Dominica vid. prima de Adventu Domini, Dominica primae Septuagesimae, Dominica prima Quadragesimae, Dominica in medio Quadragesimae, Dominica in Palmis." He then proceeds to specify certain ritual peculiarities of those days mainly relating to the dress of the clergy, and the performance of the office in choir.^c In this classification Easter day and Pentecost have already been reckoned among the "quinque praecipuae festivitates."

Another classification given by Durandus [vii. 1-4] defines Dominicae principales v. solemnes to be those "in quibus officia mutantur," of which he reckons five. Dominica prima de Adventu, Dominica in Octavis Pascha, Dominica in Octavis Pentecostes, Dominica qua cantatur Laetare Hierusalem [sc. Midlent Sunday] et Dominica in Ramis Palmarum; Easter and Pentecost being as before otherwise accounted for. To these the first Sunday in Lent was afterwards added, "quia fit officii in ea mutatio."

The later Roman arrangement, which is still in force, subdivides the greater Sundays, Dominicae majores, into two classes: (1) Sundays of the first class, Dominicae primae classis, viz. the first Sunday in Advent, the first Sunday in Lent, Passion Sunday, Palm Sunday, Easter day, Low Sunday, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday; and (2) Sundays of the second class, Dominicae secundae classis, viz. the second, third, and fourth Sunday of Advent, Septuagesima and the two following Sundays, and the second, third and fourth Sundays in Lent. The other Sundays in the year are ordinary Sundays, Dominicae per annum.

The Ambrosian rule classifies Sundays according to their office, as follows:—Easter day, Pentecost and Trinity Sunday are reckoned among the Solemnitates Domini, the highest class of festivals. The other Sundays are divided into two classes—(1) those which have a proper office, and (2) those which have the ordinary Sunday office.

Those which have a proper office—officium proprium—are the Sundays in Advent, those in Lent, and the Sunday after the Nativity.

The Sundays between Easter and Pentecost have the Paschal office—Paschale officium—which has certain ritual peculiarities, and the Sundays from the Epiphany to the beginning of Lent have a mixed office, officium partim proprium, partim commune.

The Sundays from the second after Pentecost to Advent have the ordinary office (officium commune).

The classification of Sundays in the Greek calendar is not so minute. Easter day stands in a class by itself, at the head of all the festivals of the year; and Palm Sunday and Whitsunday are reckoned among the Twelve,^d which rank next in importance.

^c Among other points it is directed that the refectory tables be covered with clean cloths (festivae mappae; sint et quotidianae, lotae tamen), and clean towels provided (manutergia candida et honesta).

^d Otherwise called δεσποτικά v. κυριακά εορτά. They

Many Sundays were (and are still) often designated by the first word of the introit of the Roman mass. Thus the first five Sundays in Lent are often known by the names, Invocabit,^e Reminisce, Oculi, Laetare, Judica; and the four Sundays following Easter as Quasimodo, Misericordia Domini, Jubilare, Cantate. Some again are customarily known by some peculiarity in the celebration. Thus the Sunday next before Easter^f is known as Palm Sunday and Dominica palmarum v. in ramis palmarum, from the Benediction of the palm branches, and the subsequent procession which takes place on that day after terce and before mass; and the Sunday after Easter as Dominica in albis, or more fully in albis depositis, as it is called in the Ambrosian missal; ^g from its being the day after the Saturday on which those who had been baptized on Easter eve laid aside their white garments; or sometimes as Clausum^h Paschae, from its being the conclusion of the Paschal celebration, and the second and following Sundays after Easter were sometimes called *Dominica*ⁱ and ⁱⁱ and post albas, or post clausum Paschae.

Other less familiar designations for particular Sundays which are found, are Dominica carnevale, de carne levario v. de carne levanda, which would be Quinquagesima Sunday where Lent began on the following Wednesday, and the first Sunday in Lent in the Ambrosian ritual, which begins Lent on that day; Dominica in Quadragesima for the first Sunday in Lent, Dominica mediana v. mediante die festo [Miss. Mozar.] for the fourth Sunday in Lent, Dominica Osanna for Palm Sunday, also Pascha floridum from the flowers which were associated with Palm branches in the office for their benediction. Thus in the Mozarabic missal the office is to be said ad benedicendos flores vel ramos, and in the prayer of the office the clause occurs, "Hos quoque ramos et flores palmarum . . . hodie tua benedictione sanctifica." So also in the Ordo Romanus, "Dies palmarum, sive florum atque ramorum dicitur"; also in the Sarum missal the office is called benedictio florum ac frondium, and the phrase creatura florum vel frondium, or equivalent expressions frequently recur in it. In the York missal, too, we find the words "hos palmarum atque florum ramos, etc. . . ." Dominica Rogationum v. D. ante Litánias for the Sunday before Ascension.¹ Many other similar names might be adduced, though several would not fall within our limits of time.

were originally seven in number, and a mystical reason for that number is given from St. Chrysostom. It was afterwards increased to twelve. The list at first contained Easter Day, which afterwards was placed by itself, and has otherwise slightly varied, the number remaining at twelve. The next order of festivals is called ἀποδόκητα, i. e. not of the twelve; but it contains no Sunday.

^e Thus the rubrics of the Missal speak of Feria ii, etc. post Invocabit, etc.

^f So termed in the English Prayer Book.

^g In the Ambrosian rite the days of Easter week are called Feria ii, iii, etc. . . in albis, and those in the week next following Feria ii, iii, etc. . . post albas.

^h This expression must not be confounded with Claves Paschae.

ⁱ It may be noticed that several of these terms have established themselves in familiar use in England, though they nowhere appear in the service books, e. g. Midlent Sunday, Palm Sunday, Rogation Sunday.

The Dominical calendars throughout the year varied in different churches, and deserve a few words.

The Roman Calendar, as in use to the present time, is substantially the same as the early English (and as that now used among ourselves). The chief difference is that in it the Sundays throughout the summer are reckoned "post Pentecosten," instead of post Trinitatem as in the Sarum (and modern English) use; and that there are fewer of them. Thus in the Roman missal there are twenty-four Sundays post Pentecosten, in the English twenty-five post Trinitatem. In the York missal the Sundays were reckoned post octavas Pentecostes.

Allatius (de Dominicis et hebdomadibus Græcorum dissertatio) gives a Calendar "ad usum Breviarii Romani e bibliothecæ Vaticanæ Codice antiquissimo"; which (omitting all that does not relate to Sundays) runs thus:—

Dominica prima de Adventu Domini.
Dominica secunda ante Natale Domini.
Dominica tertia ante Natale Domini.
Dominica prima post Natale Domini.
Dominica prima, etc. post Epiphaniam.

(The Sundays after the Epiphany are reckoned up to Lent, but the names for the last three, Septuagesima, etc. are recognised.)

Dominica in Quadragesima.
Dominica prima mensis primi.
Dominica iii^a, iv^a, v^a, vi^a in Quadragesima.
Dominica Sancta in Pascha.
Dominica Octava Paschæ.
Dominica i^a, ii^a, iii^a post Octavam Paschæ.
Dominica post Ascensum Domini.
Dominica Pentecosten.
Dominica Octava Pentecosten.
Dominica ii^a, etc. Pentecosten.
Dominica post Natale Apostolorum [i. e. SS. Pet. et Pauli. Jun. 29].
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post Octavam Apostolorum.
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post S. Laurentii [Aug. 10].
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post S. Cypriani [Sept. 26].

The last of these Sundays is that next after the festival of St. Andrew, and then follow the three Sundays of Advent.

The Mozarabic Calendar contains six Sundays in Advent. The Sundays after the Epiphany are numbered continuously till the beginning of Lent, omitting the names Septuagesima, etc., the Sunday corresponding to Quinquagesima being known as Dominica ante diem Cinerum v. ante carnes tollendas, after Pentecost are reckoned as the first, second, etc., seventh Sunday after Pentecost. After the seventh no Sunday mass and therefore no Sunday name is given till Advent, except one for "In Dominica ante jejunium Calendarum Novembrium."

The Ambrosian Dominical Calendar, which in its main features is of high antiquity, is as follows:—

Dominica i^a, ii^a, iii^a, iv^a, v^a, vi^a in Adventu.

(These six Sundays are exclusive of and in addition to the Vigil of the Nativity, when it falls on a Sunday.)

Dominica post Nativitatem Domini.
Dominica i^a, ii^a, etc. post Epiphaniam.
Dominica in Septuagesima, in Sexagesima, in Quinquagesima.
Dominica i^a in Quadragesima (the beginning of Lent).

Dominica ii^a in Quadragesima (sometimes called the Sunday of the Samaritan Woman).

Dominica iii^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of Abraham).

The Greek Dominical Calendar differs in many respects. In all Western calendars the ecclesiastical year begins with Advent. The Greek Church has no such season,^k and the year begins with the Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican,^l which corresponds to the Sunday next before Septuagesima. The order of the Sundays is as follows:—

Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican [also called προσφωνήσιμος].^m

Sunday of the Prodigal Son, answering to Septuagesima Sunday.

Sunday of Apocreats [so called because it is the last day on which meat is eaten].

Sunday of Tyrophagus [the last day on which cheese is eaten].

First Sunday of the Fast, or Orthodoxy Sunday, διάταξις τῆς πρώτης κυριακῆς τῶν ἁγίων νηστειῶν, ἧτοι τῆς ὀρθοδοξίας (Typ. Sabæ, cap. xvii.). The celebration under this name is in commemoration of the overthrow of the Iconoclasts.ⁿ

Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth Sundays of the Fast.

Palm Sunday (κυριακὴ τῶν Βαίων).

Pascha (or Bright Sunday, λαμπρὰ κυριακὴ).

Antipascha (or the Sunday of St. Thomas), sometimes New Sunday, καυὴ ἡ νέα κυριακὴ (Theod. Balsamon in Expos. de S. Bas. etc. ad Amphil. de Spir. Sanct.).

Sunday of the Ointment Bearers (τῶν μυροφόρων).

Sunday of the Paralytic.

Sunday of the Samaritan Woman, or Mid Pentecost [μεσοπεντεκοστή].

Sunday of the Blind Man.^o

Sunday of the Three hundred and eighteen [i. e. the Fathers of Nicaea]. Sunday in the Octave of the Ascension.

Pentecost.

All Saints Sunday (Trinity Sunday or First Sunday of Matthew).

^k There is a fast preparatory to the Nativity, called the Fast of the Nativity, which lasts for the forty days before Christmas.

^l This and similar names of Sundays are derived from the subjects of the Gospels for the day.

^m For the reasons given for this name, see Allatius de Dominicis et Hebdomadibus Græcorum, s. viii.

ⁿ There is a long and peculiar office for the day in the Triodion, but it is without our limits of time.

^o The Sundays after Antipascha are variously reckoned as the 2nd, 3rd, etc., or as the 3rd, 4th, etc. Sunday after Pascha

The Sundays from this point are called Sundays of Matthew or of Luke according as the gospels are taken from those Evangelists.^p and so on, up to the Exaltation of the Cross [Sept. 14], the Sunday before which festival is called:—

The Sunday after the Exaltation.

After this the Sundays resume their reckoning from Pentecost, which varies with the years and are called Sundays of Luke, whose gospel is now read.

LORD'S PRAYER (the Liturgical use of the). I. In nearly all ancient liturgies this was said between the consecration of the elements and the communion. The earliest direct witness is Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350; who, after explaining to his competentes, the Sanctus, prayer of consecration, and the intercessions, as they occur in the order of the service, proceeds, "Then, after these things, we say that prayer which the Saviour delivered to His intimate disciples, out of a pure conscience addressing God and saying, Our Father," &c. (Catech. Myst. v. 8). Optatus in Africa (A.D. 368), charging the Donatist bishops, who "gave remission of sins as if they had no sin themselves," with a self-contradiction, says, "For at that very time, when ye impose hands and remit offences, soon turning to the altar, ye are obliged to recite the Lord's Prayer, and in fact say, Our Father, which art in heaven, forgive us our debts and sins" (de Schism. Don. ii. 20). Now we know from St. Cyprian (de Lapsis, p. 128; ed. 1690) that in Africa penitents were reconciled after the consecration. St. Augustine, also in Africa (A.D. 397), puts the Lord's Prayer there: "When the hallowing (of the elements) has taken place, we say the Lord's Prayer" (Serm. 227, ad Infantēs, i.e. the newly baptized; see before, vol. i. p. 836). Again, writing in 414, he says that by προσευχὰς in 1 Tim. ii. 1, he understands those Prayers which are said "when that which is on the Lord's table is blessed, and hallowed, and broken for distribution; which whole form of prayer nearly every church concludes with the Lord's Prayer" (ad Paulin. Epist. 149, § 16). Again, to competentes: "When ye are baptized, that prayer is to be said by you daily. For in the church that Lord's Prayer is said daily at the altar of God, and the faithful hear it" (Serm. 58, c. x. § 12; see also de Serm. Dom. ii. vi. § 26; Serm. 17, § 5; 49, 8). St. Jerome must have thought the practice of saying it somewhere in the liturgy universal, for he says in a work written about 415, "So He taught His apostles, that daily in the sacrifice of His body, believers should make bold to speak thus, Our Father," &c. (Dial. contra Pelag. iii. 15.) Germanus of Paris is a witness to the use of France in the middle of the 6th century: "But the Lord's Prayer is put in that same place (i.e. after the consecration and confection) for this reason, that every prayer of ours may be concluded with the Lord's Prayer (Expos. Brev. in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. xii. ii.) In the treatise de Sacramentis, ascribed to St. Ambrose, but probably written in France, near the end of the 8th century (see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 590, 622, 2nd ed.) we read, "I said to you that before the words of Christ, that which is offered is called bread. When the words of Christ have been uttered, it is no longer called bread, but is named the Body. Wherefore then in the Lord's Prayer which follows after that, does he say, 'our bread' (lib. v. c. iv. § 24)?" Leontius of Cyprus relates of his contemporary, John the Almoner, pope of Alexandria, who died in 616, that during the celebration he sent for and exchanged forgiveness with a clerk, who was not in charity, after which "with great joy and gladness, he stood at the holy altar, able to say to God with a clear conscience, forgive us," &c. (Vita Joan. c. 13; Rosweyde, p. 186). St. Augustine (as above) alleges the use of the Lord's Prayer after the consecration in "nearly every church." We find it in that place in every ancient liturgy, except the Clementine (Constit. Apost. viii. 18), in which it does not appear at all, and the Abyssinian (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 521), in which it is said, as in the English, after the communion. In the Nestorian of Malabar it occurs both before and after the communion (Liturg. Mal. Raulin, 324, 327).

When the Greek compiler of the liturgy called after St. Clement of Rome omitted the Lord's Prayer, he was probably guided by the old Greek liturgy of Rome, which we may suppose to have been before him. We know from St. Gregory, writing in 598, that, until he inserted it, the Lord's Prayer was, according to the plain meaning of his words, certainly not said between the consecration and reception, and therefore probably not said at all in the Eucharistic office of his church. He had been blamed for having (among other innovations) "given an order that the Lord's Prayer should be said soon (mox) after the canon" (Epist. viii. 64). His defence was, "We say the Lord's Prayer soon after the prayer (of consecration), because the apostles were wont to consecrate the host of oblation to that very prayer only (ad ipsam solummodo orationem), and it seemed to me very unbecoming to say over the oblation a prayer which some scholastic had put together, and not to say the prayer (traditionem, lege fors. orationem) which our Redeemer composed over His body and blood" (Ibid.). The Lord's Prayer, then, had not been said over the elements either during or after the act of consecration, nor in any place suggested at which it was said. From one of the canons of the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) we should infer that there were some in Spain who did not, even at that time, think it a necessary part of the liturgy: "Some priests are found throughout the Spains, who do not say the Lord's Prayer daily, but only on the Lord's day. . . Whoever therefore of the priests, or of the clerks subject to them, shall fail to say this prayer of the Lord daily, either in a public or private office, let him be deprived of the honour of his order" (can. 10).

II. The statement of Gregory that the apostles consecrated by saying the Lord's Prayer only is probably a mistake; but it is repeated by Amalarius, A.D. 827, and Leo VII. A.D. 936. The first says of the wine on Good Friday, "The apostolic method of consecration is observed, which said the Lord's Prayer only over the Lord's body and blood. Therefore, if it were not prescribed by the Ordo Romanus that the body of the Lord should be reserved from the 5th day of the week to the 6th, its reservation would be unnecessary; because the Lord's Prayer alone would be sufficient for the consecration of the body, as it is for the consecration of the wine and water" (de Eccl. Off. Var. Lect. Hittorp. col. 1445; see also i. 15). After inquiries made at Rome in 831, Amalarius omitted this passage, but not the letter of Gregory, who had been his authority (iv. 26). Micrologus, without citing Gregory, or mentioning the apostles, remarks that the Ordo Romanus commands the priest to consecrate on Good Friday wine not consecrated before with the Lord's prayer and immission of the Lord's body, that the people may be able to communicate fully" (de Eccl. Obs. 19). The Ordo itself ascribes the consecration to the mixture only (Amal. u. s. col. 1445; see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 707, ed. 2). Leo forbade the Lord's Prayer in a grace at meals, "because the holy apostles were wont to say this prayer only in the consecration of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Epist. ii. Labbe, ix. 697).

III. In the ancient liturgies the Lord's Prayer is introduced by a preface. In the Roman and Ambrosian this is not connected with any preceding form, but in the Greek, Oriental, and Ephesine, it is the conclusion of a separate prayer. The Roman preface is as follows, "Oremus. Præceptis salutaribus moniti et divina institutione formati, audemus dicere" (Sacram. Gelas. Murat. i. 697). The Liturgy of Milan uses the same form generally, but on some feasts, as Easter and Christmas (Le Brun, Dissert. iii. 2; Pamel. Liturgicon, i. 304), the following: "Divino magisterio edocti et salutaribus monitis instituti audemus dicere," which is identical with a Gothico-Gallican form (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 297). The original Ambrosian canon, however, was followed by a prayer for the presence of Christ, ending thus, "That we may receive the verity of the Lord's body and blood; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord, saying, Our Father," &c. (Murat. Liturg. Rom. i. 134). The Roman and Milanese prefaces have been given above in Latin, that the reader may compare them with the language of St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, in his treatise on the Lord's Prayer (in init.): "Evangelica præcepta . . . nihil sunt alia quam Magisteria divina . . . Inter sua salutaria monita et præcepta divina . . . etiam orandi ipse formam dedit." Of the title "Our Father," he says, "Quod nomen nemo nostrum in oratione auderet attingere, nisi ipse nobis sic permisisset orare" (compare St. Jerome, as above). It is a probable inference that a preface, or prefaces, resembling those quoted, was used with the Lord's Prayer in the Latin church of Africa in the 3rd century. In the old Gallican missals there is a variable prayer, called Collectio ante Orationem Dominicam, of which the following is a brief example: "We beseech Thee, O God the Father Almighty, in these petitions where-with our Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, hath commanded us to pray, saying, Our Father," &c. (Miss. Goth. Lit. Gall. 190). Some of these "collects" in the Gothico-Gallican missals are exhortations (195, 202, &c.). One (238) is partly addressed to God and partly to the people. The Gallicanum Vetus of Mabillon (p. 346), and the fragment known as the Reichenau missal (Gallican Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, p. 1), have each an example of exhortation. This collect disappears from the missale Francorum (Lit. Gall. 326) and the Besançon sacramentary found at Bobio (Mus. Ital. i. 281), as they had both adopted the Roman canon. We do not know the preamble used by the Franks, as the MS. fails near the end of the canon. The Besançon canon is followed by a Gallican preamble, "Divino magisterio edocti, et divina institutione (formati, Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 228) audemus dicere, Pater," &c. In the Mozarabic missal the formulary before the Lord's Prayer (headed Ad Oracionem Dominicam) is often long. In some instances (Leslie, 20, 63, 85, &c.) it is not verbally connected with the latter. It may be a prayer to the Father (16, 20, 22, &c.) or to the Son (6, 12, 93, &c.), or an address to the people (10, 26, 32, &c.). The following example can hardly be classed under any of these heads: "That which is the way hath He shewn, that we might follow in it; that which is the life hath He taught, that we might speak of it; that which is the truth hath He ordained, that we might hold it. To Thee, Supreme Father, let us from the earth with trembling of heart cry aloud, Our Father," &c. (40).

In the ancient liturgy of Jerusalem, known as St. James, at the close of a long secret prayer, the priest says aloud, "And deign that we, O merciful Lord, may with boldness, uncondemned, with a pure heart, a contrite soul, unabashed face, sanctified lips, dare to call upon Thee, the holy God, the Father in the heavens, and to say, Our," &c. (Trollope, 99). This 'Εκφώνησις appears in abridged forms in the derived liturgies of St. Basil (Goar, 174), St. Chrysostom (80), and the Armenian (Neale's Introd. 622). In St. Mark, the priest concludes his secret prayer thus, "That with the holy disciples and apostles, we may say unto Thee this prayer, Our," &c. (Renaud. i. 159.) Then he says aloud the form above given from St. James, and the people say the Lord's Prayer. In the Syro-Jacobite liturgies there is also a secret prayer, which leads up to the Lord's Prayer thus,—"That we may dare to invoke Thee . . . and pray, and say, Our," &c. (Renaud. ii. 39, 131, &c.). In the Egyptian (Renaud. i. 20, 35, 50, 75, 116) and Nestorian (ii. 595) liturgies, the Lord's Prayer is introduced in a similar manner at the end of the prayer of Fraction.

IV. St. Augustine's expression, "All the faithful hear it" (see above), seems to imply that in Africa the people did not repeat the Lord's Prayer themselves in his time. When Gregory introduced it at Rome, he did not assign it to the congregation. "Among the Greeks, the Lord's Prayer is said by all the people, but among us by the priest alone" (Epist. u. s.). Yet elsewhere in the Latin church they said it. That it was so in France in the 6th century is clear from a story in Gregory of Tours. A dumb woman "on a certain Lord's day stood with the rest of the people. But it came to pass that, when the Lord's Prayer was said, she also opened her mouth and began to sing that holy prayer with the rest" (Mirac. S. Mart. ii. 30). In the Mozarabic Liturgy the people responded "Amen" at the end of the first clause, and the first three petitions: after "Give us this day our daily bread," they responded, "for Thou art God": after the two following petitions, "Amen": and after "Lead us not into temptation," they concluded with "But deliver us from evil" (Leslie, 6). In all the Eastern rites, as in their sources, St. James and St. Mark, this prayer is said by the people. In the Egyptian (Ren. i. 76, 77) and Syro-Jacobite (ii. 40, 131) they begin at "Hallowed be," &c. In the Nestorian, they say it all (Badger, Nestorians, ii. 237; Renaud. ii. 595).

V. St. Augustine more than once alludes to a custom of beating the breast when the words "forgive us our trespasses" were said in the liturgy: "If we are without sin, and we beat our breasts, saying, Forgive, &c., in this very thing at least we sin, even gravely; as no one can doubt; seeing that we lie while the very sacraments are being celebrated" (Serm. 351, 3, § 6. Similarly, Serm. 388, § 2). To what extent this custom prevailed does not appear.

For the form which followed the Lord's Prayer in every ancient liturgy, see EMBOLISMUS.

LORD'S SUPPER (Coena Domini, Coena Dominica, Δείπνον Κυριακόν). I. The primary notion was of the Last Supper of our Lord, at which the eucharist was instituted. That, says Hippolytus, A.D. 220, was the "first table of the mystical supper" (in Prov. ix. 1, Fragm.). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, commenting on 1 Cor. xi. 20, says that St. Paul, by using the words "Lord's Supper," takes his hearers back to that "evening in which the Lord delivered the awful mysteries" (Hom. 27, in Ep. 1, ad Cor. § 2). With this view, he argues, the apostle called τὸ ἄριστον δεῖπνον, that which in practice was taken early in the day by the name commonly given to the meal which was eaten last (ibid.). Somewhat similarly Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520): "The common and peaceable participation of one and the same bread and cup . . . brings (us) to a sacred commemoration of the most divine and archetypal (ἀρχιτυμβόλου) supper" (Eocl. Hierarchy. c. iii. Cont. iii. § 1). Maximus, the commentator on this book, A.D. 660, here explains that "the mystical supper of the Lord is said to be ἀρχισύμβολον, in relation to the divine mysteries now celebrated" (Scholium in loc.). The "Lord's Supper" was, therefore, in the conception of the early ages of the church, in the first instance and emphatically, that supper of which our Lord partook Himself with His disciples the night before His death, and of which the first reception of the holy eucharist was conceived a part.

II. For some length of time the eucharist was celebrated in connexion with a meal taken by the faithful in common, in resemblance of the Last Supper [AGAPE]. It is probable that at first the whole rite, agape and communion, was called the supper, or the Lord's Supper, partly to veil the sacrament from unbelievers, and partly owing to the language of St. Paul in 1 Cor. xi. 20 being so understood. To illustrate this, we may mention that the word agape itself in one passage appears to cover both the meal and the sacrament. "It is not lawful either to baptize or to make an agape apart from the bishop." This is found in the epistle of St. Ignatius to the church at Smyrna (c. 8), one of those mentioned by Eusebius, and the passage itself is cited by Antiochus Monachus, A.D. 614 (Hom. 124; Migne, No. 89, col. 1822). Now when the compiler of the twelve epistles of Ignatius came to this passage, he expanded the words οὐτε ἀγάπην ποιεῖν thus: "Nor to offer, or bring a sacrifice, or celebrate a feast" (δοχήν). See Cureton's Corpus Ignatianum, 109. Tertullian in 198 describes the agape under the name of a supper: "our Supper shews its nature by its name. It is called that which love is among the Greeks" (Apol. 39). At a later period, when the agape was celebrated with the eucharist on one day of the year only, viz., Maundy Thursday, in commemoration of the institution of the sacrament on that day, it was still called the Lord's Supper. E.g. the council of Carthage, A.D. 397, decrees that the "sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting excepting on that one day in every year on which the Lord's Supper is celebrated" (can. 29). Three years later St. Augustine, speaking of the custom of bathing at the end of Lent, says that "for this purpose that day was rather chosen in which the Lord's Supper is yearly celebrated" (Epist. 54, vii. § 10). Again, "We compel no one to break their fast (prandere) before that Lord's Supper, but neither do we dare to forbid any one" (ibid. § 9). In 691 the council of Constantinople (can. i. 29) cites the canon of Carthage, as given above, and abolishes the permission which it left.

III. The eucharist was the chief part of the Lord's Supper, whether that name was applied to the occasion of its institution or to the united observance of the first period after Christ. Hence it was almost inevitable that when the unessential part of that observance was dropped, the name should adhere to the sacrament. Some of the Fathers, indeed, thought, as we shall see, that St. Paul applied it directly to the eucharist in 1 Cor. xi. 20; so that the designation had a double origin. It is necessary to bring many testimonies to the extent of this usage, because it has been rashly denied, in a polemical spirit (by Maldonatus, Suarez, and others), that the sacrament was called the "Lord's Supper," or a "supper," however qualified, in the early church. Our earliest witness is Tertullian, who paraphrasing the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. x. 21, says, "We cannot eat the supper of God and the supper of devils" (de Spect. 13). When Hippolytus, as above, calls the institution "the first table of the mystical supper," he implies that any subsequent celebration may be so called. Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, says that Christ "gives Himself to us in the mystical supper" (Tract. c. Samos. R. ad Qu. 7). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "We are instructed neither to eat and drink an ordinary supper in a church, nor to dishonour the Lord's Supper (by celebrating it) in a house" (Regulae brevis tract. 310). St. Augustine, A.D. 396, expressly says that St. Paul "calls that reception itself of the eucharist the Lord's Supper" (Ep. 54, v. § 7). Again, "He gave the supper to His disciples consecrated by His own hands; but we have not reclined at that feast, and yet we daily eat the same supper by faith" (Serm. 112, iv.) In the regions of the East most do not partake of the Lord's Supper every day" (In Serm. Dom. ii. 7, § 25). Judas "drew near to the Lord's Supper equally" (with the other apostles) (Tract. 50 in St. Joan. Ev. § 10). "He permitted him to partake of the holy supper with the innocent" (Epist. 93, iv. § 15; Sim. Psalm. c. Part. Dom. div. 16; c. Litt. Petil. ii. 23, § 53; 106, § 243; Enarr. ii. in Ps. xxi. (xxii.) § 27). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, he says again, "As oft as ye eat it, ye do shew the Lord's death; and this is that supper" (of which St. Paul speaks) (Hom. xxvii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 5). "As to draw near at random is perilous, so not to partake of those holy mystical suppers is famine and death" (ibid. § 8). "Believe that even now this is that supper at which He Himself reclined" (Hom. 50 in St. Matt. xiv. 34-36). Pelagius, A.D. 405: "The Lord's Supper ought to be common to all, because He delivered the sacrament equally to all His disciples who were present" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. (xi. 20); inter Opp. Hieron. v. ii. 997). Cyril of Alexandria, A.D. 412: "Let us run together to the mystical supper" (Hom. x. tom. v. ii. 371, and commonly). Theodoret, 423: "He (St. Paul) calls the Master's mystery the Lord's Supper" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. xi. 20). St. Nilus, 440: "Keep thyself from all corruption, and be every day partaker of the mystical Supper; for thus the body of Christ begins to be ours" (Paraenetica n. 120). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "On the 5th day (of Holy Week) He gave the mystic supper which absolves all sin" (in Hexameron v.). Gregory of Tours, 573: "The day on which the Lord delivered the mystic Supper to the disciples" (de Glor. Mart. 24). Hesychiuss, 601: "The thanksgiving, that is, the oblation which holds the chief place in the Lord's Supper" (in Levit. p. 146 c.). The sacrament is frequently called by this author the mystical or the divine "Supper" (ibid.). Since the time of Justinian the Second, A.D. 686 (Leo. Allat. de Domin. Graec. xxi.), the choir have sung on Maundy Thursday in the Liturgy of St. Basil, "Make me this day, O Son of God, a partaker of Thy mystic Supper" (Goar, Euchol. 170). The foregoing testimonies appear to give an ample sanction to the usage of the Church of England, and to the statement of the Catechism of Trent, that "the most ancient Fathers, following the authority of the apostle, sometimes called the sacred eucharist also by the name of supper" (P. ii. de Euch. v.).

IV. In the 6th century we first find the name 'Coena Domini' given to Maundy Thursday, but generally then with some addition or explanation.

nation. The earliest example known to the writer occurs in a document of the year 519, "Quinta feria, hoc est, Coena Domini" (Exempl. Sugg. 2ae Germani, inter Epp. Hormisdæ, Labbe, Conc. iv. 1488). Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, uses the phrase "Day of the Lord's Supper" (Hist. Franc. ii. 21), and calls its rites "Dominicae Coenae Festa" (ibid. viii. 43). The first council of Mâcon, 581, "Coena Domini usque ad primum Pascha" (Can. 14). Isidore of Seville, 610, calls it Coena Domini in the heading of a chapter, but explains, as if the usage were not familiar, "This 'Supper of the Lord' is the fifth day of the last week of Lent" (de Eccl. Off. i. 28). The Besançon sacramentary, written later in the 7th century, gives an "Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians to be read on Coena Domini" (Mus. Ital. i. 315). The Gallican Lectionary also gives "Lessons for Coena Domini at Matins" (Liturg. Gallic. 128). In the first Ordo Romanus, probably about A.D. 730, the day is called both Feria quinta Coenae Domini, and Coena Domini (Mus. Ital. ii. 19, 30-33). A law of Carloman, in 742, says, "On Coena Domini let him (the presbyter) always seek fresh chrism from the bishop" (c. iii. in Capit. Reg. Franc. 147). So a law of Charlemagne in 769, col. 192). In 744 a chapter of Pepin ordered "every presbyter always on Coena Domini to give to the bishop a statement of the method and order of his ministry" (c. 4; u. s. i. 158). In the capitularies of the French kings is an order that "the presbyter on Coena Domini take with him two ampullae, one for the chrism, another for the oil to anoint catechumens and the sick" (L. i. c. 156). See other instances (coll. 824, 865, 953, &c.). It is evident that this singular designation of a day had quite established itself by the end of the 8th century. See MAUNDY THURSDAY.

LORD'S TABLE. I. For more than three hundred years after the institution of the sacrament the altar is but once called a table in the genuine remains of Christian writers. The exception occurs in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria (A.D. 254) to Xystus of Rome. He speaks of a communicant as "standing at the Table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 9). The next instance is a full century later, viz. in the commentary of Hilary the deacon, 354: "When he partakes of the table of devils, he outrages the Lord's Table, i.e. the altar" (Comm. in 1 Cor. x. 21). The explanation in the last words implies that the phrase was not common in that sense. The same remark applies to a passage in the Disput. c. Arianos ascribed to Athanasius, but certainly later. The table in Prov. ix. 2 is there understood of "the Table" prepared by Christ, "That is, the holy altar" (c. 17; App. Opp. Athan. iii. 164). The usage was never general in the West, and the examples found in the Greek writers of the 4th and 5th centuries, considering how much they have left, are not really numerous. The following are from every great division of the church:—St. Basil, A.D. 370, says that the orthodox in the district of Gangra "overthrew the altars" of the heretic Basilides and "set up their own Tables" (Epist. 226). Paulinus in Italy, 393: "There is everywhere one cup and one food of the Lord, and one Table and house of God" (Poema 17). Prudentius in Spain, A.D. 405, "calls the altar dedicated to God" poetically, illa sacramenti donatrix Mensa (de Coron. Hymn. 9). St. Augustine in Roman Africa, writing probably in 416: "The sacrament is prepared on the Lord's Table (in Dominica Mensa), and is taken from (de) the Lord's Table" (Tract. 26 in Joan. Ev. § 15). Cyril of Alexandria not many years later speaks of the "holy Table" (adv. Nestor. 4; vii. 116). Socrates, 439, relates of Alexander the bishop of Alexandria that in the distress caused by the apparent triumph of Arius, he "entered the altar-place and prostrated himself on his face beneath the sacred Table" (Hist. Eccl. i. 37). At a later period the name of Mensa was, in the Latin church, generally given to the slab alone, while the whole structure was called an altar. In the east on the other hand, the latter name became unfrequent; the phrases "holy Table" (ἁγία τραπέζα) or "sacred Table" (ιερά τρ.) being used instead. It will be sufficient to refer here to the rubrics of some ancient liturgies. That of St. James has, "When the priest sets the cup on the holy Table" (Trollope, 111). St. Basil, "The holy mysteries being removed from the sacred Table" (Goar, 175); "the setting down of the divine gifts upon the holy Table" (164). St. Chrysostom similarly has both "sacred" (82) and "holy (72, 73, 74, &c.) Table." The Armenian, "holy table" only (Neale's Introd. 562, 594, &c.). The rubrics of SS. Basil and Chrysostom do not employ the word "altar"; but it occurs in those of the earlier St. James (p. 36), St. Mark (Renaud. Liturg. Orient. i. 141) and St. Clement (Constit. Apost. viii. 12), the two latter using no other. We find it also in the Armenian rubrics (394, 432), in those of the Coptic St. Basil (Renaud. i. 4, 5, &c.); the Greek Alexandrian of St. Gregory (ibid. 91), the Ethiopian (500), the Syrian Ordo Communis (with "table of life") (ibid. ii. 42), and the Nestorian (ibid. 566, &c.). "Table" does not occur in the Nestorian rubrics. We cannot ascribe them to the age of Nestorius, but the fact witnesses to the early usage of the churches which became infested with his heresy. They adhered to the tradition of Ignatius and the sub-apostolic period, while the Syro-Jacobites, who separated from the church later, reflect the language of a later age.

II. We have cited a poem of Paulinus, in which he calls the altar "the table of God." That such language was not usual in Italy in his time appears certain from the fact that the same author in a prose composition gives the name of the "Lord's Table" to a table, as it is thought, in the Gazophylacium on which were set the gifts brought for the use of the poor. "Let us not suffer the Lord's Table to be left void for ourselves and empty for the poor" (Serm. 34, § 1); "Thou wilt know how much more profitable it is to put money out to increase on the Lord's Table" (§ 2). Our inference will hold, if Paulinus by the "Lord's Table" means a chest in the treasury, or even if it be a figure for the alms themselves.

III. The phrase "Lord's Table," "mystical Table," &c., are frequently used by ancient writers to denote not the structure (the use of which is, however, implied in them), but the Holy Communion itself. This usage may have arisen from the language of St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 21); it would certainly be fostered by it. For while some, as Hilary the deacon (Comm. in loco, "Mensae Domini, i.e. altari"), understood "the Lord's Table" of the altar, others, as Theodoret (in loc.), supposed the sacramental feast to be intended. Thus the latter paraphrases, "How is it possible for us to have communion with the Lord through His precious body and blood, and with the devils too, through the food that has been offered to idols?" This use of those terms is, however, common without any reference to 1 Cor. x. 21. Thus Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 374: "Reverence the mystic table to which thou hast come; the bread thou hast received, the cup of which thou hast partaken" (Orat. 40, de Baptismo, i. 660). St. Ambrose, 374: "The mystical table is prepared for by fasting. . . That table is attained at the cost of hunger, and that cup . . . is sought by a thirst for the heavenly sacraments" (de Elia, x. § 33). St. Augustine, 396: "Thou hast sat down at a great table (Prov. xxiii. 1) . . . What is that great table, but that from which we receive the body and blood of Christ?" (Serm. 31, § 2; Sim. S. 304, § 1; 329, § 1; 332, § 2; Tract. 47, in St. Joan. Ev. § 3.) On the words "the poor shall eat and be satisfied" (Ps. xxii. 30), "for they have been brought to the table of Christ, and received of His body and blood" (de Gratia, N. T. 27, § 66). Again, after speaking of a "life-giving feast" which Christ gave to His church, "satiating us with His body, inebriating us with His blood," he says, "the church exults, fed and quickened by this table, against them that trouble her" (Serm. 367, § 6). St. Chrysostom, 398: "With a pure conscience touch the sacred table, and partake of the holy sacrifice" (Hom. vi. in Poenit. ii. 326). "On the festivals they come anyhow to this table" (Hom. vi. de Philog. i. 499). St. Hilary, 430: "There is a table of the Lord from which (ex qua) we take food, to wit, of the Living Bread. . . There is also the table of the Lord's lessons, at which we are fed with the meat of spiritual teaching" (Tract. in Ps. 127, § 10). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "Many never trouble themselves about the self-cleansing and repentance with which they come to the sacred table; but with what garments they are adorned" (de Sacra Synaxi; Migne, 120. 89, col. 830). As the lay communicants did not "sit at," "touch," or even "come to" the material table or altar (see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, 361, 702, ed. 2), the foregoing passages cannot be understood of that. There are many, however, which must be understood of it, though from the inappropriate epithets employed, they appear at first sight to speak of the sacrament, e.g., "I am not worthy to look towards this thy sacred and spiritual Table." This occurs in a prayer or preparation said before the priest places himself at the altar in the liturgy of St. James (Trollope, p. 27). [W. E. S.]

LUCAS (1) (St. LUKE), evangelist, commemorated generally on Oct. 18. At Jerusalem, March 15 was set apart to him and to St. James the Apostle; at Aquileia, Sept. 3 was observed for the "ingressio reliquiarum" of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. John; in the city "Piralice," St. Luke's natalis was kept on Sept. 21 (Hieron. Mart.). In the Auctaria of Bede, and in the Ethiopic Calendar, October 19 is assigned to St. Luke. The relics of St. Luke, with those of St. Andrew and St. Timothy, are said to have been transferred by order of the emperor Constantius to Constantinople, and there deposited in the church of the Apostles [ANDREW, p. 82]. (Hieron. cont. Vigilantium; Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 345; Basil. Menol. Oct. 18). St. Luke's translation was observed "in Oriente" on Oct. 18 (Hieron. Byzant. See also Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 310.

The sacramentary of Gregory (p. 136) has a collect for St. Luke's natalis, which is assigned to Oct. 18; it prays the Lord for St. Luke's intercession; but the festival is omitted in some MSS. Krazer (de Liturgiis, 497) states the general belief that St. Mark and St. Luke are not mentioned in the Roman canon in the prayer Communicantes because of the uncertainty as to the fact of their martyrdom. Ciampini (de Sac. Aedif.) does not mention any churches dedicated to St. Luke, but he cites various authors explaining why the vitulus of the Apocalypse was assigned as the symbol of this evangelist (Vet. Mon. i. 192). [EVANGELISTS IN ART, I. 633.] [C. H.]

In Gregory's Sacramentary Sept. 16 is assigned as a festival to Lucia and Geminianus, neither of whom are named in the collect, though Euphemia, who is also separately commemorated on that day, is (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sac. 130). The "natalis" (no day being named) of Euphemia, Lucia, and Geminianus, occurs in the Antiphonarium, but their names are not in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Antiph. 710). Basil's Menology assigns Sept. 17 to Lucia, widow, and Geminianus jointly.

There is a special service for her day and vigil (day of the month not mentioned) in the Liber Responsalis (842). In the Liber Antiphonarius (654) the festival of "St. Lucia, virgin," occurs between the second and third Sundays in Advent, but the collect does not contain her name.

LUCINA. In the Diurnum Romanum, i. 7, c. 17, we find: "Sed dispensator qui pro tempore fuerit in eadem venerabili diaconia (i.e. quando lucina perficitur in eadem Diaconia pro remissione peccatorum nostrorum), omnes diaconites et pauperes Christi, qui ibidem conveniunt Kyrie eleison exclamare studeant." Ducange supposes lucina here either to be synonymous with LUCERNA, the lamplighting, or to be a mistake for Litania. But in another instance that he quotes, "quantum vix in undecim lucinis laborare poterant," where he supposes it to mean simply 'days,' it would be more natural to take it for some special occasion of busy labour. Whether a great baptism day, or a great almsgiving day, or what else might be meant by it, and whether the name be taken from the church of San Lorenzo in Lucina, or the church named from the office, must be matters of pure conjecture.

lib. vii. tit. 13; de Tironibus Leg. 22) releases certain persons in the proconsular province of Africa from payment of the tax known as aurum tironicum, a sum of money levied in lieu of the contingent of recruits to the legions which every province was liable to render. And these persons are denominated sacerdotes. The question arises, what class of persons are denoted by this term? There are two theories; the one that the persons intended were heathen priests, who were obliged by their office to exhibit ludos to the people at great expense; whence the reason for their exemption (Gothofred, Comment. in Cod. Theod. in loc.) The exhibition of ludi was no doubt a very expensive charge. But there appears to have been no kind of these games which the priests were bound to exhibit at their own expense (see Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq. s. v. Ludi), whilst those few in which they and not the aediles took the chief place, for the most part belong, as e.g. the Liberalia, to the class of feriae stativae, and entailed little trouble or expense in their celebration. Apart therefore from the difficulty of supposing a Christian emperor to be founding a special exemption for the benefit of the heathen priesthood, which the Christian clergy were not to share, the reasons adduced appear not to be conclusive. Tertullian (Apol. c. ix.) mentions incidentally the absolute prohibition by law of the sacrifices to Saturn throughout this very province of Africa, in the reign of Tiberius.

The other theory, maintained by Petit (Varior. Lect.), regards the Christian bishops as being the persons thus exempted. It is hardly probable that bishops should be classed with the heathen priests under the common title sacerdotes, a course which both parties would have resented as an insult. And it is not clear what in the case of bishops could have been the "majoribus expensis," which are alleged as the reason for this exemption. Yet this is perhaps to be preferred as the solution of an obscure question.

LUGO, COUNCIL OF (Lucense Concilium), held at Lugo, in Galicia, by order of king Theodomir, A.D. 569, to lay down the bounds of the different sees in his dominions, with a view of curtailing any that were too large, which was accordingly done; Lugo thus itself becoming a metropolitan see. We find from the sees enumerated that his dominions extended into Portugal. The last named is called that of the Britons, and had thirteen churches belonging to them, and one monastery, given to it. A second council is supposed, by Mansi and others, to have taken place A.D. 572; the only real foundation for it being, that Martin, bishop of Braga, transmitted the collection of canons approved at Braga that year in a letter to the metropolitan of Lugo, with this address: "Nitigesio episcopo, vel universo concilio Lucensis ecclesiae:" which need not imply that any council was then sitting, or about to sit. (Mansi, ix. 815, et seq., with the later divisions appended there, and 845.)

LUKE, ST., THE EVANGELIST (IN ART). [See EVANGELISTS, I. 633.] Martigny refers to Borgia (De Cruce Veliterna, p. 133) for an engraving of a brazen cross, probably of the 8th or 9th century, which bears on its extremities busts of the four evangelists in person, instead of the symbolic creatures. Here St. Luke, like the others, bears a closed book in one hand and points to it with the other. It has been supposed that the evangelists are also personally represented on sarcophagi, as in that of Probus and Proba (Bottari, tav. xvi.; and at pl. cxxi. in particular). In this last example, three figures hold the volume or roll, and stand in all probability for St. Matthew, St. John, and St. Mark. But the roll or book is frequently placed in the hands of all or any of the apostles. However, in a sepulchral urn, No. 36, in the Museum of Art, the apostles are represented with books rolled up, and the remaining four with them unfolded: the names are written on the rolls; St. Luke's as LYCANVS. The non-apostolic evangelists are, however, seldom added to the number of the twelve.

M. Perret (in Catacombes de Rome, vol. ii. pl. lxvi.) publishes a greatly damaged fresco from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Saint "Zoticus," wherever that may be. However, the fresco represents four standing figures, each of whom has at his feet a "scrinium" full of rolls. The two letters MA are legible near one of them, which may be St. Matthew or St. Mark. St. Luke must be one of the others. He is also represented among the four evangelists in the mosaics of the baptisteries of Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Monumenta, tab. lxxii. A.D. 451). Four figures holding books cannot well be other than the writers of the Gospels, though Ciampini expresses some doubt as to the subject of the painting.

The earliest representation of St. Luke as a painter is in the Menologium of Basil II., A.D. 980. See D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xxxi., where the Virgin is sitting to him in a pleasant garden scene (perhaps on a house top), which reminds us of some of Fra Angelico's works. [R. St. J. T.]

LUXURUS or LUXURIUS, martyr in Sardinia placed under Aug. 21 and Sept. 26. [C. H.]

LUXURY (Luxuria). The original signification of the word luxuria was that of an overflow or excess of fertility in crops or fields; thence it had the meaning of wantonness and of luxury generally: in mediaeval ecclesiastical Latin it expresses sins of uncleanness, "luxuriae concubinatae, luxuriosos vel adulteros luxuriam explere cum consanguinea sua." (See Ducange, s. v.)

The church from the very first assumed an attitude of antagonism to luxury in every form. Simple and comely dress, plain food, an active, not an idle life, and a disregard of riches, were the outward marks of a Christian profession; and the circumstances of the early Christians were obviously such as to restrain any tendency to self-indulgence. So soon, however, as the church obtained any toleration in the empire and wealthy members joined her ranks, the case was altered. Even as early as the 2nd century Tertullian has frequent denunciations against intemperate "voluptates." He will not allow the public shows to be frequented by Christians. "The state of faith," he declares (de Spectac. c. 1), "the argument of truth and the rule of discipline bar the servants of God from the pleasures of the public shows." The outrageous immodesty of the theatre, no less than the contagion of idolatry in the whole apparatus of the shows, was held to render them inconsistent with the renouncements which were made at baptism. (For the words of renunciation, see BAPTISM, I. 160; RENUNCIATION.) What the church opposed was not festivity in itself, but the vice inseparable from the exhibition of the public plays. Cyprian, for example, writing to Donatus (c. 7), inveighs with severity against the shows; yet he dates his own treatise on the feast of the vintage (ad Donat. c. 1), which he implies that he was himself observing. An instance of the corruption which then prevailed in theatrical representations appears from the play which was called Maiuma, part of which consisted in the exhibition of naked women swimming in water. This disgraceful display was the subject of no less than eight imperial laws, and was not finally prohibited till the time of Arcadius (Cod. Theod. XV. vi. 2).

The tendency to luxury in the adornment of the person in the 2nd and 3rd centuries is apparent from the exhortations of Tertullian (de Cultu Femin.) and Cyprian (de Habitu Virgin.), in the West, and of Clement in the East (Stromata, ii. 10). They could not tolerate that Christian women should exhibit the same immodesty in their apparel, and should deck themselves with the same meretricious arts as were common in the depraved society of the heathen world. Cyprian treats of what is becoming in dress and behaviour in a consecrated virgin, but his treatise also exhibits the fashions which beguiled women generally in that age. He warns them (de Habitu Virgin. c. 7) against exposing their face and figure in public from want of modest clothing; he asks (c. 9) if it is God's wish that their ears should be scarred and traversed with costly earrings, or that a circle of black should be drawn round the eye; he cautions them against tampering with what God has formed, whether with "yellow dye or black powder or rouge;" and as the sum of the matter he gives them his fatherly advice, "be what you were fashioned by your Father's hand, remain with your countenance simple, your shoulders let alone, your figure natural, wound not your ears, circle not arm or neck with precious chain, fetter not ankles with golden bonds, stain not your hair, and keep your eyes worthy of seeing God." All such lascivious arts he regards, in common with other Christian fathers, as having been taught mankind by the apostate angels (ibid. c. 9). Closely allied to immodest dressing is wantonness of manners. Cyprian (ibid. c. 10) rebukes those of his flock who make no scruple when they attend marriage parties of abandoning themselves to revelry, "they interchange unchaste speeches, hear what is unbecoming and say what is unlawful, and are exposed to view, and countenance with their presence shameful language and convivial excess." The wedding-feasts very frequently formed an excuse for riot; and the lascivious singing and promiscuous dancing practised on these occasions were brought under canonical censure. The clergy more than once were forbidden (Conc. Venet. c. 11; Conc. Agath. c. 39) to sanction such gatherings by their presence. With respect to bathing, that luxury was not altogether prohibited, but the public baths were to be used with a regard to that honour which the doctrine of the Incarnation teaches is due to the human body. As a proof of the need that the church should regulate the use of the baths, Cyprian found it necessary to exhort even the virgins to abstain from bathing in company with men (de Habitu Virgin. c. 11). For a fuller account of these various developments of luxury, see BATHING, DANCING, DRESS, HAIR.

Part of the subject of over-indulgence in the pleasures of the table is treated under the heading of DRUNKENNESS. It remains to notice the efforts of the church to check luxury in food. The sumptuous meals, the pains and expense lavished in obtaining rare delicacies, the unbridled indulgence of the appetite which prevailed among the wealthy classes of the Roman empire are matters of notoriety. It was a primary duty of a society, one of whose fundamental moral precepts was the restraint of fleshly appetites, to make a stand against such flagrant abuses. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39) contrasts the simplicity of the Christian agapae, in which the guests eat as much as hungry men desire, with the Apaturian and Bacchanal festivals, for which a levy of cooks is ordered; and asks his opponents which is most likely to propitiate heaven in time of calamity (ibid. c. 40), the heathen daily fed to the full and about forthwith to dine, or the Christian dried up with fasting and pinched with every sort of abstinence. The simplicity of the agapae did not long survive, and some allowance must be made for Tertullian's rhetorical language, and his own habits of rigid self-denial; but after these deductions sufficient remains to shew that Christian meals in the 2nd century were a standing protest against luxury and excess in matter of food. Clement of Alexandria inveighs (Paedagog. ii. 1) against the lavishness and gluttony of heathen meals, and exhorts Christian converts to be satisfied with plain fare; he urges that meat should be eaten without sauces and boiled rather than roast, but recommends in preference such food as olives, herbs, milk, cheese, fruit, and honey. Among more specific directions of a later date the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 15), requires the African bishops to maintain a frugal table. The plea that bishops should be free in entertaining magistrates and others in office that they might thus obtain readier access to them to intercede for criminals, is rejected by Jerome (Ep. ad Nepotian. cc. 3, 4). Judges, he says, will shew greater respect to frugal clergy than to luxurious ones. He adds, in the same epistle, that a clergyman who takes every opportunity of going to the entertainments to which he is invited soon sinks in estimation. By the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 4) widows who are brought to want from gluttony or idleness are not to receive relief from the church. The directions in the Rule of Benedict, which was practical rather than ascetic in its aim, give the diet which was considered sufficient for all the purposes of an industrious life in Italy at the beginning of the 6th century. Each monk was allowed 1 lb. of bread daily, but flesh only in case of illness. At dinner two dishes of cooked pulmentaria were to be placed on the table, and a third dish of fruit and salad when it could be got (Regula, cc. 39, 40). The composition of these "pulmenta" or "pulmentaria" was various. Grain and vegetables cooked in different ways were their ordinary ingredients. Eggs, fish, cheese, and even fowls, if the flesh was minced, were admitted into them. One definition states that they were made ex mediæ qualitatis materiâ; another, that they included any ordinary food except bread and meat. (See Ducange, s. v.) As we advance into the middle ages the ecclesiastical injunctions regarding food take the form of prohibitions of gluttony rather than of luxury. Gross feeding was one of the particular vices of the barbarian tribes which were being gradually incorporated into the church. The council of Autun, A.D. 670 (Labbe, Concilia, vi. 1888), forbade any priest who had overaten himself to touch the sacrifice. In the Penitential of Gildas, which probably contains the earlier canonical rules of the British church, it is enacted that if a monk is sick from too much food on a day when he has received the sacrifice, he shall go without his supper and keep seven additional fasts (c. 7), on any other day he shall keep one fast and be severely chided (c. 8). Similar injunctions are found in the early ecclesiastical documents of the Anglo-Saxon church. Theodore in his Penitential (I. i. 8) imposes a penance of three days on any one making himself ill by gluttony, with an additional penance (c. 9) if the offence is committed after receiving the sacred elements. In these rules he is followed by Archbishop Egbert, who moreover inflicts different sentences on different orders. Thus a 'clericus' overeating himself is to fast forty days (Poenitent. xi. 7), a monk or deacon sixty, a priest seventy, a bishop eighty (Bed. Poenitent. vi. 3, 4). Theodore (I. i. 4) made an exemption in favour of any one who had been fasting a long time, and then at Christmas or Easter, or any of the saints' days eat moderately, but did not make allowance for the weakness which succeeds a long fast, and causes sickness on eating.

The eating of unclean food frequently comes under notice in the Penitential Books of the 7th and 8th centuries. The existence of these decrees points to some remote influence of the Mosaic Law in the mediæval church, and also indicates the lingering of barbarous habits among the converts to Christianity in the remote corners of Europe. The Canones Hibernenses (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der Abendländischen Kirche, p. 136) inflict (c. 13) four years on bread and water on any eating horseflesh; a severity which was probably called for by some local practices. For the same canons only impose (cc. 14, 15) forty days on those who eat flesh which dogs have torn or which has died from natural causes. By the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 6) it is no canonical offence if carrion is eaten from necessity. In the case (cc. 8, 9) of food which has been contaminated by a mouse or weasel having been drowned in it, if there is a small quantity it must be thrown away; but if there is much, it will be sufficient to sprinkle it with holy water. A goat or deer found dead in the forest (II. xi. 1), unless there is some appearance of its having been slain by the hand of man, must be thrown to the swine or dogs, on no account be eaten. Birds or beasts strangled in nets or slain by hawks (c. 2) must also be rejected, because the Capitula in the Acts of the Apostles prohibit the using of things strangled. Fish, however (c. 3), caught in a net may be eaten, because they belong to another order. The direction with regard to horse-flesh (c. 4) differs from the Irish canon. Theodore does not forbid it, but states it is not customary to eat it. Hares are allowable (c. 5), their flesh is said to be good for dysentery, more particularly the gall mixed with pepper. The Confessionale of Pseudo-Egbert adds that it is a remedy for face-ache. Bees (c. 9) stinging a man to death must be killed, but their honey may be kept. It is not necessary to reject either swine or fowl (c. 7) which have fed on carrion or human blood; but any which have fed on human flesh must not be eaten (c. 8) till the meat has been soaked. Bede (Poenitential. vii.) lays down the same injunctions in the main about unclean food. In these he is followed by Egbert, with some curious varieties of penance. Any one (Egbert, Poenitential. xiii. 4) knowingly eating or drinking what has been polluted by a cat or dog shall chant 100 psalms, or fast three days; if the offence is committed unknowingly, the penalty is halved. So any secular (c. 5) deliberately drinking any liquor in which a mouse or a weasel has been drowned, shall do seven days' penance in a monastery and chant 300 psalms. The penalty of eating food half raw was three days' penance, or chanting the psalter.

Luxuria in the middle ages was used in ecclesiastical language to signify lust, more particularly such indulgence of the passions as was not included under ADULTERY, FORNICATION, or INCEST. The lascivious desire which stopped short of overt act was not generally brought under canonical censure; the rule of discipline being that the church judges actions only, and of actions those alone which create scandal. Secret thoughts, intentions, and desires were left to spiritual remedies. So the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314 (c. 4), merely states that any man who desires to sleep with a woman and does not accomplish it, has fallen from grace. No mention is made of penance. Even the Penitentials which pursue offenders into the minutest details, either assign no penalty to a desire, or a very slight one. The British canonical book which bears the name of the Penitential of Vinnia (Wasserschleben, p. 108) states that if a man has meditated uncleanness but checked himself, although the sin is the same, the penitence may be light. And Theodore (I. ii. 21, 22) only bids such a man seek pardon from God; but if he has proceeded to wanton words, then he must be a penitent for seven days. Kissing a woman per desiderium was punished with twenty days (I. viii. 2). Rape was severely visited, both by civil and ecclesiastical law. One of the laws of Constantine (Cod. Theod. IX. xxiv. 1) condemned to the flames not only any one who committed a rape on a virgin, but even carried her off with her own consent against the will of her parents. This severity was a little modified by Constantius (ibid. c. 2); the crime was still a capital one, but only slaves guilty of it were to be burned. Under Jovian the scope of the law was extended (Cod. Theod. IX. xxv. 2), not only was it a capital offence to ravish a consecrated virgin, but even to solicit her to marry against the rule of her profession, whether she was willing or not. The offence was also brought under canonical discipline. The Apostolical Canons (c. 66) expel from the church the man who offers violence to a virgin not espoused to him, and prohibits his marrying any one but her however poor she may be. Basil assigns (ad Amphiloc. c. 22) four years' penance to one carrying off a virgin espoused to another man; and directs (Ep. 244) that not only shall the man himself suffer, but all his accomplices shall be censured, even to his family and the inhabitants of his village. The proof of the widespread existence of unnatural crime during the decay of the empire is too strong to be questioned (Clement Alex. Paedagog. ii. 10; Cyprian, cont. Donat. c. 8). And no serious efforts were made by the heathen emperors to put an end to it (see the authorities quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XVI. ix. 11). In the Christian imperial code, however, it was treated with extreme severity. Constantine ordered (Cod. Theod. IX. vii. 3) that offenders should be executed; and Theodosius (ibid. c. 6) that they should be burned. The decrees of the church on the subject shew that even Christians were not altogether clean. Tertullian (de Pudicit. c. 4) states that offenders were kept not only from the porch of the church, but from contact with any part of the building, for such sins were not "delicta" but "monstra." The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 71), denies them communion even at death. By a canon of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 16), those guilty before the age of twenty were to do penance as prostrators fifteen years, and then to be permitted to join in the prayers only for another five years before being admitted to full communion; if they are older than twenty, ten years are to be added to the penance; and if they exceed fifty years, then they are to be granted communion only at death. Basil (cc. 7, 62, 63) fixes their penance at either twenty or thirty years. The Penitentials which represent the ecclesiastical code of races which had not yet cast off the vices of barbarism, abound, as might be expected, with injunctions against unnatural lusts. In the British code the Penitential Book of Gildas (c. 1) lays down in curious detail the punishment of a presbyter or deacon who had so sinned. His penance was to extend over three years, every hour of which he was to beg pardon, and every week he was to add an extra act of penance (superpositionem) except on the fifty days after Easter: on the Lord's day he might eat bread without stint, and some dish fattened with butter, but on other days he was to take only a British formella of dried bread (paximatum) and vegetables and a few eggs. His allowance of drink was to be a Roman hemina of milk to recruit his strength, but if he had work to do, he was to be given a Roman sextarius of skimmed (tenuclae vel bolthutae) milk: his bed was to be made without much grass; and if at the end of a year and a half he shewed deep repentance he might receive the eucharist and sing the psalms again with the brothers. By the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 1) boys polluting themselves were to be flogged; and an offence against nature combined with any other crimen capitale was to be expiated only by seclusion in a monastery for life. For further particulars on a matter which does not admit of detail, but where the details are only too numerous, the reader is referred to these early Penitential Books (Theodor. I. ii. vii.; Bed. iii.; Egbert. iv. v.) [G. M.]

LYING. It does not appear that the mere uttering of a falsehood, apart from any injury it might inflict, was brought under ecclesiastical censure. Tertullian, writing after he had joined the Montanists, and not likely therefore to err on the side of laxity, contrasts (de Pudicit. c. 19) the deadly sins which were visited with excommunication with those lighter offences of daily incursion of which discipline took no cognizance; and among these latter he enumerates thoughtlessly speaking evil, rash swearing, the breaking of a promise, and the telling of a lie from shame or necessity. This list does not include perjury, which was treated as a grave canonical offence. [OATHS.] Whether and under what circumstances it was held pardonable by any of the fathers to tamper with the truth, is a matter difficult to decide absolutely. Passages may be adduced which support a strict adherence to veracity at all times and at all hazards: on the other hand there are passages which seem to countenance equivocation or economy. What is beyond question is that they did not attempt to build up a system of accurate casuistry. That is the production of a later age. A collection of quotations bearing on the subject will be found in Jeremy Taylor (Ductor Dubitantium, III. ii. 5). One of the tenets which Augustine charges (contra Mendac.) the Priscillianists with upholding is, that they were at liberty to forswear themselves in order to conceal their secret doctrines.

On false witness the imperial code, following the early Roman law, affixed a heavy penalty. The false accuser was to undergo the same punishment (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxix. 1, 2, 3; XVI. ii. 21) which his accusation, had it been substantiated, would have brought upon the accused. This law of retaliation was to hold good (ibid. IX. i. 9, 14) whether the false charge attacked another's reputation or property or life. The frequent mention of the same offence in the canonical law shews that the evil was widespread in the church. The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 74), sentences a false witness to five years' abstention from communion; the kindred but, in the circumstances of the early church, far graver offence of "delatio" was visited by a life-long exclusion (c. 73). [INFORMER.] The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 37), puts false witnesses in the same category with murderers, and excommunicates them in general terms till they repent (cf. Conc. Venet. c. 1; IV. Conc. Carthag. c. 55). The legislation with regard to libel occupies a chapter of the Theodosian Code (IX. xxiv. de famosis libellis). [LIBEL.] [G. M.]

LYONS, COUNCIL OF (Lugdunensis Concilio). Of the councils of Lyons, several have been misnamed and misnumbered.

1. Said to have been held A.D. 197, because this seems to have been the year in which St. Irenaeus addressed a letter, in the name of the brethren in France, over whom he ruled, to pope Victor, on the disputed question of keeping Easter, and because Eusebius speaks in general terms of synods and meetings of bishops having been held in connection with it (E. H. v. 23-4, comp. Mansi, i. 715 and 726).

2. A.D. 475, when a priest named Lucidus is said to have retracted his errors on predestination. But the only record of this is found in a work of Faustus, bishop of Riez, who was himself a semi-Pelagian.

3 and 4. A.D. 501 and 516, in which St. Avitus, of Vienne, is supposed to have taken part. But the first was a mere conference between the orthodox and the Arians (Mansi, viii. 241, comp. Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 501, n. 4), and to the second he refers himself but casually (Ep. xxviii. comp. Mansi, lb. 537).

5. A.D. 517, where Viventolus, bishop of Lyons, with ten others, passed and subscribed to six canons. In the first of these, the twentieth canon passed at Epaone respecting incestuous marriages, was reaffirmed with special application to Stephen, an official of king Sigismund, whose possible displeasure may have dictated the second and third. St. Avitus is also thought to have taken part in this council, but he is not named among those who subscribed to it. The title given to it of the first council of Lyons is misleading; and several canons are cited by Burcard and others as of this council, for which there would seem to be no foundation (Mansi, viii. 567-74).

6. Held A.D. 567, by command of king Guntram, and called the second council of Lyons, in which two bishops, named Salonius and Sagittarius, were condemned; eight bishops and six representatives of absent bishops subscribed to its canons, six in number; the bishop of Vienne subscribing first, and of Lyons second. Canon 2 decrees that the wills of the departed should be religiously maintained and carried out, even when they ran, or seemed to run, counter to the civil law. Canon 4 decrees that persons suspended from communion are to be restored only by him who suspended them. Canon 6 is of a piece with the second and third of Gerona. (Mansi, ix. 785-90, comp. Conc. Gerund.)

7. Held A.D. 589, under king Guntram, and called the third council of Lyons. Here the bishop of Lyons subscribed first, and of Vienne second, of eight present bishops, and twelve who subscribed through their representatives. Once more the number of canons passed was six; in most cases for giving effect to former canons. By the sixth lepers are to be sufficiently fed and clothed by the bishop of the diocese to which they belong, and not allowed to be wanderers (Mansi, ix. 941-4). [E. S. Ff.]

LYRE. The lyre is borne by the mystic Orpheus (see Aringhi, vol. i. pp. 547, 563, both pictures from vaultings of the Callixtine catacomb, and FRESKO, I. 696), and is held to represent the attractive power of the Lord. Aringhi quotes St. John xi.: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to Me," and proceeds to reflect on the lyre of Orpheus, "qui dulcisonis et concinnatis ad plectrum vocibus feras pertrahebat." Eusebius makes ingenious use of the simile in his oration de Laudibus Constantini Imp., where he speaks of the Lord's saving all, "by the instrument of the human body with which He invested Himself; not otherwise than Orpheus the singer, who makes known his skill in art by his lyre, so that, as it is said in the Greek tales, he could tame all kinds of beasts with his singing; and by touching the strings of his instrument with the plectrum, could soften the wrath of merciless wild beasts."

Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. iii. 11, p. 246 D) includes the lyre among the symbols permitted to be used as signets. [GEMS, I. 712, 716.] For a curious illustration of the symbolic lyre of the passions or bodily nature, see CALF, I. 258.

MÂCON, COUNCILS OF (Matiscomensia Concilia). Three councils of Mâcon are recorded; the two first being held by command of king Guntram.

1. A.D. 581, when 21 bishops subscribed to 19 canons: Priscus of Lyons first, and Evantius of Vienne next. In their preface they declare they are not going to make new canons so much as sanction the old. Yet their 6th canon is novel, as well in speaking of archbishops at all, as in ordering that they shall not say mass without their palls. So is the 7th, which threatens civil judges with excommunication if they proceed against any clerk, except on criminal charges. So is the 9th, which orders Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays from Nov. 11 to Dec. 25 to be kept as fasts. Others relating to married priests and bishops, and to the Jews in general, are remarkable for their severity. Nine more canons are cited by Burchard and others as having been passed at this council. (Mansi, ix. 931-940.) [E. S. Ff.]

2. A.D. 585, when 43 present and 20 absent bishops, through their deputies, subscribed to 20 canons. In their preface Priscus, bishop of Lyons, is styled patriarch. The first canon is a short homily for the better observance of Sunday. By the second, no work may be done for six days at Easter. In the sixth, the 41st African canon is quoted with approval, which orders that the Eucharist shall be celebrated on all days of the year but one fasting; and further provision is made for what remains after celebration, by directing that it shall be consumed by persons of unblemished character, brought to church for that purpose, and enjoined to come fasting, on Wednesdays and Fridays, having been first sprinkled with wine. By the seventh, slaves that have been set free by the church are not to be molested before the magistrate. By the eighth, none that have taken sanctuary may be touched till the priest has been consulted. By the ninth and tenth, the civil power may not proceed against any bishop, except through his metropolitan; nor against any priest, deacon, or sub-deacon, except through their bishop. By the sixteenth, no relic of a sub-deacon, exorcist, or acolyth may marry again. By the nineteenth, clerks may not frequent courts where capital causes are tried. The twentieth orders the holding of councils every three years, and charges the bishop of Lyons with assembling them, subject to the assent of the king, who is to fix where they shall meet. King Guntram, in a dignified ordinance, published at the close of this council, intimates that the civil authority will not hesitate to step in, if the canons are not enforced with due rigour. (Mansi, ix. 947-64.)

3. A.D. 624, or four or five years earlier, according to Mansi, when the rule of St. Colum-

* Machadorus is the heading of Acta SS.; but in the text Macedo, while Hieron. Mart. (which is the authority quoted) has Macharius, in Migne. Potthast also gives Machadorus.

ban, which a monk named Agrestinus had attacked, was vindicated by Eustasius, abbat of Luxeuil, his successor. [E. S. Ff.]

MACORUS, martyr in Africa; commemorated Apr. 17 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MACRA (1) Virgin, martyr at Rheims, about A.D. 303, under the praeses Rictiovarus; commemorated Jan. 6 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 324).

(2) Virgin, martyr, in Mauritania Caesariensis; commemorated Jan. 9 (Vet. Rom. Mart.). The name occurs as Martiana in Ado. [C. H.]

MACRIANA, COUNCIL OF (Macrinum Concilium), held at Macriana in Africa, A.D. 418, according to some, the only evidence for it being two canons in the collection of Ferrandus (n. 11 and 23), each attributed to a council of that name (Mansi, iv. 439, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS). [E. S. Ff.]

MACRINA (1) Grandmother of St. Basil, at Neocaesarea in Pontus; commemorated Jan. 14. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 952).

(2) Sister of Basil the Great; commemorated July 19 (Basil, Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264).

(3) Commemorated at Rome July 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

(2) Martyr; commemorated at Alexandria, July 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

MADNESS, TREATMENT OF. [DEMONIACS, I. 543; EXORCISM, I. 650; HIEMANTES, I. 772.]

MAENA, martyr in Sicily; commemorated June 4 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MAFORS (or Mavors; sometimes Mafora; Μαφόριον or μαφόριον) was a short veil covering the head and neck, and flowing down upon the shoulders.

I. It was originally an article of female dress: a cloak or veil. St. Athanasius mentions that the maforium of the Virgin Mary was believed in his time to be preserved in the palace of the Blachernal at Constantinople—Τὸ δὲ ἄγιον μαφόριον θεοτόκου ἐν Βλαχέρναις κεῖ. It is defined in a MS. Greek Glossary, quoted by Du Cange, as πέπλον, γυναικειον ἱμάτιον. Another calls it distinctly a veil, τὸ τῆς κεφαλῆς περίβλημα, and Suidas (Lexicon) treats it as synonymous with ricinium, a band for the head.

II. The term was also applied to a large coarse cape or hood, worn by monks in the Eastern church: the monkish scapular. Cassian (de Habitu Monachor. i. c. 7) describes it thus: "Post haec angusto pallio tam amictus humilitatem, quam vilitatem pretii, compendiumque sectantes, colla pariter atque humeros tegunt; quod mafortes tam ipsorum quam nostro nuncupatur eloquio." It was the working dress of monks, and a passage in Fortunatus (Vita S. Hilarii, c. ii. n. 2) seems rather to shew that the habit of a monk of peculiar sanctity would sometimes be folded or draped around his tomb; for he calls it "peplum seu velum quo sepulcra et tumbae sanctorum obvolvebantur." That, at all events, is the apparent meaning of the passage.

III. Some writers reckon mafortes among the vestments used in the services of the church, i.e. as a cope or amice. "Mafortem tramosericum rodometlinum aquilatum; item mafortem e teleoporphyro tramosericum opus marinum" (Charta Cornutiana, quoted by Ducange).

Cassian states that this habit was not generally used by monks in the West.

MAGI (IN ART) (1) BEFORE HEROD. Two instances of this rare subject have been discovered by the industry of M. Rohault de Fleury, and are figured in his beautiful work L'Évangile (Tours, 1875), which is illustrated entirely from early art. One is from a rude fresco in the catacomb of St. Agnes, of which we subjoin a woodcut, without being able to speak with any certainty as to its date, though De Fleury attributes it to the 2nd century. The magi bear their gifts, and the star is very prominent. In the original Herod's face has a look of anger and suspicion, but this may possibly have been inserted or enhanced by some ingenious copyist or other workman, nothing being easier than sinister expression, especially in the large-headed and large-eyed drawings of the Roman decadence. The second example is from the mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore at Rome, and is one of the original mosaics of the 5th century. Herod bears the nimbus, a rather singular instance of its occurrence so early. Hebrew elders are with him unfolding their rolls of prophecy, and gazing upon him in a manner which appears to disquiet him, as though the text of St. Matt. ii. 3 was in the mind of the artist, and could not have been more graphically expressed by Raffaëlle himself. Of the three kings, or magi, two wear the Phrygian bonnet or helmet, the third, who is of very youthful appearance, having long curled hair. They all wear long close-fitting hose, apparently much ornamented down the front of the leg, with short tunics, altogether presenting a rather mediaeval appearance. Martigny refers to the painting in St. Agnes (see woodcut), and says that Herod is supposed in it to be protesting with hand on heart his good intentions towards the Holy Child. See also Perret, vol. ii. pl. xlviii. He mentions a sarcophagus at Ancona, for which he refers to Bartoli, Sopra un' area marmorea, etc., Torino, 1768, which contains the same subject, with many figures. It will be found among Mr. Parker's Photographs, No. 2677, vol. xviii. Another at Arles bears the first scene of the history, the magi in the act of observing the star, two pointing it out to the third. Figured in Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. i. p. 62.

(2) ADORATION OF. A special interest is attached to the subject of the Wise Men in the primitive ages. It seems to have retained its hold more strongly on the Christian imagination than many others, and has always been a favourite of graphic artists.

The number of magi is almost always three. Two or four sometimes occur, and Martigny attributes such changes of treatment to artistic motives. But a very different account is given by Mr. Hemans (Historical and Monumental Rome, p. 661) of the appearance of two instead of three in the celebrated 5th century mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore. "The Divine Child," he says, "is here seated on an ample throne, while another personage is seated on a lower chair beside Him. In the original composition that personage was an elderly male figure, no doubt intended for one of the magi, only two of whom are seen in the mosaic now before us, whereas in another of the groups (the three before Herod) we see three magi. A most unjustifiable alteration of this group was ordered when the church was restored by Benedict XIV. Instead of the male figure seated beside the Child was substituted that of Mary with a nimbus-crowned head and purple vestments. Among other innovations then made, one of the magi was omitted, and the mother's figure, originally standing behind the throne of the Child, was changed into that of an angel, adding a third to the group of celestial ministers in the background." The mosaic in its present state is figured in Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, i. p. 6, xxi. See also ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS, §§ 3, 15, I. 84.

Adoration of the Shepherds and Magi. Bas-relief, Lateran, on Staircase. Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Évangiles,' vol. i. pl. xix.

There can be little doubt that this subject belonged to the earlier cycle of the catacomb frescoes. It is found in the cemeteries of St. Nereo with four Magi, in that of SS. Marcellinus and Peter with two. They appear for the most part to have been more or less rudely restored at various times. Their actual appearance may be understood from Parker's Photograph, No. 1613; St. Nereo (A.D. 523?), and No. 2116 (St. Marcellinus, A.D. 772). It is figured by Aringhi (vol. i. p. 587), from the walls of the Callixtine Catacomb: the Magi wearing the Phrygian cap and tunic, with modern boots, and rowelled spurs with spur-leathers; an addition in itself sufficient to cast a suspicion of restoration or reconstruction, even as early as Bosio's time, over all the paintings in the catacomb. At p. 615, on a Callixtine sarcophagus, they appear leading their horses, or perhaps camels. They are bearing their offerings, and guided by the star to the Holy Infant, who is wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and outstretched on a cradle under the shed with the ox and the ass. The Blessed Virgin sits apart, and Joseph stands by her side. Figured again from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter "inter duas lauros," at vol. ii. p. 117: with clavi or stripes on the tunics and on the robe of the Virgin mother. Again, with horses at ii. 159, and at 355, 395, from unknown sarcophagi; ten times in all.

The Magi and Virgin. Tomb of Esarch Isaac. Ravenna, 6th century. Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Evangiles,' vol. i. pl. xx.

Two highly interesting 6th-century examples from Ravenna are given by De Fleury (vol. i. plates xxi. and xxii.). One from the tomb of the exarch Isaac is here reproduced in woodcut; the other is the well-known mosaic of Sant'Apollinare nella Città. The latter is perhaps the earliest type of the Byzantine Madonna of the earlier middle ages, found at Torcello and Murano, still retained in the unchanging art of the modern Greek church, and reproduced most signally, perhaps, in the celebrated Borgo Allegri picture of Cimabue, now in Sta. Maria Novella in Florence. The attendant angels are thoroughly Byzantine, and may stand as examples for the severer ecclesiasticism of Justinian's day. The magi wear the traditional hose, with somewhat mediaeval crowns, cloaks, and tunics. Their ages are carefully distinguished, and their appearance curiously Gothic. Their names, SS. Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, are given in the mosaic, perhaps for the first time. The Infant raises His hand in benediction, and the Blessed Virgin also. The group forms the end of the celebrated Procession of Female Saints.

A curious bas-relief from the French crypt of St. Maximin is given by De Fleury (v. i. pl. xx.), which he assigns with possible truth to the 3rd century, and which we reproduce.

The Magi and Virgin, &c. (Lateran.) Rohault de Fleury, 'Les Evangiles,' vol. i. pl. xviii.

Perhaps the most interesting example of this subject which is left us is a carving made on the bone of a whale, now in the British Museum. It is among Prof. Westwood's fictile copies, and is figured in his Catalogue of Fictile Ivories, p. 234; in Stephens's Old Runic Monuments, vol. i. pp. 470 sqq.; and in Mr. Maskell's Ivories, Ancient and Mediaeval, p. 54. It was described by

Old English Casket, made of the bone of a whale. Brit. Mus., from Maskell's 'Ivories.'

Mr. Franks in the 2nd Series of Papers of the Society of Antiquaries, vol. iii. p. 382. It forms part of a square coffer, incised with subjects in broad outline relief, the magi sharing the cover with a curious carving, which Dr. Westwood is apparently right in considering meant for Wayland Smith, as the hammer and pincers are unmistakeable, though Mr. Maskell thinks it is a beheading of St. John. The three magi have round massive bells of hair, which might almost pass for a remembrance of the Phrygian caps, except that other figures on the chest have the same. Their boots and braccæ are unmistakable; they are offering their treasures in covers and pateræ apparently, and are attended by an ornamental duck or swan. This bird is repeated to fill up space. The star is very large, and of many rays; there is a broad Runic border, and an inscription "Magi" in runes above the carving. The quasi-symbolic figures of the Virgin Mother and Child are extraordinary, the former ends at the waist in waving flourishes, perhaps typical of drapery, but ornamented with dots like an Irish initial letter; the Child consists entirely of a larger face or medallion held as usual before His Mother; the writer feels little doubt of its having been copied or adapted from some MS. of Durrow or Iona; and, as Mr. Maskell observes, following Mr. Stephens, it is one of the costliest treasures of English art; and, as a specimen of Northumbrian art and Northumbrian folk-speech, it is doubly precious.

The distinctively Persian dress of the magi, as represented on all the monuments, certainly deserves attention, as it indicates the connexion, in the Christian imagination, between the religion of Zoroaster and the coming of the Lord, which Zoroaster was supposed to have foretold. See Hyde, de Religione veterum Persarum, c. 31, p. 384, ed. Oxon. 1700, and Magi in Dict. of the Bible, ii. 190. F. Nork (Mythen der alten Perser als Quellen Christlicher Glaubenslehren, p. 82) considers that many representations of the Adoration of the Magi bear a decidedly Mithraic character. [R. St. J. T.]

MAGIC (Ars Magica, from magus, Persian magh). "Among the Persians," says Porphyry, "they who are wise respecting the Deity and are His servants are called Magi" (de Abst. Anim. iv. 16, p. 165, cited by Rose (in Parkhurst), who also refers to Justin, i. ix. 7, xii. 13; Curtius, v. 1; and others). Xenophon distinctly ascribes to them the office of priests: "Then were the magi first appointed to sing hymns in honour of the gods at the dawn of every day, and to sacrifice daily to those gods to whom they, the magi, should declare sacrifice due" (Cyrop. p. 279; ed. Hutch.). The name (μάγος) is not used as a reproach in the Septuagint. See Dan. i. 20; ii. 2, 10, 27; iv. 7. The prophet Daniel was the head of the "Magi" in Babylon (Dan. v. 11). It is also the title given to those who were led by the star to Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 1, 7, 16). Nevertheless it had already acquired a bad sense among the Jews. Thus Simon (Acts viii. 9) is said μαγείειν and to use μαγεία (11); while Elymas, a Jew, is expressly called a μάγος (xiii. 6, 8). This was the popular usage, and at length it prevailed entirely. "Custom and common speech," says St. Jerome, "have taken magi for malefici—who are regarded in a different light in their own nation; for they are the philosophers of the Chaldeans" (Comm. in Dan. ii.). It is probable, however, that Magism had long greatly altered for the worse, even in the practice of its best professors in its original home; for Origen, speaking of the magi of Persia, says, "From them the magical art of their nation takes its name, and has travelled into other nations to the corruption and destruction of those who use it" (c. Cels. vi. 80). Philostratus is also speaking of these Persian adepts, when he makes the strange statement, that they invoke God when they are working unseen; but subvert the public belief in the Deity, because they do not wish to appear to receive their power from Him. (de Vit. Sophist. in Protag. 498.)

The "curious arts" (τὰ περίεργα) renounced by the converts at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19) were, according to the common meaning of the term employed, the several branches of magic. What these were in the opinion of the early Christians we learn from many authors. Magicians, it was believed, could raise phantoms resembling persons deceased, could extract oracles from children, whom they entranced; nay, from goats and tables (Tertull. Apol. 23). In a book written a little before the end of the 2nd century, Simon Magus is represented boasting:—"I can make myself invisible to those who desire to seize me, and again visible when I wish to be seen. If I desire to flee, I can pierce mountains and pass through rocks, as if they were mud. If I were to cast myself down from a high mountain, I should be borne uninjured to the ground. If I were bound, I could release myself and bind those who had chained me. If imprisoned, I could make the bars open of themselves. I could make statues live, so that they were thought to be men by those who saw them. I could cause new trees to spring up suddenly, and produce boughs at once. If I hung myself into the fire, I should not burn. I change my face, so as not to be known; nay, I can shew men that I possess two faces. I can become an ewe or a she-goat. I can give a beard to little boys. I can shew gold in abundance. I can make and unmake kings" (Recognit. Clement. ii. 9. Comp. Pseudo-Clem. Hom. ii. 32; Gesta Petri, § 33). The supposed narrator is made to say that he saw a rod with which Simon was beaten "pass through his body as through smoke" (Recog. ii. 11; Ps.-Cl. Hom. ii. 24), and that a woman, his confederate, was seen, by a vast multitude surrounding a tower in which she was, to look out of every window on each side at the same moment (Recog. u.s. § 12); that he caused another to look like himself (Gesta Petri, 136), and "spectres and figures to be seen daily in the market place, statues to move as he walked out, and many shadows, which he affirmed to be the souls of persons departed, to go before him" (Hom. iv. 4; Gesta Petri, 45). Simon's fatal attempt to fly is related or alluded to by several early writers; as by the author of the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 9), Arnobius (adv. Gent. ii. prope init.), Epiphanius (Hæres. xxi. 5), St. Ambrose or Hegesippus (de Excid. Hieros. iii. 2), Sulpicius Severus (Sacr. Hist. ii. 41), Maximus (Serm. 39), Pseudo-Augustine (contra Fulgent. Don. 23), etc. Many of the Gnostics, as Menander (Iren. Hæc. i. 23, § 5), Basilides (24, § 5), and Carpocrates (25, § 3), with their disciples, were accused of "using magic and (mystic) images, and incantations, and all other curious arts (perierga)." See also Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 7. St. Irenæus relates two stories of Marcus (about 160), which shew how these arts were still brought into the service of heresy. He caused wine mixed with water, which he consecrated in the Eucharist, to appear purple and red (i.e. we presume, like venous and arterial blood); and again handing a small cup of wine and water to a woman, he ordered her to consecrate it; which done, he filled from it to overflowing a much larger cup (ibid. i. 13, § 2; Epiph. Haer. 34, § 2). Magic, under one name or another, professed to heal by various means. It was represented to the sick, "If you would send for that praecantator, you would be well at once; if you were willing to hang such written charms (characters) on you, you could soon recover health. . . . Send to that diviner; forward him your girdle or stomacher. Let it be measured, and let him look at it; and he will tell you what you are to do, and whether you can get over it. . . . Such an one is good at fumigating: every one to whom he has done it, has become better at once. . . . Come secretly to such a place, and I will raise up a person, who will tell you who stole your silver or your money; but if you wish to know it, take care not to cross yourself when you come to the spot. . . . Women are wont to persuade each other that they ought to apply some charm (fascinum) to their sick children" (Caesarius, A.D. 502, Serm. 79, § 4). As we proceed, we shall see that astrology, storm-raising, sortilege, etc. all come under the same general head of Magic.

II. The belief that there was something real in these arts was apparently universal. Even Celsus alleged them as a set-off against the miracles of Christ (Orig. c. Cels. i. 68). St. Peter was accused by the heathen of magic (August. de Civ. Dei, xix. 23). The Christian regarded it as evidence of the power and intervention of evil spirits in league with the wonder-worker. "By visions in dreams," says Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, "and by magic tricks do they lay hold of all those who do not strive at all for their salvation" (Apol. i. 14). It was said that they could be made to "obey mortals by certain arts, i.e. by magical incantations" (Recog. Clem. iv. 26). The truth of this is assumed both by Celsus and Origen, A.D. 230 (c. Cels. vi. 39; viii. 60-64); and it is a first principle with Tertullian (de Animâ, 56). Lactantius, A.D. 303, says, "Astrology, the arts of the aruspex and augur, and what are called oracles themselves, and necromancy and the magic art are their inventions" (Div. Instit. ii. 16). Minutius Felix, A.D. 220: "The Magi also not only know the demons, but whatever of the marvellous they pretend to perform, they do it by the aid of demons" (Octav. viii.). St. Augustine affirms the same thing: "All such arts, whether of a trifling or of a noxious superstition, from a certain pernicious association of men and demons . . . are to be altogether renounced and eschewed by the Christian" (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 23, § 36; see de Civ. Dei, viii. 19). He distinguishes between "miracles of human and magic arts jointly (that is, of arts of demons working through men)" and miracles "of the demons themselves wrought by themselves" (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 6, § 1). His theory was that there were certain things which attracted and gave pleasure to evil spirits according to their several natures, as animals are pleased by the food proper to their kinds. As spirits, they took delight in certain properties "in the various kinds of stones, herbs, woods, animals, in charms, and rites" (ibid.). He thought that they made their peculiar tastes known to their followers: "For if they did not teach it themselves, how could men learn what each of them craved, what he loathed, by what name he was to be invited, by what compelled" (ibid.). Some affirmed that human souls served the magician: "They are invoked who have died an untimely or violent death," on the ground that it seems probable that those souls will be most helpful to violence and injury, whom a cruel and untimely end hath by violence and injury torn from life" (Tertull. de Animâ, 57; Apol. 23; comp. St. Chrysostom, de Lazaro Conc. ii. 1). Simon, in the spurious Clementine books, is made to confess that he murdered a young boy, and by terrible adjurations bound his soul to assist him in his magic practices (Recog. ii. 13; Hom. Clem. ii. 26; Gest. Petr. xxvii.). Justin Martyr speaks of "necromancies and the inspection (of the entrails) of uncorrupted boys (see Dionysius Al. in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 10; so Eus. of Maxentius, viii. 14; Vit. Const. i. 36; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53) and the invocations of human souls (Apol. i. 18). It was denied, however, that a departed soul could be brought up, and alleged that the magician was deceived by the demons who really came to his call (Recog. iii. 49). St. Chrysostom: "This is a pretence and deceit of the devil: it is not the soul of the dead man that cries out, but the demon who makes those answers, so as to deceive the hearers" (Hom. 28 in Matt. viii. 29).

A particular spirit (δαίμων πάρεδρος) was in many cases supposed to attach himself to the sorcerer. Thus Justin M. (u. s.), "They who among magicians are called dream-senders and πάρεδροι." Irenaeus says of Marcus, "It is probable that he has also a familiar (δαίμονά τινα πάρεδρον), through whom he appears to prophesy himself, and causes those women to prophesy whom he deems worthy to partake of his grace" (Haer. i. 13, § 3). Elsewhere he speaks of "pareddi and dream-senders" (ibid. 23, § 4; Sim. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 7). Tertullian: "We know that magicians, to explore secret things, call up (the dead) with the help of catabolici (spirits that seize and cast men down) and pareddi and pythonic spirits" (de Animâ, 28).

III. An opinion prevailed widely in the early church, derived from Jewish sources, that magic was first cultivated when the children of Seth intermarried with those of Cain;^a and that Ham, who had addicted himself to it, dreading its loss at the deluge, engraved the secrets of his art "on plates of various metals, such as could not be spoilt by the flood of waters, and on very hard stones" (Cassian. Collat. viii. 21). It is elsewhere affirmed that Ham practised and taught magic (Recog. Clem. iv. 27; Hom. ix. 3-7); but not by writers of credit. The story of the engraved plates is evidently imitated from a tradition in Josephus (Antiq. i. 2, § 3) that the children of Seth engraved an account of their more lawful discoveries on "two pillars, one of brick and the other of stone." Another opinion was held by Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. 5) and Tertullian (de Idol. 9). These authors, supposing that "the sons of God" in Gen. vi. 2 were angels, make them the instructors of man in the art of magic.

^a Biacothanati. He uses the word twice in the same chapter. Cassian (Instit. vii. 14; Collat. ii. 5) and others (Lamprid. in Helio.; Bede in Martyrol. June 27; Passio S. Andr. in Surius, Nov. 30; Julius Firmicus, very often. See Gazaeus, note d, on Cass. Instit. u. s. and Rocca note e, on Sacram. Greg. Opp. Greg. v. 275, ed. 1615) use the less correct form biothanatus. Another occurs in the preface of a "Salis et Aquae Benedictio" in the Vatican Ins. of the Gregorian Sacramentary, published by Angelo Rocca, in which the water is adjured to drive away "omnem umbram, omnem satanam, et omnes machinationes spirituum, immundorum, sive biothanatum sive errantium ex invocatione magicæ artis" (Opp. Greg. u. s. 239). [BIOTHANATOS, I. 207; Faithful, I. 658.]

IV. For more than three centuries after Christ there was no tampering with magic on the part of Christians. Though believing in the reality of the art, they ridiculed it as delusive and worse than useless. Thus Tertullian: "What then shall we say that magic is? That which nearly all call it, deception. But the nature of the deception is known to us Christians only" (de Animâ, 57). Minutius Felix (Octav. viii.), copied by St. Cyprian (de Idol. Van. p. 14; ed. 1690): "These spirits lie concealed under consecrated statues and images. They inspire the breasts of the soothsayers by breathing on them; they quicken the fibres of entrails, they govern the flights of birds, they rule lots, they give out oracles; they are always confounding false things with true; for they are deceived and they also deceive" (Cypr.). St. Cyprian adds that they send diseases and obtain credit for a cure by simply ceasing to afflict (ibid.; so Lactantius, Div. Instit. ii. 15). "They fill all things with snares, cheats, wiles, errors" (Lact. u. s. 14). "Skill in the art of magic is good for nothing but to cheat the eyes" (id. u. s. iv. 15).

V. The early Christians further believed that the demons, who were the real agents in the wonders of magic, could be controlled by the strong faith of any true Christian acting and speaking in his Master's name. Even of astrology, it was said, "until baptism that which is decreed holds: after it astrologers no longer speak the truth" (Clem. Alex. Fragm. § 78). The failure of the powers of evil began when Christ came. Tertullian: "We know the connexion between magic and astrology. . . The latter science was permitted until the gospel, that when Christ was born no one should thenceforth cast a person's nativity from the sky. . . So also the other kind of magic which works by miracles. . . spun out the patience of God even to the gospel. . . After the gospel, thou wilt nowhere find either wise men (sophistas) or Chaldeans, or enchanters or interpreters of dreams, or magicians, except such as are notoriously punished" (de Idol. 9). Origen held that "magicians having intercourse with demons, and invoking them as they have learnt and for their needs, can only succeed until something more divine and powerful than the demons and the charm (ἐπωδή) which calls them, appears or is uttered" (c. Cels. i. 60). He suggests that the magi of St. Matthew ii. 1, finding that the spirits who served them had "become weak and strengthless, that their tricks were exposed and their power brought to nought," and remembering the prophecy of Balaam, were led to think that, He to whom the star guided them, "must be stronger than all demons, even those who were wont to appear to them and inspire them" (ibid.). Hence it was said that magic had been destroyed by the star of Bethlehem. So St. Ignatius A.D. 101, ὁθεν ἐλθερο πάσα Μαγεία (Epist. ad Ephes. 19). Compare St. Peter Chrysologus, A.D. 433 (Serm. 156). St. Basil, 370 (de Hum. Christi Genev. i. 591); St. Ambrose (Expos. Ev. S. Luc. ii. 48), etc. Of astrology especially, Clemens Al.: "For this reason a strange and new star arose that put an end to the ancient astrology" (ἀστροθεσίαν) (Fragm. § 74); Sim. Greg. Naz. (Carm. de Provid. Arcan. v. i. 64). All this was by some understood in the command that the magi should depart into their own country another way (St. Matt. ii. 12). Thus Tertullian (u. s.): "They were not to walk in the ways of their former sect." St. Augustine more generally, but therefore inclusively, "Via mutata, vita mutata" (Serm. 202, § 4); Sim. Chrysol. (Serm. 159); St. Ambr. (Exp. Ev. S. Luc. i. 46); St. Leo (Serm. 32, § 4); Greg. M. (in Evang. Hom. x. sub fin.).

VI. When after the conversion of Constantine such practices were found among professed Christians, the most strenuous efforts were made to suppress them by the teachers of the church, and by legislators, both civil and ecclesiastical. They were denounced as remnants of idolatry, and a practical return to it. Thus Gregory Nazianzen, 370: "For this did the star lead, and the wise men fall down and offer gifts,—that idolatry might be destroyed" (Orat. i. tom. i. p. 12, compare with last paragraph). "Branches of idolatry," says Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, "are witchcrafts (veneficia), precatations, ligatures, phylacteries (vanitates), auguries, lots, the observing of omens, parental obsequies" (Tract. iv. in Pasch. ad Neoph.). St. Augustine: "It is a superstitious thing whatever hath been ordained of men towards the making and worshipping of idols, whether it pertain to the worship of a creature or any part of a creature as God, or to consultations and certain covenants by means of signs settled and agreed on with demons, such as are the essays of the magic art" (de Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30).

The canons and laws which we shall now cite will shew that the church and the state prohibited every kind of magic on the grounds above mentioned. They will at the same time give an opportunity of explaining some details, which would be hardly worthy of a separate notice.

(1.) Ecclesiastical legislation.—The first conciliar decree against any branch of magic was that of Ancyra in Galatia, A.D. 315, which condemns to five years' penance "those who profess soothsaying (καταμαντεύμενοι) and follow the customs of the Gentiles, or bring certain men into their houses to discover remedies or perform lustrations" (can. 24). The version of this decree in the old Roman Code expands the first clause thus: "Qui auguria, auspiciaque, sive somnia, vel divinationes quaslibet secundum morem Gentilium observant" (in App. Opp. Leonis, p. 18). Here augurium and auspiciu may be understood generally of the observation of omens: originally and strictly they were modes of di-vination from the cry, flight, and manners of feeding of birds. Later on, when the evil had increased, the council of Laodicea, probably about 365, with more details, forbade, under pain of excommunication, "priests and clerks to be magicians or enchanters (ἐπαποιδούς), or mathematici or astrologers, or to make what are called phylacteries, which are bonds for their own souls" (can. 36). The mathematici were astrologers according to the usage of that age; but a distinction appears to be made here, of which no satisfactory account has been given. The fourth council of Carthage, 398: "He who is enthralled to auguries and incantations is to be driven from the assembly of the Church" (can. 89). In 569, Martin, bishop of Braga, a Greek by birth, sent to a council held at Lugo, a collection of canons drawn chiefly from Greek sources. In this, beside the canons of Ancyra and Laodicea we find one (72; Labbe, v. 913), forbidding men to "observe or worship the elements, or the course of the moon or stars, or the vain deceit of omens (signorum), for building a house or planting crops or trees, or contracting marriages" (the reading of Gratian, P. ii. c. 26, qu. v. 3). In the same series (c. 74) rites and incantations are forbidden at the gathering of medicinal herbs. Only the Creed or the Lord's Prayer might be said, or simply, "Let God the creator of all things and their Lord be honoured." Women are told to use no charms in working wool; but only to "invoke God as their helper, who has given them skill in weaving" (75). This may be illustrated from St. Eligius, 640: "Let no woman presume to hang amber beads (sucinos) on her neck, or when weaving or dyeing, or at any work whatever, name Minerva or other ill-omened persons, but desire that the grace of Christ may be present at every work, and to trust with their whole heart in the virtue of His name" (de Rect. Christ. Conv. § 5). The Council of Auxerre, 578, forbids, among other practices of the kind, resort to caragii (can. 4). This word occurs again in can. 14, Conc. Narbon. A.D. 589. It is used by Eligius (ib. § 5 bis); by Bede, 701 (de Remed. Peccat. 11), and earlier than these, by Caesarius of Arles, 502 (if those sermons are his) who spells the word caragus (Serm. 65, § 4; 78, §§ 1, 3, 5). It is also found in an Anjou Penitential, printed by Morinus (de Discipl. Poenit. App. 586), where for "cararies corioeos" read with Ducange "caragios curiosos." Pirminius, A.D. 750, spells it Karagius (Scaraps. in Mabill. Analecta, 72). The word is derived from "character" in the sense of a talisman or amulet on which mystic characters were written or engraved. The fourth council of Toledo, 633, deposed and condemned to perpetual penance in a monastery any of the clergy from a bishop downwards, who should be found to have consulted magi, aruspices, arioli, augurs, sortilegi, or those who professed the art of magic or practised such things (can. 29). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, subjects to six years of penance all who "give themselves over to soothsayers or to those who are called centurions (ἐκατόνταρχοι), or any such, with a view to learn from them what they wish to have revealed to them" (can. 61). "Centurion" in the sense of a "leading man" was a title conventionally given, like "wise man" or "wizard," to the professors of such arts. See HECATONTARCHAE. The same punishment was awarded to those who "led about she-bears or other like animals to the delusion and injury of the more simple, and who talked of fortune and fate and genealogy, and used a heap of words of that kind, . . . and to those who are called cloud-chasers (νεφοδιακται), to enchanters, makers of phylacteries, and soothsayers;" whose practices the council declares to be "pernicious and heathen" (Ἑλληνικά). According to Balsamon and Zonaras, it was the custom to give hairs plucked from, and dyes (βάμματα) that had been hung about, bears and other animals as charms against disease and the evil eye. See AMULETS, LIGATURES, PHYLACTERIES. These dyes are probably the same as the succi (herbas et succos), which Caesarius (Serm. 66, § 5) forbids Christians to "hang about themselves or their friends," though we are not told that these were supposed to derive virtue from an animal. Balsamon explains that the cloud chasers were those who drew omens from the forms and grouping of the clouds, especially at sunset. He adds that the canon condemns in intention those who wore a child's caul or employed secret things, as e.g. the gospels, for ligaturae or practised the sortes Davidicae (see SORTILEGY), or divined with barley. The last method he ascribes to women who used to "spend their time in the churches, and by the holy icons, and declared that they learned the future from them." In Clemens Al. (Protrep. ii. 11), we read of "flour-prophets and barley-prophets." Ecclesiastical prohibition occurs in a brief canon (12) of the synod of Rome, A.D. 721. In 789 the canon of Laodicea was inserted by name in Charlemagne's capitulary of that year (c. 18); but in an abstract which heads it the word μάγοι is represented by "coclearii." So Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 21; v. 69. "Coclearius" is a corruption of "Cauculator," which is from καῦκος, a cup used by diviners (see Gen. xlv. 5), or by makers of philtres. [CALCULATORES, p. 255.] And another chapter (63) of the same capitulary: "We command that none become either calculators (see again Capit. i. inc. an. c. 40; Baluz. i. 518; Cap. R. Fr. i. 62; vi. 374), and enchanters, or storm-raisers (tempestarii), or obligatores (see LIGATURES), and that where there are such, they be reformed or condemned." Storm-raisers are also condemned by a law of 805 (Capit. ii. 25) de Incantatoribus et Tempestariis. The word is written "tempestuarius" in a decree of Herard, A.D. 856 (cap. 2). Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, who had been an adviser of Charlemagne, wrote a treatise of some length against this offence. See TEMPESTARIUS. In 813 the Council of Tours, under that prince, directed priests to warn the people that "magic arts and incantations are altogether unavailing to the cure of any human diseases, and to the healing of sick, lame, or dying animals; and that ligatures of bones or herbs applied to any mortal thing are useless" (can. 42).

(2.) Imperial legislation.—The first edict of Constantine that has any bearing on our subject appeared at the end of October 312, nine months before the defeat of Maxentius. It was directed against the aruspices, and as it only mentions the exercise of their art in houses its probable object was to check inquiry by divination into the destinies of the empire and its rulers. The aruspex was to be burnt alive, and his employers banished (Cod. ix. 18. 1. 3; de Arusp.). His next (de Magia), in 321, went further, but was far from being thorough. It declared generally the most severe punishment to be due to those who were "found, armed with magic arts, to have made attempts against the health of men, or to have turned chaste minds aside to lust," but it adds that "remedies sought for the bodies of men or helps innocently used in country places," against unseasonable weather were not to be treated as offences (ib. 4). Constantine and Julian in 357: "Let no one consult an aruspex or a mathematicus . . . No one a hariolus. Let the wicked profession of the augurs and diviners be silenced. Let not the Chaldeans and the magi, and the rest, whom the people call malefici for the greatness of their crimes, make even a partial attempt. Let curiosity of divination for ever cease with all" (ib. 5). The penalty was death by the sword. Another law not a year later threatened death by fire to those who, "using magic arts, dared to disturb the elements, undermine the life of the innocent, and calling up the dead by wicked practices to kill their enemies" (ib. 6). In July 358, the same princes published an edict condemning every kind of divination, avowedly on the ground that it was employed in a spirit hostile to themselves (ib. 7). The penalty was death with torture, and no rank was to plead exemption. The crime had been common under heathen emperors, and it is probable that most of the offenders under Constantius were heathen. Long before Tertullian had spoken of those who publicly honoured Caesar, but privately "consulted astrologers and aruspices, and augurs, and magi respecting his life" (Apol. 35, where in notes to the translation in the Library of the Fathers Dr. Pusey refers to Tacitus, Ann. xii. 52; xvi. 30, and Spartianus apud Gothofred, Prol. ad Lib. ad Nat. p. 11). Firmicus Maternus, in his treatise on astrology written between 335 and 360, cautions his disciples thus: "Take care never to answer one who questions you respecting the state of the republic or the life of the Roman emperor; for it is neither right nor lawful that we should by a wicked curiosity say anything of the state of the republic. . . . But no mathematicus has been able to define anything true respecting the fate of the emperor" (Matheseos, ii. 33). The necessity of this caution appears from several stories in Ammianus (Hist. xix. 12), and others. In the reign of Valens, for example, A.D. 373, Theodorus was supposed to be indicated as his successor by a tripod of laurel wood duly prepared, which by some means spelt out his name to the fourth letter (θεοδ). The death of Theodorus and his partisans did not appease the emperor, who caused many innocent persons to be murdered because their names began with the same letters, or on grounds equally frivolous (Sozom. Hist. vi. 35). Julian himself professed to believe in such arts. He acknowledged that the oracles had failed; but alleged that Zeus, "lest men should be altogether deprived of intercourse with the gods, gave them a means of observation through the sacred arts, from which they might derive sufficient help in their need" (in Cyrill. Al. c. Jul. vi. p. 198; ed. Spanh.). In 364 Valentinian condemned "magicos apparatus" in connexion with heathen rites performed by night (Codex Theodos. ix. xvi. 7), and in 370 (probably) made the art of the mathematicus, exercised by night or day, punishable by death (ib. 8); but in 371 he declared that the aruspex was not guilty of witchcraft. "We do not blame the art of the aruspex, but forbid it to be exercised injuriously" (ib. 9). He regarded it as a necessary part of the heathen worship then tolerated; but its secret exercise was still prohibited under the law of Constantine. In 389 Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius decreed that every maleficus should be denounced as an "enemy of the public safety;" but chariot-drivers in the public races were forbidden to inform under pain of death (ib. 11). They were excepted, because many of them lay under suspicion of using magic to give speed to their own or to injure their rival's horses. See on this among Christian writers, Arnob. adv. Gent. i. cir. med.; Jerome, Vita Hilarionis, c. 15; St. Chrysost. Hom. xii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. (iv. 11, 12); Greg. Naz. ad Seleuc. Iamb. iii.; Cassiodorus, Varior. iii. 51. It should be mentioned in conclusion that the exception of Constantine in favour of charms against bad weather was repealed by Leo VI. who became emperor in 886 (Constit. 65, de Incantatorum Poena).

MAGISTER. (1) Magister disciplinae or infantum. A custom grew up in Spain towards the end of the fifth century, that parents should dedicate their children, while yet very young, to the service of the church, and in this case they were educated and brought up in the house of the bishop, by some "discreet and grave" presbyter, who was deputed by the bishop for that duty. He was called praepositus or magister disciplinae. The second council of Toledo (A.D. 633), held under Amalric, one of the Gothic kings, says in its first capitulum, of such young persons, "in domo ecclesiae sub episcopali praesentiā a praeposito sibi debeant erudiri." Similarly, the fourth council in the same place (A.D. 693), cap. 23 [al. 24], "si qui in clero puberes aut adolescentes existunt, omnes in uno conclavi atri commorentur, ut in disciplinis ecclesiasticis agant, deputati probatissimo seniore, quem et magistrum disciplinae et testem vitae habeant."

Also in monasteries, he who had charge of the children who were commonly educated in them was so called; as in Ordericus Vitalis, lib. iii. p. 462, "ad infantum magisterium promovit." [SCHOOLS.] [S. J. E.]

(2) Magister infirmarius, the chief of the brethren in a monastery deputed to visit and attend to the sick. [INFIRMARY, I. 837.]

(3) Magister major, a title sometimes given to the chief of the magistri infantum. See (1) above.

(4) Magister novitiorum, the officer in a monastery to whom the charge of the novices was especially committed.

Cassian (de Instit. Coenob. iv. 7) tells us that a candidate for admission to a monastery is not at once to be admitted into the general body of the brethren, but given for a time into the charge of an elder monk, who has his station for that purpose not far from the entrance of the monastery. During this period the novice had no separate cell, and was not allowed to quit the master's cell without his permission (u. s. iv. 10). Similarly the Rule of St. Benedict (c. 58) provides that the novice shall be taken to the cell of the novices, where he is to meditate, eat, and sleep; and that a senior monk shall be assigned to him, who shall give all possible pains to raise his spiritual state. It seems from this that St. Benedict designed to give a separate magister to each novice; but the practice of later times was to have one room and one master for all the novices. Compare (1) above.

Cassian tells us (Collat. 20, c. 1) that he himself acted as "magister" to Pinufius, who (though he had fled from another monastery) was treated as a novice. Euphrosyne, in man's dress, was committed to the charge of a senior by the abbat of a monastery to which she had fled (Life in Rosweyde's Vitae Patrum, c. 8, p. 365); and a man like Joannes Damascenus, already of distinguished piety, was placed by the head of the monastery of St. Sabas under the charge of a senior. (Life in Surius, c. 18, v. p. 159, ed. Turin, 1876.) See Alteserrae Asce-ticon, lib. ii. c. 10. [C.]

MAGISTRATES. [JURISDICTION; LAW.]

MAGISTRATUS. Pelliccia (i. 27, quoted by Augusti, Handbuch, i. 170) states that "magistratus nomine primo episcopus, secundo presbyter in usum veniunt;" that is, that the two higher orders, bishop and presbyter, are admitted to the title of magistri, while the inferior orders which subserved them were ministri. [MINISTER.] This distinction seems to correspond with that elsewhere made between ιερούμενοι and ὑπηρέται (Cave, Prim. Christianity, pt. i. ch. 8.) [C.]

MALEDICTION (Maledictio). Maledictions [compare ANATHEMA] were used on various occasions, as (for instance) in EXCOMMUNICATION [I. 641], and in the DEGRADATION of clerks [I. 542]. An early example of the latter is the curse of Silverius on his rival Vigilius (Binus, Concilia, iv. 143): "Habeto ergo cum his qui tibi consentiunt pœnae damnationis sententiam, sublatumque tibi nomen et munus ministerii sacerdotalis agnosce, S. Spiritus judicio et apostolica a nobis auctoritate damnatus." Another is that mentioned by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. v. 19), where, in the case of Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, king Chilperic demanded that either his tunic [ALB] should be rent, or the 108th [109th A.V.] psalm, which contains the curses on Iscariot (qui maledictiones Scarioticas continet), should be said over his head, or at any rate judgment of perpetual excommunication recorded against him [MARAN-ATHA].

A specimen of a curse denounced against those who took possession of the lands of a monastery is given by Martene (de Rit. Antiq. III. iii. Ordo 3): "May their portion and their inheritance be the torments of everlasting fire, with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who went down quick into hell, with Judas and Pilate, with Annas and Caiaphas, with Simon Magus and Nero; with whom may they be tormented in everlasting torment without end, so as to have no fellowship with Christ or His saints in the rest of heaven, but have fellowship with the devil and his companions, being appointed to the torments of hell, and perish everlastingly. So be it! So be it!" [C.]

MALEFICUS, the name popularly given to one supposed able to bewitch a person or his property. "Quos vere Maleficos vulgus appellat," says Lactantius (Div. Instit. ii. 16), and similarly Constantius (Leges, 4, 6 de Malef. in Codex Theodos. ix. 16), and St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, x. 9). The crime was itself called Maleficium, as if pre-eminently a deed of wickedness. A law of Constantius, A.D. 357, after reference to aruspices and others, proceeds to condemn "the Chaldeans and Magi, and the rest whom the common people call Malefici, from the greatness of their misdoing" (l. 4, u. s.). They were believed to obtain their power to injure others from evil spirits, either demons properly so called, or the souls of the dead. Thus Lactantius (u. s.), speaking of the demons, says that the Malefici, "when they exercise their execrable arts, call them up by their true names" (not by those of the ancient heroes, etc., which they assumed to deceive). These spirits were invoked with bloody sacrifices and other pagan rites. St. Jerome, distinguishing between Malefici and other professors of occult arts, says that the former "use blood and victims, and often touch the bodies of the dead" (Comm. in Dan. ii.). They corresponded to the γόηται of the Greeks, who were so called from the peculiar howl in which they intoned their incantations: "Illicitis artibus deditos . . . quos et Maleficos vulgus appellat . . . ad goetiam pertinere dicunt" (August. u. s.). Γοητεία, as Zonaras explains, "is the doing aught to the injury of others by means of incantations and invocation of demons" (Comm. in St. Bas. Epist. ad Amphil. ad can. 65: sim. Balsamon, ibid.). See MAGIC. [W. E. S.]

MANASCHIERT, COUNCIL OF (Manaschiertense Concilium), held at Manaschert in Armenia A.D. 687, according to Mansi, by command of Omar the Saracen leader, under the Armenian patriarch John. Its decrees on doctrine seem framed in opposition to the sixth council, where Monothelism was condemned; while several of its decrees on discipline seem condemned professedly by the 32nd and 56th of the Trullan canons (Mansi, xi. 1099. *Comp. MANDRA. A favourite appellation for monastic establishments in the East was mandra, μάνδρα, a fold, used both alone, ἐν μοναστηρίοις ἀρχόντες εἶπουν μάνδραις (Epiphanius. Haeres. 80), or with distinctive epithets ἀγία, θεία, ιερὰ, πνευματικὴ μάνδρα. The sacred precinct, or cloistered atrium in front of the church of St. Simeon Stylites, surrounding the pillar on which he stood, was popularly known as Mandra, taking the name of the enclosed plot in the midst of which the column was erected (Evagr. H. E. i. 13, 14). [ARCHIMANDRITE.] [E. V.]

MANDUTIUS; commemorated Aug. 16 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

MANDYAS (μανδύας, μανδύη, μανδύιον). This name is now given in the Greek church to the outer garment worn by monks, which is also used on some occasions by bishops, who are, as a rule, drawn from the monastic orders. In shape it is, on the whole, similar to a cope, being a long cloak, reaching almost to the feet, and fastened at the throat.

It seems originally to have been borrowed from the Persians, and is defined by Hesychius as εἶδος ἱματίου Περσῶν, πολεμικὸν ἱμάτιον. In the West we find it frequently spoken of as a dress worn by emperors and kings. The earliest instance of the use of the word in its ecclesiastical sense is apparently in Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcvi. 396). For later instances reference may be made to Ducange, Glossarium Graecum, s.v., and Goar's Euchologion, pp. 113, 495. [R. S.]

MANGER (Praesepe). In the crypt beneath the altar of the Sixtine chapel which forms part of the Liberian basilica (S. Maria Maggiore) at Rome is preserved the sacred culla, which forms the object of a solemn ceremony and procession on Christmas Eve. The culla is supposed to consist of five boards of the manger in which the infant Saviour was laid at the Nativity [MAGI; NATIVITY]. This manger was visited by Jerome and his disciple Paula (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eustochium, § 10). The boards were brought to Rome from Bethlehem, together with some fragments of rock from the cave which is the traditional scene of the Nativity, when the remains of St. Jerome were translated in the middle of the seventh century by pope Theodore I. [Not A.D. 352, as is maintained by Benedict XIV., de Canoniz. Sanct. l. iv. pt. 2.] They are now enclosed in an urn of silver and crystal, with a gilt figure of the Holy Child on the top. (Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexicon, xii. 698, s. v. Krippe; Murray, Handbook of Rome, p. 128, 9th ed.) The modern practice of setting up in churches representations of the manger or cradle is said to have originated with St. Francis of Assisi. [C.]

MANIPLE (Pallium Linostimum [?], Manipula, Manipulus [to be referred, like the other uses of the word, to the primary notion of handful; see Ducange, s.v.], Manipula, Sudarrium, Phanon, Fanon [cf. German Fahne and Latin pannus, which are doubtlessly allied: see Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, s. v.; the English pennon also is apparently derived from pannus], Mantile, Manutergium: ἐγχείριον).

This vestment in its primary form appears to have been merely a handkerchief or napkin held in the hand, but in later times it became an ornamental vestment pendent from the left wrist. It perhaps furnishes us with another illustration of what we have already spoken of in the case of the dalmatic (see the article), of the gradual extension of what was in its origin a peculiar use of the local Roman church throughout the whole of the West; an extension at first jealously resisted by the Roman clergy. The Eastern church has nothing answering to the maniple, but apparently the ἐγχείριον spoken of by Germanus, to which we shall refer below, was in its time a real, though accidental, parallel.

Possibly the earliest trace of the original use of the maniple is to be found in the order of Silvester I. (ob. A.D. 335) that deacons should wear dalmatics in church, and that their left hand should be covered with a cloth of linen warp (pallium linostimum: see Walafrid Strabo, de Rebus Eccles. c. 24; Patrol. cxiv. 952; Anastasius Bibliothecarius, de Vitis Rom. Pont., Patrol. cxxvii. 1513). Marriott, who is disposed to connect this with the later maniple, suggests (Vestiarium Christianum, p. 108 n.) that the order may have had reference primarily to the handling of the eucharistic vessels. The same order as to the use of this cloth was made by Zosimus (ob. A.D. 418) (Anastasius, op. cit. 59; Patrol. cxxviii. 174).

Others have argued that this pallium linostimum is rather to be associated with the stole (see esp. Macer, Hierolexicon, s. v. Linostima).

In the time of Gregory the Great, we meet with the mappula as a jealously guarded vestment or ornament of the Roman clergy, which had been in use among them for some time. The clergy of the church of Ravenna having ventured to make use of this vestment, the Roman clergy loudly maintained that it was a peculiar right of their own, and protested against the clergy of Ravenna wearing the mappula either there or at Rome. Gregory, writing to John, bishop of Ravenna, settled the matter by giving permission to the chief deacons of Ravenna (primis diaconibus vestris) to wear the mappula when in attendance on the bishop; permission, however, being absolutely refused (vehementissime prohibemus) for other times and to other persons (Epist. lib. iii. 56; vol. iii. 668). Bishop John, in his answer, remarks that in the time of Gregory's predecessors, whenever a bishop of Ravenna had been consecrated at Rome, the attendant priests and deacons had openly used mappulae without any fault being found, and that this had been the case when he was himself consecrated bishop.

The above instance has generally been supposed to belong to the early history of the maniple, as by Bona (de Rebus Liturgicis, i. 24. 5), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part 1, pp. 203 sqq.). At a later period, however, the latter writer (op. cit. vol. vii. part 3, pp. 359 sqq.), followed by Hefele (Beiträge zu Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie, und Liturgik, ii. 180), argued that it is here rather to be understood of a kind of moveable canopy (see Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iv. 6. 11, and Ducange, s.v.); and it may fairly be admitted that the terms in which both the contest and the concession are described are on the whole more applicable to this latter view. It is interesting to add here, in face of this conflict of theories, that, so far as appears, there is no trace of a maniple in the famous mosaic in the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, which is assigned to the end of the 6th century. (Figured above, s.v. DALMATIC, from Gally Knight's Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy, plate x.)

It is not till the 8th or 9th century that we meet with distinct allusions to the maniple as a sacred vestment. Mabillon notices a donation bequeathed to a monastery in the year A.D. 781, in which, with numerous other church ornaments, "quinque manipuli" (the earliest instance we have been able to find of the name maniple) are mentioned (Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, lib. 25, c. 53). Martene again refers (de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, iii. 187; ed. Venice, 1783) to an ancient missal in the monastery of St. Denis and assigned by him to about the time of Charlemagne, in which was given a prayer at the putting on of the maniple: "præcinge me, Domine, virtute, et pone immaculatam vitam meam."^a

We may next cite Rabanus Maurus (de Cleric. Inst. i. 18; Patrol. cvii. 18), who, writing early in the 9th century, speaks of the maniple as the "mappula sive mantile . . . quod vulgo phanonen vocant," which is held in the hand at the celebration of mass by the "sacerdotes et ministri altaris." About the same time we find Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. ii. 24; Patrol. cv. 1099) commenting on the maniple under the name sudarium, and entering at length into the symbolism of it. We also find a reference to it in the treatise de Divinis Officiis, once referred to Alcuin (c. 39; Patrol. ci. 1243). This work is now, however, assigned to the 10th or 11th century. In the homily de Cura Pastoralis, ascribed to Leo IV. (ob. A.D. 855), the injunction is given that the maniple (fanon) is to be among the vestments invariably to be made use of when mass is sung (Patrol. cxv. 675), the others specified being amice, alb, stole, and planeta; and we find the same command repeated in the following century by RATHERIUS, bishop of Verona (Patrol. cxxxvi. 559).

To add one more illustration, the order is made in the year A.D. 889 by bishop Riculfus of Soissons, that each church should possess at least "duo cinctoria et totidem mappulas nitidas" (Statuta, c. 7; Patrol. cxxxi. 17).

In Rabanus Maurus and the other liturgicologists cited above, the maniple is spoken of as carried in the hand, the left being sometimes specially mentioned; but, in course of time, it was worn pendent from the wrist (see e.g. Hugo de St. Victore, Serm. 14; Patrol. clxxvii. 928; Honorius Augustodunensis, Gemma Animæ, i. 208; Patrol. clxxii. 606).

It ought to be added here that the maniple does not appear to have been universally employed as a sacred vestment in the 9th century, for e.g. in the illustrations in the Pontifical of Landulfus, which is assigned to that period, none of the priests wear maniples (see Marriott, plates 34-36). Conversely also, it may be remarked, we find, and that at quite a later period, traces of the maniple being worn by lay monks. Thus e.g. Lanfranc of Canterbury, speaking with reference to the ordering of subdeacons, says, "in coenobiis monachorum etiam laici albis induuntur et antiqua patrum institutione solent ferre manipulum" (Epist. 13; Patrol. cl. 520). A council of Poitiers (A.D. 1100) forbids monks, unless they are subdeacons, to assume the maniple (Concil. Pictav. can. 5; Labbe, vii. 725).

With the growth of the church's wealth and power in the 9th century, the general character of vestments was considerably modified into a more costly and elaborate form. As a curious example of this in the case of the maniple, we may cite the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena, (ob. A.D. 915), who in a long list of valuable articles mentions "manipulos sex cum auro, unum sex (leg. ex) iis cum tintinnabulis"^b (Patrol. cxxiii. 468). Into the later notices, however, of the maniple it is not our province to enter.

The Eastern church, as we have said, does not command of Charlemagne," a form which is really from a copy of that liturgy printed in 1560 by the command of St. Charles [Borromeo], archbishop of Milan. (Martene, op. cit. p. 173.)

^b Doubtless this is in imitation of the little bells on the robe of the Jewish high priest.

^a A curious error has been here made by Hefele, who (op. cit. p. 181) has inadvertently cited as given by Martene from a "copy of the Ambrosian Liturgy made by use the maniple, but probably the ἐγχείριον, mentioned by Germanus, is practically a parallel. It is spoken of by him as worn by deacons attached to the girdle, and as symbolising the towel on which our Lord dried His hands after washing His disciples' feet (Hist. Eccles. et Mystica Theoria; Patrol. Gr. xcvi. 394). The epimanikion, however (ἐπιμανίκιον, μανίκιον, ὑπομανίκιον), while presenting an apparent similarity to the maniple, is utterly different from it in fact. The word (a barbarous compound of Latin and Greek) denotes a cuff, as being worn upon the sleeves of both arms, and is now one of the actual ornaments of bishops (to whom it was long restricted) and priests (and latterly also of deacons, Neale, l. c.) in the Greek church (Goar, Euchologion, p. 111; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 307).

Finally, we may give a passing remark as to one or two other ecclesiastical uses of some of the Latin names of the maniple. Thus fanon is also used for the name of the cloth in which is wrapped up the bread for use in the Eucharist:—so in an Ordo Romanus “fanonibus puris oblationes tenent” (Amalarius, Ecclogia de Officio Missae, c. 19; in Menard's Greg. Sacr. 554)—and also for the cloth which enwraps the chalice (ibid. c. 20). It is used again for a kind of veil worn on the head of the pope beneath the mitre (Ordo Romanus, xiv. 43; op. cit. 270; cf. also 281, 357, 537 [even in death, ib. 527]; it is also styled simply mappa). The word mappula is used in the Regula Monachorum of Isidore (c. 12, Patrol. lxxxiii. 882) for a garment worn over the shoulders by a monk who has not a pallium. In the Regula Fructuosi (c. 4; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1101), mappula is used apparently in the sense of a towel or napkin, as a part of the equipment of a monk's cell. See also Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 55. [R. S.]

MANIRRA, martyr; commemorated Feb. 28 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MANIUS, bishop of Verona, perhaps in 5th century; commemorated Sept. 3 (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 661). [C. H.]

MANNA (IN ART.) Two examples from Bosio's plates (see Bottari, tav. clxiv. and tab. lvii.) are supposed by Aringhi to represent Moses pointing to four or seven baskets of the manna of the wilderness. Bottari expresses some doubt in both cases, thinking that, at all events in the example which contains seven baskets, the figure must be intended for Our Lord. This may be the case, but the contents of the baskets may still be intended for manna, in reference to St. John vi. 41. Millin (Voyages dans le Midi de France, etc. xxxviii. 8, lix. 3), gives two sarcophagi, in which a personage who may pass for Moses stands pointing to three jars or “omers,” probably meant for manna, the more so as two figures bearing a bunch of grapes are near them (Num. xiii. 24). Compare LOAVES, II. 1038.

There is besides a newly discovered fresco, of which Martigny gives a woodcut, which clearly represents the gathering of the manna; but, if it be correctly copied, the drapery of the figures has a somewhat mediaeval-Italian appearance. It represents the falling manna, with four figures spreading their garments to catch it.

(See woodcut.) It was discovered in 1863 in the catacomb of St. Cyriaca. It occupies the whole side of a crypt, and the manna is represented like snow or hail. Our Lord's mention of the manna, and open appeal to it as the symbol of His body best suited, before His death, to the understanding of His Jewish hearers, may very probably invest these pictures of the bread of the wilderness with eucharistic meaning. They may be supposed to be pictorial repetitions of the text “I am that Bread of Life.” And this is yet more probable, where, as in Bottari lvii., Moses is represented in the act of striking the rock, as an accompanying sculpture.

As was observed before, it may be our Lord rather than Moses, who is represented with the seven baskets, though it was the miracle of the Five Loaves which preceded His discourse at Capernaum, and twelve baskets would therefore be more correct. Nevertheless, His words connect the manna of the Mosaic dispensation both with His miracle, and with the institution of the Holy Communion, and the pictures seem clearly meant for the same purpose. MANNEA, wife of the tribune Marcellinus, and martyred with him; commemorated Aug. 27 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

MANSE. (Mansis, mansa, mansum, mansus; also, especially in Italy, masa, masagium (whence message), masata, massa, massus, &c. Fr. mas, Norm. mois, Burgund. meiz. The most common form is mansus.) Strictly, the mansus seems to have been a piece of arable land of twelve acres (jugera, bunnaria), which suggests mensus as the original form; but it was not restricted to pieces of that precise extent. When it is not so used, the quantity is mentioned (see Ducange in v.). Mansus dominicus or indominicus was the homestead attached to the residence of the lord and occupied by him (Kar. Calv. Exact. Normannis Constit. A.D. 877, Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 257, 258. Sim. Formulae Marculfi (Lindenbr.), c. 79, ibid. 534, etc.). Charlemagne, 813 (Capit. ii.), speaks of the “mansum regale” in his forests, i.e. the clearing, or field, on which the colon dwelt (cap. 19). By a like usage, a piece of land by which a church was wholly or partially endowed (= the "glebe") was called the "mansus ecclesiae." A law of Louis the Godly, 816 ("De Mansis uniuscujusque Ecclesiae"), decrees that to every church be allotted one whole mansus free of service, and that the priests settled in them should "do no service on account of the aforewritten mansus, except that due to the church" (Capit. Aquigr. 10; also in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 85, v. 214). Charlemagne seems to have desired a larger provision, for in legislating for the Saxons, he says, "All of the lesser chapters have agreed that the country people who go to a church give to every church a court (curtem) and two mansi of land" (cap. 15). The Lombardic laws (iii. i. 46), 824 (Ludov. P.), provide that "if a church happen to be built in any place which was wanted, and yet had no endowment," "one mansus consisting of twelve bunnaria of arable land be given there, and two serfs by the freemen who are to hear office in the said church, that there may be priests there, and that divine worship may be held; but that if the people will not do this it be pulled down" (v. Espen, ii. iv. 23). Hincmar of Rheims in 852 asked of each parish priest in his diocese "whether he had a mansus of twelve bunnaria, beside a cemetery and a court (cortem) in which the church and his house stood, or if he had four serfs" (Labbe, Conc. viii. 573).

Mansi were given to churches to provide them with lights (Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 5), and an ancient gloss on the canon law says, "Mansus appellatur unde percipitur frumentum et vinum ad Eucharistiam consecrandam" (from Chron. Eormat. apud Ludewig. ii. Reliq. MSS.—Ducange).

By a law in the Fourth Book of the Capitulaires of the French Kings (iv. 28), compiled in 827, courts of justice are to be held "neque in ecclesia neque in atrio ejus." When this was republished by Charles the Bald in 853 (tit. x. c. 7), and again in 868 (tit. xxxviii. c. 7), he altered it thus, "Ne malla vel placita in exitibus et atriis ecclesiarum et presbyterorum mansionibus . . . tenere presumant." In 870 (tit. xlv. 12) he worded the prohibition thus, "Mallus neque in ecclesia neque in porticibus aut atris ecclesiae neque in mansione presbyteri juxta ecclesiam habeatur." We infer progress in the settlement of the clergy, and that near their churches, through the provision of a curtis [see MANSIA] on which a house might be built; but it does not appear that "mansio" was used in a conventional and special sense to denote the residence (or "manse") of the priest. It meant a dwelling-house of any kind, and is the original form of the common word maison. [W. E. S.]

MANSIONARII. [Compare PROSMANARIUS.] Officers discharging certain duties in connexion with the fabric and services of the church. Ducange (Gloss.) makes the word synonymous with "aedituus" and "matricularius," and explains it as deriving its meaning from the fact that a residence ("mansio") near the church was attached to the office. Dionysius Exiguus, in his Codex Canonum, gives "Mansionarius" as a rendering of the word προσμανάριοι, who are reckoned by the Council of Chalcedon (c. 2) among the clerical officers who are strictly forbidden to obtain their situations by bribery. (See Bruns, Canones, i. 26.) Bingham, however (Eccl. Ant. iii. 13, § 1), quotes Justellus, Beveridge, and other authorities to prove that the προσμανάριοι were in reality the stewards or administrators of the property of the church. That the "mansionarii" were clergy is evident from the words of Anastasius the librarian, who in his lives of John 4th and Benedict 2nd expressly reckons them among the clergy to whom legacies were left: "Hic dimisit omni clero . . . diaconibus et mansionariis solidos mille." Gregory the Great (Dialog. III. 25) applies the title "custos ecclesiae" and "mansionarius" indiscriminately to one Abundius. Their special functions appear to have been connected with the lighting and general care of the lamps of the church to which they belonged. Gregory the Great (Dialog. i. 5) speaks of a certain Constantius who was "mansionarius," and had charge of the lamps, and in (Dialog. iii. 24) the same duties are allotted to one Theodosius, who is called "custos" in the text and "mansionarius" in the heading. See also John the Deacon (Vita Greg. III. 58). In the Ordo Romanus, i. § 4) the mansionarius of a titular church in Rome is to go forth, with a presbyter, bearing a thurible to meet the pope when he came to celebrate a pontifical mass. Again (§ 32) he carries the taper solemnly kindled on Maundy Thursday. Mabillon (Comm. Praevius, p. xxvii) notes that during the first nine centuries in the "patriarchal" churches there were employed "mansionarii seu custodes ecclesiarum ad eas ornandas emundandas aliaque praestanda quae necessaria erant." Except the above-mentioned passage in the Council of Chalcedon, there is no trace of the existence of the office in the Eastern church.

2. Hincmar, of Rheims (Epist. ad Proceres Regni, c. 21, opp. ed. Paris. II. p. 209) numbers among the officials of the royal household a "mansionarius," whose duty it was to take care that those who were obliged to provide lodgings for the king when on a journey should be properly warned of his approach. [P. O.]

INSCRIPTIONS.—An inscription given by Marini (Papiri Diplom. 301) is as follows: LOCUS FAUSTINI QUEM COMPARAVIT A JULIO MANSIONARIO. In this case the mansionarius from whom Faustinus acquired his place of sepulture must have had the same control over the spot which the Fossor commonly had. The mansio was, in fact, the cemetery, though it does not appear independently that mansio is used in the sense of κοιμητήριον. Compare MANSE (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.). [C.]

MANSLAUGHTER. [HOMICIDE.]

MANSOLACUM, COUNCIL OF (Mansolacense Concilium), said to have been held at Malay-le-roi, near Sens, A.D. 659. "On y fit quelques réglemens sur la discipline," say the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates (i. 156), in describing it, and refer to Mabillon (Act. Sanct. Ord. Ben. saec. iii. pt. ii. 614; in other words, to a charter of privilege granted by the then archbishop of Sens and his suffragans to the monastery of St. Peter at Sens, and intended for the benefit of that convent alone. It is also dated by Mabillon two years earlier. (Mansi, xi. 121.) [E. S. Ff.]

MANUAL LABOUR. It appears to have been contemplated by the earlier councils that the clergy should, in part at least, maintain themselves by the work of their hands. The Apostolical Constitutions (II. 63) exhort the younger clergy to provide for their own necessities by the work of their own hands, while not neglecting the work of the ministry. Some of us, it is added, are fishermen, some tentmakers, some husbandmen, for no worshipper of God should be idle. The fourth council of Carthage (Statut. Eccles. Antiqua, cc. 51, 52) enjoins that all clergy, however learned, should provide themselves with food and clothing by some handicraft (artificiolo) or agricultural labour, yet so as not to neglect their proper duties; and (c. 53) that all clergy who were sufficiently strong in body should be instructed both in some handicraft and in letters. These canons are evidently referred to by the second Council of Tours, A.D. 567 (c. 10), where it is laid down, with somewhat curious reasoning, that there could be no justification for any of the clergy who employed a woman not belonging to the house (extraneam mulierem) for the alleged purpose of making his clothes, since there was a general order that they should procure both food and clothing by their own industry, and as the work of their own hands. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 3; c. 8, §§ 2-5) thinks that these canons were permissive rather than obligatory, and only applied to the inferior clergy, noting the fact that St. Paul is the only one of the apostles who is said to have worked with his own hands. Thus the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511 (c. 5), provides that certain lands and revenues which Clovis had given to the church should be employed in repairing churches, in the redemption of captives, and in paying the stipends (alimoniis) of the priests and poor, while the clergy (clerici) or, as another reading is, the clergy of lower degree (junioris officii) (see Bruns, Canones, ii. 162) should be compelled to help in the labour of the church (ad adiutorium ecclesiastici operis stringantur), probably on the lands so given.

Among ecclesiastical writers manual labour is evidently considered honourable and meritorious for the clergy, and in some cases habitually resorted to, but never enjoined as a positive obligation. Epiphanius (Haeres. 80; nn. 5, 6) says that many clergy, while they might live by the altar, prefer from excess of zeal (abundantiâ quâdam virtutis) to support themselves by the work of their own hands; and (Haeres. 70, n. 2) speaks of a certain sect named Audiani, in whose fellowship bishops, presbyters, and all clergy lived by their own toil. The very mention of such a fact seemingly proved that this was out of the common course. Chrysostom (Hom. 45, on Acts) speaks of four different grades of excellence set before the clergy, the second of which consists in labouring for their own food, the third is also labouring to assist the poor. Augustine (de Op. Monach. c. 29) asserts that the professional labours of the bishops and clergy are sufficiently onerous to exempt them from the obligation of toiling with their hands. Many instances, however, are to be found in which the most zealous attention to spiritual duties was combined with hard and habitual work at a trade or on a farm. Socrates (H. E. i. 12) says that Spiridon, bishop of Cyprus, was originally a shepherd, and through his great humility continued to feed his flock even after being made a bishop. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 28) speaks of one Zeno, bishop of Maiuma, who provided for his own wants, and for the poor of his flock, by weaving linen. Gennadius of Marseilles (de Scriptor. Eccl. c. 69) says that Hilary of Arles toiled with his own hands, not only for his own support, but that he might be able to help the poor. From Gregory the Great (Dialog. iii. 1) we learn that Paulinus of Nola was an excellent gardener, and (Dialog. iii. 12) that one Severus, a priest of great sanctity, was occupied on a certain occasion in pruning his vines. Gregory of Tours, in his Life of Nicetius (c. 8), says that when a bishop he continued to live among his servants, and work on his farm. It would be easy to multiply examples of this kind, they all point the same way; the very fact of their being recorded seems to shew that they must be considered as instances of exceptional excellence, which was held in honour and esteem, but not illustrative of the general practice, or of conduct which was reckoned obligatory upon either bishops or clergy. Hincmar of Rheims indeed, A.D. 845, appears to have endeavoured to make some measure of manual labour compulsory in his diocese, since (Capit. ad Presbyteros, c. 9, opp. i. p. 712) he orders all his clergy to go out fasting to work on their farms; but the general sense of the church in this matter appears to be represented by the words of Epiphanius, already quoted, that those who serve the altar have a right to live by the altar. MANUMISSION. [SLAVERY.]

MANUS MORTUA. [MORTMAIN.]

MAPHRIAN ("Fruit-bearing"). In the 6th century Jacobus Zanzalus, bishop of Edessa, the leading spirit among the Jacobites, finding that the whole of Asia was more than the patriarch of Antioch could possibly superintend, ordained Achudemes as chief bishop of the East beyond Tigris, with the title of Maphrian. This dignitary now resides in the convent of Mar Mattai [St. Matthew], near Mosul. (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. 152; Germann, Kirche der Thomaschristen, 524.) [C.]

MAPPA. Under the Roman empire a mappa, or handkerchief, carried in the hand seems to have been regarded as distinctive of high rank. The dropping of his mappa by the person who presided was, as is well known, the signal for the commencement of the games of the amphitheatre (Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 16). It was among the insignia of the emperors of the East, especially from the time that they became perpetual consuls. An object resembling a mappa is sometimes found on Christian tombs, in company with the clavus which denotes rank (Bottari, i. 73). In those diptychs in which, on their passing into the service of the church, the consul was transformed by certain modifications into a saint or dignitary of the church, the mappa of the imperial official sometimes appears. It is, however, in some cases doubtful whether the supposed mappa is not rather a volumen, or roll of a book (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.). [C.]

MARANATHA (ܡܪܢܬܐ), "The Lord cometh;" see DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, ii. 233), is an expression used (1 Cor. xvi. 22) seemingly to give greater force to a solemn denunciation by a reference to the expected coming of the Lord. In ecclesiastical usage it is sometimes found as part of the formula which designates the most extreme and solemn form of excommunication, that "until the coming of the Lord." In a Spanish canon (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 75, A.D. 633) the expression is plainly interpreted: "qui contra hanc nostram definitionem praesumpserit, anathema maranatha, hoc est, perditio in adventu Domini sit, et cum Juda Iscariote partem habeant et ipsi et socii." Compare xvi. Conc. Tolet. c. 10 (A.D. 693), and the Charta S. Amandi Tungr. Episc. quoted by Ducange, s. v. Similar forms of anathema are not uncommonly found in the statutes of Foundations against those who violate them. [MALEDICTION.] In all these cases the effect of the use of the word Maranatha seems to be, to exclude the offender from the communion of the church during his whole life, and to reserve him for the judgment of the Lord at His coming (Benedict XIV. de Synodo Dioec. x. 1, § 7). Suarez, however (de Censuris, Disp. viii. c. 2), holds that such a sentence is in all cases conditional on the continued impentence of the sinner. [EXCOMMUNICATION, I. 639.]

MARCUS (1), the Evangelist, was very generally commemorated, and his name occurs in the Greek, Latin, and Coptic fasti, but not always on the same day. Sept. 23 is assigned to his natalis at Alexandria in Hieron. Mart., but one MS. omits natalis (Acta SS. infra). The Cal. Byzant. commemorates Mark, "the apostle," on Jan. 11, and the Bollandists identify him with the evangelist, who is called in the same calendar, under Ap. 25, "evangelist and apostle," and in Basil. Menol., under the same day, "apostle and evangelist." April 25 is the day more usually assigned to him (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 258; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 344). The Sacramentary of Gregory observes his natalis on April 25, mentioning him in the collect for the day (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 84). His natalis is also observed in the Antiphony (ibid. 711). The reason of his not being mentioned in the canon at the prayer Communicantes is believed to be, as in the case of St. Luke, that the fact of his martyrdom is uncertain (Krazer, de Apost. Eccles. Liturg. 497). There was a church at Constantinople dedicated to him, erected by Theodosius the Great, near the district or ward named Taurus, at which his festival was observed (Georg. Codinus, de Antiq. Constant. 61; Boll. Acta SS. ut sup.). There was a church at Rome dedicated to St. Mark by pope Marcus, A.D. 337, restored and adorned by Hadrian I. and Gregory IV. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. ii. 119), and there was a chapel in the Basilica Vaticana dedicated to him by Marcus Barbus, patriarch of Aquileia (Ciampini, de Sac. Aedif. 68).

MARGARITA (Μαργαρίτης, the Pearl) is a term for the particle of the bread which is broken off and placed in the cup as a symbol of the union of the Body and Blood of Christ [Fraction, I. 687]. According to Daniel, however (Codex Liturg. iv. 208, 416), it is equally applied to all the particles which are placed in the cup for the purpose of administration to the faithful, according to the Eastern rite, by means of a Spoon. MARRIAGE. The subject will be dealt with in the present article under the three headings of I. MARRIAGE LAWS; II. MARRIAGE CEREMONIES; III. DIVORCE.

I. MARRIAGE LAWS. The affirmative law of marriage, which has come down from the creation, and is written in the hearts of all mankind, is simply that an unmarried adult man may marry an unmarried adult woman, provided that both parties are in their sound mind, both of them are willing to enter into the contract, and both of them capable of carrying out the primary end for which marriage is instituted. This affirmative law, however, is at once and everywhere limited by a crowd of prohibitive regulations, differing in different countries and at different times, but having as their general object—1, the prevention of incest; 2, the prevention of evils which might accrue (a) to the state, (b) to religion, (c) to the individuals concerned.

The first Jewish converts to Christianity, bound before their conversion by the prohibitions of the Mosaic law, continued to be equally bound by them when they had become Christians, except so far as any of the Mosaic regulations had been abrogated or modified by the authority of Christ and His apostles, or had become necessarily obsolete owing to a change of circumstances. The modifications made by our Lord in the Hebrew law of marriage and divorce, as it existed in his time, were two. He restored the rule of monogamy, and he disallowed of divorce, except upon the single ground of the wife's adultery. Apostolic authority added the regulation that Christians should marry none but Christians. The Mosaic rules that became obsolete were of slight importance, being of particular rather than of general application; such as the laws commanding levirate marriages, prohibiting the marriages of heiresses out of their tribe, and making regulations as to the marriage of the high priest. While these special laws fell into abeyance, the general prohibitions continued to be still binding upon the Jewish convert, together with the prohibition of polygamy, divorce (for any reason except one), and heathen marriage.

When the Gentile convert embraced Christianity he, in like manner, was already bound by the prohibitions which the Roman law had introduced with respect to marriage. After his conversion he was still bound by them, as being the law of the land, and not contrary to his Christian conscience. In addition, he was bound by the Mosaic prohibitions (with the same modifications and additions as the Jewish convert), the Jewish convert being analogously bound by the prohibitions of the Roman law, as being the law of the civilised world.

The first object of both laws, as in almost every other nation, was, as we have said, to prevent incest, which shocks the common instincts of humanity; and for this purpose marriage was prohibited between persons related or connected with each other within certain degrees. These prohibitions, and the enlargements or curtailments of them which were made in the early church, will be discussed under the heading of PROHIBITED DEGREES. Here we shall only treat of those other impediments which were introduced for the good of the state, or of the church, or of the contracting parties.

In the 13th century the schoolmen codified the impediments to marriage which then existed in the church; and their code has been accepted and acted upon by the greater part of Western Christendom down to the present day. It is contained in the five following lines, which are given in the Theologia Moralis of Saint Alfonso de Liguori (lib. vi. § 1008), as embodying the rules which regulate present practice:—

- i. Error, ii. Conditio, iii. Votum, iv. Cognatio, v. Crimen.
- vi. Cultus Disparitas, vii. Vis, viii. Ordo, ix. Ligamen, x. Honestas.

- xi. Aetas, xii. Affinis, xiii. Si clandestinus, xiv. et Impos.
 xv. Raptave sit mulier nec parti reddita tutae. Haec socianda vetant connubia, facta retractant.

From the 13th century onwards these impediments have more or less been regarded as nullifying marriage. It will be seen that the first, the seventh, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth are contrary to what we have termed the primary law of marriage, which postulates on both sides a knowledge of what is being transacted, willingness, and capacity. The second, which forbids marriage between persons differing in condition, was introduced by the state, and for state purposes. The third, the sixth, and the eighth originate in the supposed good of the church. The fourth and the twelfth have for their object the prevention of incest. The remainder are intended as safeguards to one of the parties concerned. We will pass each of these impediments shortly in review, inasmuch as they existed though they were not formalised in early times.

i. Error. This impediment required no canons for its establishment. If the mistake affected the substantial of the marriage, such as a mistake with respect to the person, it ipso facto invalidated a marriage, as there could be no marriage where sufficient knowledge was wanting. If it had to do only with the quality or circumstances and accidents of the marriage, it did not invalidate it during the period with which we are dealing, except in the cases which have to be mentioned under the next heading.

ii. Conditio. Under this head three questions arise: the marriage of slaves with slaves; the marriage of free men with slaves; the marriage of persons of a higher rank with those that were of a rank lower than themselves. With regard to the marriage of slaves with slaves the first converts found the two laws to which they paid respect in conflict with one another. According to the Roman law, there could be no such thing as the marriage of a slave: he was a thing, not a person, and the utmost he could attain to was contubernium, not connubium, whereas the Hebrew law recognised in the slave a capacity of contracting marriage.^a We can trace a struggle between the Roman and the Hebrew principle in the early church, but the genius of Christianity was such as necessarily to cause the more humane principle to triumph. The judgment of the church appears in the Apostolical Constitutions, which command a master to give his consent to the marriage of slaves (lib. viii. c. 32).^c Slaves therefore might marry, but a condition of their doing so was the express consent of their master. This is repeated in St. Basil's Second Canonical Epistle to Amphilochius (Op. tom. iii. p. 296, Paris, 1730), which pronounces that "the contracts made by those who belong to others are of no force" (can. xl.), except when made by the consent of their master. This became the law of the early church. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, ruled that slaves who put themselves under the protection of the church with a view to getting married, were "to be restored to their parents or masters, as the case might be, and made to promise that they would separate, liberty being granted to the parents and masters to unite them afterwards in marriage if they thought proper" (can. xxiv., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1440). The second council of Châlons, A.D. 813, pronounced that the marriages of slaves belonging to different masters were not to be nullified, if once the masters had consented (can. xxx., ibid. tom. iv. p. 1036).

The legality of marriages between freemen and slaves was not so easily allowed, inspiring as they did a repugnance which was never wholly overcome. At the beginning of the third century bishop Callistus, having himself been a slave, attempted to obtain the sanction of the church at Rome for the marriage of free-born women with slaves. But he did not succeed; and we find Hippolytus treating his attempt as matter for a passionate accusation against him (see Döllinger, Hippolytus and Callistus, p. 147, Eng. tr. Edinb. 1876). The Apostolical Constitutions, which recognise the propriety of the marriage of slaves with slaves, do not permit the marriage of a freeman with a slave. "If a believer has a slave concubine, let him give her up, and lawfully marry a wife. If he has a freewoman for a concubine, let him take her for his legitimate wife" (Apostol. Const. lib. viii. c. 32). This principle is again laid down in still harsher form by pope Leo I. A.D. 443 (Epist. ad Rusticum Narbonens. Resp. vi., Op. p. 408, Paris, 1675). Some Welsh canons of the 7th century recognise marriage between a man and his female slave, and in case it has taken place forbid him afterwards to sell her; if he attempts to sell her, he is to be condemned, and the slave-wife put under the protection of the priest (Canones Wallici, can. lx. in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 137).^b The 17th of the Capitula of Theodore of Canterbury, as given by Harduin (Concil. tom. iii. p. 1773), declares that "a man of free birth ought to marry a woman of free birth." The form of the expression "ought to" (debet) implies that at the date of that canon the feeling against slave marriages had grown less strong than it had been, but we cannot be sure what that date is, as the canon is not Theodore's (see Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 210).^c Among the genuine canons of Theodore, A.D. 686, are found two, one of which recognises the validity of marriage between a freeman and a slave, and forbids the husband to dismiss his wife if the consent of both parties had been originally given to the marriage (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xiii. § 5), while the other still sees such a gulf fixed between the freed and the slave that it allows husbands or wives

^b The place and date of these canons is somewhat uncertain, and the canon given above is found in only one of the two MSS. from which they are printed.

^c The only trustworthy copies of Theodore's Penitential are those of Wasserscheleben, in his Lie Bussordnungen der Abendländischen Kirche (Halle, 1851), and of Haddan and Stubbs, in their learned and accurate edition of the Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxf. 1871).

^a Contubernium was a concubinage, or permanent marriage-relation, between one man and one woman, and recognised by the law as marriage. Even that was forbidden to their slaves by many masters (see Plutarch, Cato Maj. c. 21); and when not forbidden it was commonly impossible, as the male slaves in Rome were about five times as many as the female slaves.

who have gained their freedom to dismiss their consorts, if the latter cannot be redeemed from slavery, and to marry freeborn persons instead (ibid. § 4, Haddan and Stubbs' Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 202). A third canon rules that if a man has reduced himself to slavery by crime, his wife may at the end of a year marry another man if she has herself been hitherto only once married (ibid. cap. xii. § 8, p. 299). The feeling against marriage with slaves (naturally stronger in respect to the marriage of freeborn women with male slaves than of freemen with female slaves) found its most barefaced and reckless expression in some of the Barbarian Codes. By the laws of the Visigoths (lib. iii. tit. ii. c. 2, in Canciani, Leges Barbarorum, vol. iv. p. 91) judges were commanded immediately to separate a freewoman from her slave or freedman whom she had married, as guilty of an atrocious and shocking crime, for which she and her paramour were to be burnt; and it was further enacted that if she married the slave of another she and her husband were to receive a hundred stripes, which were to be thrice repeated (c. 3). The Roman law was not so severe as this. It is true that a senatus consultum of the year 52 had enacted that if a freewoman formed a permanent marriage relation or contubernium (she could not contract a legal marriage) with a slave, without permission from the latter's master, she should herself become the property of the master (Tacit. Annal. xii. 53); and a freedman who aspired to marry his patrona was liable to be sent to the mines or the public works (Paul. Sent. ii. t. 29); and by a law of Constantine a decurio who married another man's slave was ordered to be banished, while the woman was to be sent to the mines (Cod. Theod. lib. xii. tit. i. leg. 6). But even these penalties do not equal those of the Barbarian Code in severity, and they were more or less such as might be evaded. Nor does there seem to have been any desire to enforce them harshly. So early as the time of Hadrian the children of a freewoman and a slave were allowed to be regarded and treated as free (Gaius, i. 84). When the 6th century is reached, we find Justinian appointing, in case a master gave his slave in marriage to a freeman as being a freewoman, not that the marriage should be regarded as null and void (which would undoubtedly have been the earlier ruling), but that the slave should thereby be constituted free, and the marriage should hold good (Auth. Collat. iv. tit. i., Novell. xi., Corp. Juris Civilis, tom. ii. pt. 2, p. 125). By the Carolingian era the repugnance entertained to these marriages had greatly abated. The councils of Vermerie (can. xiii.) and of Compiègne (can. v.), A.D. 753 and 757, admit and enforce the legality of marriages deliberately entered into between the free and the slave, whether the man or the woman were the slave. But if a man married a slave under the apprehension that she was free, the error was considered to affect the substance of the contract, and the marriage was thereby invalidated, by the legislation both of Justinian (Novell. xxii. c. 10, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. pars 2, p. 125) and of the Carolingians (Concil. Vermeriense, can. vi.; Concil. Compendiense, can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. pp. 1992, 2005). [CONSENT TO MARRIAGE; CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.]

The third set of cases to which this Impediment applied was that of marriages between persons of dissimilar rank and position. The Julian and Papian law had forbidden the marriage of senators, their sons and daughters, and the descendants of their sons, with freedwomen, or with women of low degree, and these marriages were declared null and void under Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. The slave-born bishop of Rome, Callistus, would seem, from a charge made against him by Hippolytus, to have attempted to run counter to this legislation by giving an ecclesiastical sanction to them. By very slow degrees, it is probable, that public opinion within the Christian body veered round, until it became favourable to them; but the prohibition continued to be maintained on grounds of state policy by the Christian emperors, as well as by their predecessors. Constantine declares that any attempt to treat the issue of such marriages as legitimate subjects the father, if he be a senator or high official, to the penalties of infamy and outlawry (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xxv. leg. 1). Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 454, following in the steps of Constantine, define the forbidden marriages to be those with a slave or the daughter of a slave, with a freedwoman or the daughter of a freedwoman, with an actress or the daughter of an actress, with a tavern-keeper or the daughter of a tavern-keeper, or with the daughter of a procurer, or of a gladiator, or of a huckster (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. v. leg. 7, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 425). If a senator or the son of a senator married within these prohibited classes, his children, being regarded spuri, followed the position of their mother, and in the eye of the law he was not married at all. Nay, more, by the Papian law, if a man with a freedwoman for his wife was created a senator, his marriage was thereby dissolved. Justinian softened the harshness of this legislation, which became more and more insupportable as the dignity of the senate was more and more lowered (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. legg. 23 seq.); and by degrees the impediment came to be regarded as less and less imperative, though a perverted application of it continues to have a baneful operation throughout the greater part of Europe to the present day. See the Theologia Moralis of St. Alfonso de' Liguori, iv. 644.

iii. Votum. We may distinguish six classes of religious women, bound, in different degrees of strictness, by a vow or understanding which caused an impediment to marriage,—the widows, the πρεσβύτιδες, the virgins, the devotees, the nuns, the deaconesses. The special duties of each of these classes will be found designated in the several articles devoted to them. It is enough here to say that the πρεσβύτιδες probably formed the elder division of the widows (see Hefele's note on the eleventh canon of the Council of Laodicea, Hist. of Councils, vol. ii. p. 306, Eng. tr. 1876); that the virgins did not differ essentially from the widows except in respect to the life that they had led before entering the order; that the deaconesses were generally, but not necessarily, selected from the widows or the virgins; that the devota was a woman living in her father's household, or with some respectable woman (Council of Hippo, A.D. 393, can. xxxi.), but given up more or less formally to the service of God; while the nun made one of a religious community living together under rule. There can be little doubt that the members of each of these classes were from the beginning bound to celibacy by the public opinion of the church, which they would themselves have shared. Morally there is little distinction between such an obligation recognised by the conscience and a formal vow. Nor is it possible to fix the time when the former slid into the latter. At first the obligation was based upon the idea that the unmarried were more free than the married to devote themselves to spiritual works, and also upon a widely spread sentiment that a celibate life was one of superior sanctity (see Justin. Apol. i. 29, p. 61, Paris, 1742; Athenag. Legat. c. xxxiii. p. 311, Paris, 1742). Before long another idea was attached to the celibate state; that the virgins were the spouses of the church and therefore of Christ. This notion does not appear in the 13th canon of the Council of Elvira, A.D. 304 (de Virginibus Deo sanctis), nor in canon xxvii. of the same council, nor in the 19th canon of the Council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, dealing with the same subject; but it is found when we reach the first Council of Valencia, A.D. 374, which condemns those who, after they have been devoted to God, turn to earthly marriages (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 196), and in Optatus, who wrote about the year 370 (de Schism. Don. lib. vi. p. 95, ed. Dupin). It is also found, as might be expected, in Tertullian (de Virg. Vel. cap. xv.). In the 5th century it was generally accepted (see St. Augustine, Tract. ix. in John ii., Op. tom. iii. p. 1459, ed. Migne; St. Jerome, adv. Jovin. lib. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 156; St. Chrysostom, ad Theod. Laps., Op. tom. i. p. 38, Paris, 1718), and it was symbolised by the acceptance of a veil, velatio being used, as we shall see presently, as a synonym of matrimony. Pope Innocent, in his letter to Victricius, distinguishes clearly between the virgins who had taken the veil, and those virgins who, without taking the veil, had promised to embrace the celibate life. The former are in an analogous position to that of married women, and if they marry are to be treated as adulteresses and not admitted to penance. The latter are in the position of betrothed women, and are to do penance "for some time," for breaking their promise to the heavenly spouse (caps. xii., xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1002). From the earliest times it is probable that any member of these classes that married was considered to have been guilty of a sin and of a scandal (1 Tim. v. 12), but the marriage was held as valid, as may be seen by St. Cyprian's statement that virgins who could not, or would not, persevere had but to marry (St. Cypr. Epist. IV. ad Pompon., Op. p. 3, ed. Fell, Oxon. 1682). As soon, however, as the idea of the spiritual marriage with Christ had taken possession of the mind of the church, the earthly marriage was regarded as no marriage at all. The council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, requires that any devotæ who marry should be subjected to penance for a year (can. xix.); the council of Valence, A.D. 374, that they should be suspended from communion, and not be re-admitted to it, nisi planè satisfecerint Deo (can. ii.). St. Basil, A.D. 375, says that the old penalty of one year's suspension was too light, and that now virgins ought not to be admitted to communion while continuing in marriage (Epist. Canon. II. can. xvii.). The first council of Toledo, A.D. 400, rules that such persons are not to be admitted to penance unless they have separated from their husbands (can. xvi.); and that if they are the daughters of a bishop, priest, or deacon, their parents may no longer associate with them (can. xix.). A Roman council under Innocent I., A.D. 402, imposes a penance of many years (can. i.). A synod, called after St. Patrick, A.D. 450 (can. xvii.), and the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xvi.), excommunicate them, though the latter council allows mercy to be shewn to them by the bishop. Pope Gelasius, A.D. 492, orders that any who marry a consecrated virgin shall be excommunicated for life (Epist. v. cap. xx., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 903). Pope Symmachus, A.D. 498, forbids the marriage, and orders that the parties to it be suspended (ad Caesar. Resp. iv. 5, ibid. p. 958). The penalty of life-long suspension or excommunication is re-enacted by the council of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (can. xii.), by the so-called fourth council of Carthage in the 6th century (can. civ.), by the fifth council of Paris at the beginning of the 7th century (can. xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 553), and by other late councils. Deaconesses who marry are excommunicated by the second council of Orleans, A.D. 533 (can. xvii.), and Justinian enacted that their marriage should cause the forfeiture both of life and goods (Novell. vi. 6, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. par. 2, p. 37). The same Novella, however, forbids the ordination of a deaconess under fifty years of age; and of course at such an advanced age her temptation to marry was much diminished. In the 4th century we find the age for virgins taking the veil fixed at twenty-five by the council of Milevis (can. xxvi., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1222). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, forbids nuns to be veiled before they were forty (can. xix.); and a novella of Leo and Majorian protects the rights of those who had been induced to take vows of virginity before that age (Novell. viii., ad calc. Cod. Theod. tom. vi. p. 36). [DEVOTÆ.]

The case was the same with men as with women. There were men who occupied an analogous position to that of the devotæ, and the same rules were applied to them as to the devotæ. Whoever has declared that he will not take a wife from a resolution of remaining in chastity should continue a celibate, says Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. iii. c. 12). He who has made a promise of virginity and breaks it must undergo a year's penance, says the council of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (can. xix.); must be treated as guilty of fornication, that is, undergo four years' penance, says St. Basil, A.D. 375 (Epist. Canon. II., can. xix.); must undergo public penance, says St. Leo, A.D. 443 (Epist. ad Rustic. Resp. 14, Op. p. 410); must be excommunicated, but may be restored by the bishop's humanity, says the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xvi.), (Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 607); must be separated from his wife by the judge, who must be excommunicated if he will not do it, says the second council of Tours, A.D. 567 (can. xv., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 360); must undergo the penalty due for fornication, says the council in Trullo, A.D. 692 (can. xlv., ibid. p. 680). After the covenant that they have made with God, the marriage of monks is nothing else than fornication, says John Damascene (in Sac. Par., Op. tom. ii. p. 701, ed. Lequien). An increasing rigour of sentiment is exhibited in the West, until we reach the second Lateran council under Innocent II., A.D. 1139, when, according to Basil Pontius' statement (de Matr. vii. 17), which Van Espen declares to be non sine fundamento, the monk's and nun's marriage was, for the first time, pronounced absolutely null. The words of the council are:—"To enlarge the law of continence and God-pleasing cleanness of life in ecclesiastical persons and sacred orders, we appoint that bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, regular canons, and monks and professed religious, who have broken their holy purpose and government in order to couple wives to themselves, be separated. For such coupling as this, which is known to be contracted against ecclesiastical rule, we do not count to be marriage. And when they have been separated from one another, they are to do proper penance for such great excesses. And we decree that the same rule is to be observed about nuns (sanctimoniales foeminae) if they have attempted to marry, which God forbid that any should do" (cans. vii. viii., Hard. Concil. tom. vii. p. 1209). [CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.]

iv. Cognatio. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

v. Crimen. The two offences indicated by this heading are the murder of a husband or wife, committed with a view to a second marriage, and adultery accompanied with a promise of future marriage. This impediment no doubt existed at all times, but it is not specifically named in early times, perhaps because, according to the early discipline, murder and adultery disqualified a penitent from marriage altogether during the whole time of his or her penance, and, therefore, à fortiori, disqualified from a marriage to which the way had been smoothed by such crimes. The council of Friuli, A.D. 791, decreed that no woman put away for adultery was to be again married to any one whatever, even after her husband's death (can. x., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 860). The council of Vermerie, A.D. 753, declares that "if a man's wife has entered into a conspiracy against his life, and he has killed one of the conspirators in self-defence, he may put her away." Later copies of the acts of the council add that "after the death of his wife he may marry again, and that the wife is to be subjected to penance, and never allowed to remarry" (can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1990). The first council of Tribur, A.D. 895, lays down the general rule prohibiting marriage between a man and a married woman with whom he has committed adultery, on account of a scandal that had lately occurred, a man having persuaded a woman to sin on the promise, confirmed by oath, that he would marry her if her husband died, a thing described as res execrabilis et catholicis omnibus detestanda (can. xi., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 452).

vi. Cultus disparitas. The marriage of Hebrews with any but Hebrews was forbidden by patriarchal rule and by Levitical law (Gen. xxiv. 3; Ex. xxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3; 1 Kings xi. 2; Ez. ix. 2), the object of the prohibition being to preserve both the race and the religion uncontaminated. In Christianity there is no favoured race to be preserved, but the religious ground of the regulation remains untouched. Accordingly

St. Paul adapted the existing Jewish law to changed circumstances by ruling that marriage should only be "in the Lord" (1 Cor. vii. 39), that is, that Christians should marry none but Christians. St. Paul's command is regarded as imperative by the early Fathers, as Tertullian (cont. Marc. lib. v., Op. p. 469); Cyprian (Testimon. lib. iii. c. 62, Op. p. 323, Paris, 1726); St. Jerome (Epist. xci. ad Ageruchium, de Monogamia, Op. tom. iv. p. 742, Paris, 1706); St. Ambrose (de Abrahamo, lib. i. c. ix., Op. tom. i. p. 309, Paris, 1686); St. Augustine, Epist. cclv., al. 234, ad Rusticum, Op. tom. ii. p. 882, Paris, 1679: by councils, as that of Elvira, A.D. 313 (Conc. Elib. cans. xv. xvi., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 252); the first council of Arles, A.D. 314 (Conc. Arelat. i. can. xi., ibid. p. 265); that of Laodicea, A.D. 372 (Conc. Laod. can. x., ibid. p. 783); that of Agde, A.D. 506 (Conc. Agath. can. lxvii., ibid. tom. ii. p. 1005); the second of Orleans, A.D. 533 (Conc. Aurel. ii. can. xix., ibid. p. 1176); the fourth of Toledo, A.D. 633 (Conc. Tolet. iv. can. lxiii., ibid. tom. iii. p. 59): and by Imperial legislation, which forbids intermarriage with Jews as a capital crime (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 7, leg. 2; lib. xvi. tit. 8, leg. 6). St. Ambrose and the councils of Elvira, Agde, Laodicea, and in Trullo (can. lxix.), enlarge the prohibition so as to make it apply to heretics as well as to the unbaptized. On the other hand, the Council of Hippo, A.D. 393 (can. xii.) and the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (can. xiv.) seem, by specifying, to confine the prohibition of such marriages to the sons and daughters of bishops, priests, and inferior clergy. The general law was, as might be expected, very frequently set at naught. St. Jerome bursts out with a fiery invective against the women of his day, of whom he says with a rhetorical exaggeration that "the greater part (pleraque), despising the apostle's command, marry heathens" (adv. Jovin. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 152). St. Augustine, in his work de Fide et Operibus (cap. xix., Op. tom. vi. p. 220, ed. Migne), says likewise that in his time marriage with unbelievers had ceased to be regarded as a sin; and he himself holds that it ought not to preclude from admission to baptism. St. Augustine's mother Monica, Clothilda wife of Clovis, Bertha wife of Ethelbert, and Ethelburga wife of Edwin, are conspicuous instances of the rule being transgressed to the advantage of Christianity.

vii. Vis. This impediment, like error, ipso facto invalidates marriage, the essence of which consists of its being a free contract made and declared. Physical violence, or moral violence, carried to such an extent as to interfere with the freedom of action, exercised on either party to the contract, destroys that liberty of the will which is a condition of the contract being valid. Where there was violence there could be no free consent; where no free consent, no contract; where no contract, no marriage. A well-known instance in point is the marriage of Jane of Navarre with the duke of Cleves, which, after the eleven years old maiden had been carried to church by her uncle, the Constable of Montmorency, and compelled to go through the wedding, was broken off on the ground that the bride had not consented.

It was, however, a question whether it was the consent of the woman, or of the woman's relations, that was necessary. Among the Hebrews the father was regarded as having the right of giving his daughter in marriage (Gen. xxiv. 51). The early Roman law looked upon wife and children as goods, belonging to the husband and father. Consequently there was room for violence to be employed towards one of the contracting parties with a view to force her consent, which the law would not have recognised as violence. The claim of the woman to an independent voice was to a great extent ignored. "The girl," says St. Ambrose of Rebecca, whom he holds up herein as an example, "is not consulted about her espousals, for she awaits the judgment of her parents; inasmuch as a girl's modesty will not allow her to choose a husband" (de Abrah. lib. i. cap. ult., Op. tom. i. p. 312, Paris, 1686), and he quotes with approbation Euripides' lines:—

Νυμφευμάτων μὲν τῶν ἐμῶν πατὴρ ἐμὸς
Μέριμνον ἔξει, κ' οὐκ ἐμὸν κρίνουν τάδε.

The second canonical letter from Basil to Amphilochius (Op. tom. iii. p. 296) calls marriages entered into without a father's sanction by the harsh name of fornication (can. xli.), and rules that even after reconciliation with the parents, three years' penance is to be done by the daughter (can. xxxviii.). The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, says that they should be regarded in the light of captivity or bondage rather than marriage (can. xxii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1439). An Irish council in the time of St. Patrick, about the year 450, lays it down that the will of the girl is to be inquired of the father, and that the girl is to do what her father chooses, inasmuch as man is the head of the woman (can. xxvii., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1796). See also St. Augustine (Epist. clv. al. 233, Op. tom. ii. p. 1069, ed. Migne). The imperial laws were also very strict, as those of the heathen emperors had been. Constantius and Constans made clandestine marriages of this nature a capital offence (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. xxiv. legg. 1, 2). Even widows under the age of 25 were forbidden by a law of Valentinian and Gratian to marry without their parents' consent (ibid. lib. iii. tit. vii. leg. 1); and St. Ambrose desires young widows to leave the choice of their second husbands to their parents (de Abraham. lib. i. cap. ult., Op. tom. i. p. 312). The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, enacts that widows are to be allowed free choice of their husbands, and that girls are not to be compelled to accept husbands against the will of their parents or themselves (can. x., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 481). The Penitential of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, ordains that a father may give his daughter in marriage as he will until she is sixteen or seventeen, after which she must not be married without her own consent (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 36).

Nevertheless the independent right of each of the contracting parties to give or withhold his or her consent was not altogether ignored. A law of Diocletian and Maximin declares that none are to be compelled to marry (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 14, Corp. Juris. tom. ii. p. 418), and this liberty was testified to in the forms and ceremonies used in the celebration of marriages.

As a protection against violence, it was also enacted that no guardian might marry an orphan to whom he was guardian during her minority (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. viii. leg. 1), and that no governor of a province might marry any woman subject to his control during the time of his administration (ibid. lib. iii. tit. vi. leg. 1).

viii. Ordo. St. Paul desired Timothy and Titus to select for the ministry persons who were "men of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2-12; Tit. i. 6). The meaning of the apostle's words is ambiguous. By some they are regarded as enjoining that the persons selected for the ministry should be but once married; by others, that they should not have put away their wives, and have taken others in the lifetime of their first wives; by others, that they should not be men who were unfaithful to their wife (whether a first, or a second, or a third wife) by keeping a concubine, according to a common Roman practice, or other laxity of life; by others, that they should not be polygamists, in accordance with Hebrew customs. The last of these four interpretations is supported by the authority of St. Chrysostom (Hom. in 1 Tim. iii. 2, Op. tom. xi. p. 599, Paris, 1734); the third, which does not exclude the fourth, is the exposition of Theodore of Mopsuestia (Catenae Graec. Patr. in N. T. tom. viii. p. 23, ed. Cramer) and of Theodoret (Com. in 1 Tim. iii. 2, Op. tom. i. p. 474, Paris, 1642). The authorities and arguments for the second interpretation may be seen at length in Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Διγαμία. The thought underlying St. Chrysostom's interpretation is that, whereas polygamy was allowed by the Jews, and was still practised, as shewn by the example of Herod, and proved by the testimony of Justin (Dial. cum Tryph., Op. tom. ii. 442, 460, ed. Otto), it might have been the purpose of the apostle to allow a converted Jew, who was a polygamist, to live as a layman without repudiating his existing wives, but not to allow a man in such a position to be a presbyter, "for the Jews," says St. Chrysostom, "might proceed to second nuptials and have two wives together" (in 1 Tim. iii. 2).^d The exposition of Theodore and Theodoret is in harmony with the words of St. Paul, which literally translated mean "a man of one woman," and need bear no further signification than one who was faithful to the marriage tie, and "kept himself only to his wife so long as they both did live" (Marriage Service). It is also in better harmony with St. Paul's argument ("one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?"), than that which sees in the text only a prohibition of a second marriage. Theodoret says that he deliberately adopts the view of those who held "that the holy apostle declares the man who lives contentedly with one wife is worthy of ordination, and that he is not forbidding second marriages, which he has often recommended" (in 1 Tim. iii. 2). The general understanding, however, of the words, which was accepted in the early church, was that St. Paul intended to exclude Digamists from the ministry; and his instruction to Timothy, thus understood, became converted into a rule of church discipline. See the Apostolical Canons (can. xvii.); the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 17); Origen (Hom. xvii. in Luc., Op. tom. iii. p. 953, Paris, 1740, who says plainly, "Neither bishop, priest, deacon, nor widow must be twice married"; St. Ambrose (de Off. i. 50, § 257, Op. tom. ii. p. 66, Paris, 1690); St. Augustine (de Bono Conjug. c. xviii., Op. tom. vi. p. 387, ed. Migne); St. Epiphanius (Haer. lix. 4, Op. tom. i. p. 496, Paris, 1622); and the councils of Angiers, A.D. 455 (can. xi., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 480); Agde, A.D. 506 (can. i. ibid. p. 997); Arles, iv. A.D. 524 (can. iii. ibid. p. 1070). St. Paul's injunction, thus interpreted, has been continuously the rule of the Oriental church both positively and negatively, except so far as it has been violated on the positive side by the Council in Trullo, A.D. 692, forbidding the marriage of bishops, which St. Paul appears not only to have permitted, but to have recommended, if not enjoined, in order that the bishop's power of ruling might have been tested in a smaller sphere before he was promoted to a large one (Concil. in Trullo, can. xlvi., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1679).

^d Döllinger's argument to the contrary (Hippolytus and Callistus, c. iii.), grounded on the fact that a simultaneous second marriage was contrary to the law of the Roman empire, is of little weight; for the contemptuous tolerance of the Roman magistrate would not have condescended to interfere with a Jew's acting in accordance with his own law (Cf. Acts xviii. 15, xxv. 19): he would have contented himself with ignoring the marriage, and regarding the issue of it as spurious in case any question about it arose. The second marriage would in his eyes have been a contubernium such as many of his own fellow-countrymen had entered into. Besides, many Jews would have been converted to Christianity who had married while living in the jurisdiction of the Herods, and it is impossible to believe that the Roman magistrates would have troubled themselves with the internal oeconomy of their households.

For some time before the Christian era a change of sentiment as to the relative excellence of the married and single life had been growing up among a section of Jews. The national feeling was strongly in favour of marriage, and a man who was unmarried or without children was looked upon as disgraced (see the legend of Joachim and Anna in the Protevangelion). But the spirit of asceticism, cherished by the Essenes, led to an admiration of celibacy, of which no traces are to be found in the Old Testament; so that, instead of a shame, it became an honour to be unmarried and childless. In the early church this spirit, at first exhibiting itself only to be condemned in the Encratites (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv. 29; St. Aug. de Haeres. xxv.), the Apostolici (St. Aug. de Haeres. xl.), the Manichees (ibid. xlv.), the Hieracians (ibid. xlvii.), the Eustathians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. 1143; Council of Gangra, cans. i. ix. x. xiv.), struggled with a healthier feeling, till at length it stifled the latter.

Another cause was working in the same direction. The days of chivalry were not yet; and we cannot but notice, even in the greatest of the Christian fathers, a lamentably low estimate of woman, and consequently of the marriage relationship. Even St. Augustine can see no justification for marriage, except in a grave desire deliberately adopted of having children (Serm. ix. li., Op. tom. v. pp. 88, 345, ed. Migne); and, in accordance with this view, all married intercourse, except for this single purpose, is harshly condemned. If marriage is sought after for the sake of children, it is justifiable; if entered into as a remedium to avoid worse evils, it is pardonable; the idea of "the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity," hardly existed, and could hardly yet exist. In the decline of the Roman empire, woman was not a helpmeet for man, and few traces are to be found of these graceful conceptions which Western imagination has grouped round wedded love and home affections. The result was that the gross, coarse, material, carnal side of marriage being alone apprehended, those who sought to lead a spiritual life, that is, above all, the clergy, instead of "adorning and beautifying that holy estate," and lifting it up with themselves into a higher sphere and a purer atmosphere, regarded it rather as a necessary evil to be shunned by those who aimed at a holier life than that of the majority.

Four questions arose:—1. Whether a clergyman might marry after ordination; 2. Whether after ordination he must cease to cohabit with his wife whom he had married before ordination; 3. Whether a man already married might be ordained; 4. Whether a twice married man might be ordained.

On the first question the East and West agreed in returning a negative answer, so far as bishops and presbyters were concerned. In the first half of the 3rd century pope Callistus is charged by Hippolytus with introducing the innovation of allowing clergymen to marry after they were in orders. Döllinger supposes him to have sanctioned no more than the marriage of acolyths, hypodiaconi (the title still borne by subdeacons), and, perhaps, deacons. But this is unlikely, or Hippolytus would not have made it so serious a charge against him. Callistus probably allowed his presbyters and deacons to marry, and the practice continued after his death among his special followers and disciples—his "school," as Hippolytus calls them (ὁ δὲ διαμένει τὸ διδασκαλεῖον φυλάττον τὰ ἔθη καὶ τὴν παράδοσιν). but it did not prevail against the opposite custom. The Council of Ancyra, A.D. 314, allows deacons only to marry, and that if at the time of their ordination they had given notice of their intention to do so (can. x.). The Apostolical Canons restrict the liberty of marriage after ordination to readers and singers (can. xxv.). Presbyters are ordered by the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, to remain unmarried if they are unmarried at the time of their ordination (can. i.). Bishops, priests, and deacons are ordered to remain unmarried by a Roman council under Innocent I., A.D. 402 (can. iii.). The only authoritative sanction for marriage after ordination is found in a decree of a Nestorian synod held under Barsumas, archbishop of Nisibis, towards the end of the 5th century.

On the second question, whether clergy married at the time of their ordination were to cease cohabitation, there gradually developed itself one of the disciplinary differences which afterwards declared themselves between the East and West. The Eastern church has never forbidden marriage before ordination to its presbyters, and has never laid upon them the burden of abstinence from their wives; and there is no doubt that the Eastern discipline in this respect was the discipline of the whole of the early church.

Thomassin, Natalis Alexander, the Bollandist Stilling, and Zaccaria assert that married asceticism prevailed from the beginning by apostolical precept, but they have no ground for their assertion. Tillemont acknowledges that for the first four or five hundred years it was not required, and De Marca argues that it grew up insensibly as a voluntary practice, and was first made binding by pope Siricius at the end of the 4th century.

The first authority on the question is Clement of Alexandria, who, in contrasting the practice of the church with that of the heretics of his day, speaks plainly of priest, deacon, and layman as "ἀνεπιλήπτως γάμω χρώμενος" (Stromat. lib. iii. 12, Op. p. 352, ed. Potter, Oxf. 1715), by which words he designates cohabitation,^e and towards the end of the same book he writes: Τί προς ταύτας εἰπεῖν ἔχουσι τὰς νομοθεσίας οἱ τὴν σποράν καὶ τὴν γένεσιν νομοσπτόμενοι; ἐπεὶ καὶ τὸν Ἐπίσκοπον τοῦ οἴκου καλῶς προϊσταμένον νομοθετεῖ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας ἀφηγησάθαι οἶκον δὲ κυριακὸν μῆας γενναίους συνίστησι συζυγία. His argument would be futile if he did not look upon the bishop, not only as married, but specifically as begetting children (Strom. iii. c. xviii., Op. p. 562). The opposite view was taken by Origen, as might be expected from the deed for which he is noted (Hom. xxiii. in Num., Op. tom. ii. p. 358); by Epiphanius, though he allows that a different practice prevailed (Haeres. lix. 4, Op. tom. i. p. 496); by St. Jerome (adv. Jovin. lib. i., Op. tom. iv. p. 175). The Apostolical Canons forbid bishops, presbyters, and deacons to separate from their wives on the pretext of piety on pain of deposition (can. vi.); but about a quarter of a century later was passed by the Spanish council of Elvira (A.D. 305) a canon which is regarded as the earliest injunction on the clergy to cease cohabitation (can. xxxiii.).^f An attempt was made to force this discipline on the whole church at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325, but it was frustrated by the firmness of Paphnutius. The spirit that dictated the attempt was not, however, extinguished. It became a fashion with some to hold aloof from the ministrations of a married presbyter in the holy communion, to such an extent that the council of Gangra, held about A.D. 350, had to anathematize those that did so (can. iv.). Pope Siricius's letter to Himerius (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 849), if genuine (it is so counted), gave expression and sanction to this unwholesome feeling, A.D. 385.^g A council held at Carthage under Genethlius, in 387 or 390, binds bishops, priests, and Levites to abstain from their wives (can. ii.), and the canon that it passed to this effect was taken into the Codex Canonum Ecclesiae Africanae (Hefele, viii. §§ 106, 121). Socrates, who wrote A.D. 439, names Heliodorus, bishop of Trica, as the person who had introduced into Thessaly the novelty of deposing clergy who lived with their wives, and he speaks of that custom prevailing in his day in Thessalonica, and in Macedonia and Hellas; but he declares it contrary to the otherwise universal custom of the Eastern church, where bishops and priests were left at liberty to act as they pleased in this respect, "for many of them have had children by their lawful wives during the time that they are bishops" (Hist. Eccles. v. 22, Op. p. 242, Oxon. 1844). The argument drawn from the incontrovertible fact that popes were the sons of clergymen, and that well-known bishops and priests were married, and that sons and daughters of bishops and presbyters are frequently referred to in the canons of councils, is generally eluded by assuming that, though married, the clergy did not cohabit with their wives after ordination; but the historian's statement cannot be thus put aside, confirmed as it is by overwhelming evidence. Gregory Nazianzen, his sister and brother, were probably born while their father was now a bishop: it is certain that they were born after their father was a priest (Carm. de Vita sua, l. 502); Cyprian charges Novatus, a priest, with cruelty to his wife, which caused her miscarriage (Epist. xlix.); and Synesius, as we know, only accepted his bishopric on the understanding that he was to be in no way separated from his wife. Nevertheless, as time proceeded, the liberty not only of cohabiting with, but of having, wives was extinguished, so far as bishops were concerned, in the East and West alike. Not so with regard to presbyters. In their case the discipline of the two halves of Christendom became more and more divergent. The East never yielded the right of their clergy being fathers of families if married before ordination. The council in Trullo speaks on this point with decision and warmth:—"As we know that the Roman church has ruled that candidates for the diaconate or the presbyterate are to make profession that they will no longer cohabit with their wives, we observing the ancient canon of apostolical perfection and order, declare the marriages of all in holy orders are to be henceforth accounted valid, and we refuse to forbid cohabitation, and will not deprive them of conjugal intercourse at proper times. Therefore, if a man is found fit to be ordained subdeacon, deacon, or presbyter, he is not to be refused on the ground of cohabiting with his wife. Nor at the time of ordination is anyone to be required to profess that he will abstain from intercourse with his lawful wife; lest we thus do dishonour to marriage, which was instituted by God and blessed by His presence, the gospel declaring aloud, 'What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder,' and the apostle teaching, 'Marriage is honourable Priests and Levites not to live with their wives,' and the fourth and fifth forbid the marriage of a clergyman with a widow, are spurious. They are given by I'efele (viii. § 105).

^e The Latin translation of the passage is as follows: "Jam vero unus quoque uxoris virum utique admittit, seu sit Presbyter, seu Diaconus, seu Laicus, utens matrimonio citra reprehensionem. Servabitur autem per filiorum procreationem." Binterim is driven into saying that "utens" applies only to "laicus," maintaining that otherwise the reading would be "utentes" and "servabuntur" (Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 259).

^f According to its grammatical construction this canon deposes from the ministry all clergy who refuse to live in wedlock with their wives. It is generally supposed that the wording is confused, and that it intends to prohibit what it seems to order. If it were construed grammatically it would be similar in its character to the fourth canon of the council of Gangra, mentioned a few lines lower down in the text.

^g The canons of a supposed council held at Rome by Siricius, A.D. 386, the ninth of which "advises (suademus) in all, and the bed undefiled,' and 'Art thou bound to a wife, seek not to be loosed.' . . . If, then, anyone in despite of the apostolical canons, be induced to forbid priests, deacons, and subdeacons to cohabit and hold intercourse with their lawful wives, let him be deposed. And, likewise, if any priest or deacon dismisses his wife on the pretext of piety, let him be excommunicated, and if he be obstinate, let him be deposed" (can. xiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1666). Meantime the West was growing stiffer and stiffer, Spain still leading the way. The first and the ninth councils of Toledo (canons i. x., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 990, tom. iii. p. 975) forbid cohabitation with increasing rigour, A.D. 400 and 655. The French councils of Arles II., A.D. 452 (can. xlv., Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 774), and of Mâcon, A.D. 584 (can. xi.), denounce the punishment of deposition; and Innocent I. in his letters to Victorius and to Exuperius (Hard. Concil. tom. i. pp. 1001, 1003), and Leo I. (Epist. ad Rusticum, Resp. iii., Op. p. 407) speak for Rome in the same sense. Such a discipline so severely enforced could only end in the prohibition of marriage altogether.

The third question, whether the married state and the clerical state were altogether incompatible, could not arise while St. Paul's teaching was still ringing in the ears of Christians, for St. Paul had commanded the selection of married men for priests and deacons (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), the reason of which command was explained by Clement of Alexandria to be that "they have learnt from their own households how to govern the church" (Strom. iii. 12); but it necessarily arose, and was necessarily answered in the affirmative, as soon as the cohabitation of the clergy with their wives had been authoritatively forbidden. When public opinion came to require that a married man should abstain from living with his wife, it was only a question of time how soon it would require him to have no wife at all; and to many the latter course would appear less revolting than the former. A one-sided development of the scriptural precepts contained in Matt. xix. 12, and in 1 Cor. vii. 1-7, necessarily led to the high estimate of celibacy for its own sake that is found in some early writers (see Ignatius, Epist. ad Polycarp. c. v.; Athenagoras, Legat. c. xxxiii.; Justin. Apol. x. xv.), and more naturally found its issue in the imposition of celibacy than of married asceticism. The arguments used from the time of Siricius onwards against cohabitation were of equal force against marriage. If it were true that holiness and abstinence from marriage intercourse were synonymous, and if it were true that the clergy were bound to be in a peculiar manner dedicated to holiness, the conclusion necessarily drawn was that the clergy should be unmarried. Siricius was the spiritual father of Damiani and Hildebrand. It is true that there was a long struggle, sometimes based by the opponents of celibacy on low and carnal motives; sometimes fought on the higher principle which brought into prominence those other scriptural injunctions which ought to limit the application commonly made of those precepts on which the idea of celibacy had grounded itself; sometimes, too, appealing to the practice of the earlier church, still perpetuated in the East. But the battle could not be a successful one unless the principles laid down by Siricius were repudiated, and the honour of married life and married intercourse vindicated. In 961 we find that "a great disturbance took place" in South Wales (as elsewhere) "because the priests were enjoined not to marry without the leave of the pope; so that it was considered best to allow matrimony to the priests" (Brut. y Tywysog. p. 28, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, i. 286). But in 1059 the West was ripe for the decree of the Roman council under Nicholas II., "Whatever priest, deacon, or subdeacon shall, after the constitution of our predecessor of blessed memory, the most holy pope Leo on clerical chastity, openly marry a concubine (wife), or not leave one that he has married, in the name of Almighty God and by the authority of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, we enjoin and utterly forbid to sing mass or read the gospel or epistle," &c. (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 1052). In the first Lateran Council under Callistus II., A.D. 1123, the word "wife" is introduced, together with that of "concubine." "We utterly forbid priests, deacons, and subdeacons to live with concubines and wives; and any other woman to be in the same house with them, except those whom the Council of Nice allowed on the ground of relationship, namely, mother, sister, aunt, and so on, about whom no suspicion can fairly arise" (can. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. vii. p. 1111). The Lateran Council appeals to the authority of the Council of Nice as though forbidding that which it deliberately refused to forbid.

The fourth question, whether a twice-married man might be ordained, was answered in the negative, being contrary to an ecclesiastical rule which, as we have stated above, was founded on a probably mistaken apprehension of the meaning of St. Paul's injunction to Timothy and Titus (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). Accordingly, although about the year 220 pope Callistus admitted twice or thrice married men to the Episcopate, the Presbyterate, and the Diaconate, such ordinations were forbidden by the Apostolical Canons (can. xvii.) and Constitutions (ii. 2, vi. 17), by St. Basil's canons (can. xii.), and by all the synods that dealt with the subject, except those held among the Nestorians. Here too, however, a difference of the discipline of the East and the West exhibited itself. The East, which, whenever it could be, was more human and less rigorist than the West, refused to count marriages which had taken place before baptism as disqualifications. Provided that a man had been but once married since his baptism he was eligible in the East to the priesthood, notwithstanding any marriage that he might have contracted as a heathen or as a catechumen (see Council in Trullo, can. iii.). Not so in the West. St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, popes Siricius and Innocent, the councils of Valence and Agde, agree in pronouncing that no such distinction can be recognised. Two marriages, whether before or after baptism, exclude from the ministry. The only voices raised in the West against this ruling are those of St. Jerome, who, in defending the regularity of bishop Carterius's consecration, declares that the world was full of such ordinations (Epist. lxi., Op. tom. i. p. 654, Paris, 1846), and of Gennadius of Marseilles (de Eccles. Dogm. c. lxxii. p. 38, ed. Elmenhorst). The rule, whether in its Eastern or Western form, being positive rather than moral, was constantly broken. (In proof of this, see Tertullian, de Exhortatione Castitatis, c. vii., Op. p. 522, Paris, 1675; and Hippolytus, Philosoph. ix. 12, for early times: a series of councils testifies to the same fact at a later period.) Sometimes a local custom to the contrary would arise, which maintained itself in opposition to the general rule. In the 5th century Theodore of Mopsuestia refused to be bound by a rule which, while it professed to pay deference to St. Paul's words, frustrated the purpose of the Apostle. Theodoret, following his lead, declared that he cared nothing for a practice, however general, which was based upon a false interpretation of St. Paul's command; and when the count Irenaeus had been made bishop of Tyre, though twice married, and thereupon an order came from the emperor to depose him as a digamist as well as a Nestorian, Theodoret wrote a letter justifying his consecration on the grounds that his consecrators had but followed the example of those who had gone before them, citing the instance of Alexander of Antioch and Acacius of Beroea, who had ordained Diogenes, though twice married, and that of Praulius of Jerusalem, who had ordained Dominus, bishop of Caesarea, under like circumstances. He asserted, too, that the consecration of the twice married Irenaeus had taken place with the full approval of Proclus of Constantinople, the chief ecclesiastics of Pontus, and the bishops of Palestine (see Epist. cx., Op. tom. iii. p. 979, Paris, 1642). But this uprising of common sense against harsh rule did not maintain itself. The instances given by Theodoret are exceptions, which only prove the general (though not universal) rule, just as the reiterated canons of councils prove its frequent transgression.

The rule against marrying a widow or a divorced woman was as stringent as that against a second marriage. Special rules of conduct were applicable to the clergyman's wife as well as to the clergyman. The wife of one who was to be ordained must not have been married to a previous husband (see the Apostolical Canons and Constitutions in the places above cited, the fourth council of Carthage, can. lxix., &c.), nor might she marry again after her husband's death. (See the first council of Toledo, held A.D. 400, can. xviii.; the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, can. xvi.; and the council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, can. iii.) In the latter respect the widows of kings were in Spain placed in the same condition as the widows of clergymen. The thirteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 683, forbids their remarriage as a facinus execrabile (can. v., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1741), and the third council of Saragossa orders them to retire to a convent (can. v., Concil. CaesarAugustanum III., Hard. ibid. p. 1784). [CELIBACY; DIGAMY.]

ix. Ligamen. The prohibition of polygamy by our Lord and the Roman law and practice of monogamy (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. v. lig. 2) were sufficient to prevent any question being raised of the lawfulness of simultaneous marriages. An existing marriage was an insuperable impediment to contracting a second marriage. Here and there exceptions to the rule are found, not in the earliest times, resting upon the ground of conjugal impotency (for which see below), and of enforced or voluntary desertion. By the civil law a soldier's wife was permitted to marry again after her husband had been absent four years (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 7). But the Council in Trullo, following St. Basil, determines that the wife must wait till she was certified of her husband's death, however long a time might elapse (can. xciii.). On the other hand, the council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, enacts that if a wife will not accompany her husband who has been compelled to follow his lord into another land, the husband may marry again if he sees no hope of returning home, submitting at the same time to do penance (can. ix., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1991). Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, pronounces that if a wife has been carried away by the enemy so that her husband cannot redeem her, he may marry another woman after one year; if there is a chance of redeeming her, he is to wait five years, and the wife in the analogous position is to do likewise, before remarrying. He adds, that if the first wife returns from captivity her husband is to take her back and dismiss his second wife; and the wife likewise (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. §§ 20-22); but a subsequent clause reverses this ruling, and orders that the wife on her return is not to be taken back by her husband, but that she may marry another man, if she has been only once married (ibid. § 24). Theodore's Capitula, as given by Harduin (Concil. tom. iii. p. 1778) fixes seven years for marriage after desertion, and one year in case a wife has been carried captive; but these Capitula are not genuine in the form in which they have come down to us. In Egbert's Excerpts, as they are called, it is decided that the man whose wife is carried away may marry again after seven years, and similarly with respect to the wife; in the case of the wife's voluntary desertion, the man may marry again after five or seven years, with the bishop's consent, but must do penance for three years (can. cxxii. cxxiii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1972); but these Excerpts are not Egbert's; they probably belong to the ninth century, perhaps to the tenth. Such concessions as these are, for the most part, not only of a late date but local and exceptional, to meet particular cases as they arose. Theodore of Canterbury himself notes one such concession as uncanonical, though allowed by the Greeks, namely, that two married persons might agree to separate and one of them go into a monastery, the other marry again, unless already twice married (Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. § 8); but he allows them, in such a case, to separate, or in case of incapacity from sickness (ibid. § 12). The rule of Christian life was plain. [BIGAMY.]

x. Honestas. Betrothal to a woman is supposed to cause an impediment to marrying her nearest relatives, so that if a man be betrothed to one sister and marries another, his marriage is null and void, and he is still bound to carry out his betrothal-promise to the first sister. Antiquity knows nothing of this, a spurious decree of pope Julius is quoted as the first authority for it. (See Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, pars ii. § i., tit. xiii. 25, p. 589.)

xi. Actus. The age before which a marriage contract was null and void was, in the case of the woman, twelve, of the man fourteen years. (See Selden, Uxor Ebraica, lib. ii. c. 3; Digest.

lib. xxiii. tit. ii. leg. 4; Instit. lib. i. tit. xxii.; Martene, de Antiquis Eccles. Ritibus, cap. ix. art. i. ii.)

xii. Affinis. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

xiii. Clandestinus. The publicity of the marriage contract was always regarded as an essential part of it. Different means were taken in different countries for ensuring publicity, but that it should exist was recognised by every civilised state as the foundation of its social system. Among the Jews and Romans a certain number of witnesses was required;^h Tertullian declares that the church demands publicity (de Pudicitia, cap. iv., Op. p. 557); and the presence of witnesses is pronounced by a law of Theodosius Jun., quoted below, to be one of the few things which could not be dispensed with in a marriage ceremony. The testimony of the church officer before whom the contract was made naturally came to be accepted as the best testimony that could be had, but it was not until the council of Trent that all marriages were declared null, on the ground of their being clandestine, unless they were celebrated in the presence of the incumbent of the parish in which one of the contracting parties lived. The council of Verneuil orders that all marriages shall be made in public, whatever rank the parties might be (Conc. Vernens. can. xv., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1997). The council of Friuli, A.D. 791, gives the same order with a view to the prevention of marriages of consanguinity or affinity (Conc. Forojuliense, can. viii., ib. tom. iv. p. 859).

xiv. Impos. Impotency is an impediment which makes a marriage not void, but voidable after a period of three years. In Christian legislation it was first recognised by Justinian, A.D. 528, as an adequate cause for a divorce (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 10; Auth. Collat. iv. tit. 1, Novell. xxii. 6, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. pp. 458, 124). See also Photius, Nomocanon, tit. xiii. § 4. Theodore's Penitential declares it a sufficient cause for a woman to take another husband (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 32), or if arising from sickness, for a separation (ibid. § 12). In the eighth century Gregory II., replying to a question of Boniface of Germany, goes so far as to lay it down that in case of impotency on the part of the woman, arising from an attack of illness, "it would be well that her husband should remain as he is, and give himself up to self-restraint; but whereas none but great souls can attain to this, let a man who cannot contain marry rather, but he is not to withdraw alimony from her who is only prevented by infirmity, not excluded by loathsome guilt" (cap. ii., Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1858). At the end of the same century, Egbert, of York, rules, though with great reluctance, in a similar case, that the one of the two that is in good health may marry again with the permission of the one that is sick, provided that the latter promises perpetual continence and is never allowed to marry during the other's life, under any change of circumstances (Dialogue of Egbert, Resp. xiii., Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, vol. iii. p. 409). The laws of Howel Dda, A.D. 928, allow a woman to separate from her husband, without losing her dower on the grounds of impotency, leprosy or bad breath (Cyfreithiau Hywel Dda, bk. ii. c. xxi.). § 26, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 247). St. Thomas Aquinas and later moral theologians go further still; they allow that an excessive disgust for a wife justifies a man in regarding himself impotent in respect to her (see Liguori, Theol. Mor. vi. 6. 3, 2). These are concessions, which, however they may have been acted on in more than one conspicuous instance, cannot be reconciled with the rules of ordinary morality. In the 6th century the second council of Orléans ruled in a contrary sense (can. xi., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1175). Impotency existing at the time of marriage being incompatible with the primary end of the contract, makes the contract void or voidable without the intervention of any statute or canon law.

xv. Raptus. This impediment is sometimes classed under that of vis. It means not exactly the same as our word ravishment, but the violent removal of a woman to a place where her actions are no longer free, for the sake of inducing or compelling her to marry. The act of Bothwell in carrying away Mary Stuart, would have been precisely a case of raptus had there been no collusion between them. By some raptus is distinguished into the two classes of raptus seductionis and raptus violentus. Whether ravishment in the strict sense of the word is an impediment to a future marriage is a question which has been answered in contrary ways. Those who regarded it as a shameful act that a man should gain his object by committing a great crime, decided that it was an insuperable impediment for ever. Those who considered that the injury done to the woman could only be atoned for and nullified by marriage, took the opposite view, and required the ravisher to marry her. The Roman law made it a perpetual impediment. Laws of Constantine and Constantius inflict capital punishment on ravishers (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. xxiv. legg. 1, 2); and Justinian, after having pronounced the penalty of death for the crime, continues, "Nor is the ravished woman to be allowed to ask for and obtain her ravisher as her husband: her parents are to marry her to whom they will, except the ravisher, in lawful wedlock, but our serenity will never in any way consent to the act of those who try to wed in our state like enemies. For every one who wishes for a wife, whether free or freed, is to ask her of her parents or other guardians in accordance with the tenor of our laws, that by their consent a legitimate marriage may take place" (Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. xiii. leg. 1, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 832). The law of the Visigoths went so far as to punish ravisher and victim with death if they should presume to marry (lib. iii. tit. iii. legg. 1, 2, Canciani, vol. iv. p. 93). On the other hand the Ostrogothic law required the man to marry and to endow the woman.

^h Athanaeus says that one object of the nuptial banquet was to serve as a witness: "Sic enim moribus et legibus scitum est, ut in nuptiis epulum fiat, tum nuptiales Deos veneremur, tum ut pro testimonio id sit." (Deipnosoph. lib. v. c. i., Op. p. 185, Lugd. 1657.) Another way in which publicity was effected was the insertion of the marriages in the Acta, which appeared daily, like modern newspapers, but there were no public marriage registers.

Similarly the Apostolical Canons, after having pronounced excommunication on the ravisher of an unbetrothed virgin, ruled that he may not take another wife, but must keep her, though poor (can. lxviii.). The laws of king Ethelbert, A.D. 597, order that the ravisher is to pay a shilling to the owner of the girl and then buy her of him; but if she were betrothed he is to be fined twenty shillings (Dooms, lxxxi., lxxxiii., Haddan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 49). St. Basil says that the marriage is to depend upon the will of the woman's friends (Epist. Canon. II. can. xxii.). The ravisher, according to the same authority, is to do penance for three years (ib. can. xxx.). The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and the council in Trullo decree that a ravisher is to be deposed if a clergyman, anathematised if a layman (cans. xxvii. xcii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 611; tom. iii. p. 1694). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, orders that a ravisher who flies with the woman to a church is to be made a slave with power of redemption (can. ii., ib. p. 1009). The third council excommunicates the ravishers of consecrated virgins (can. xvi., ib. pp. 14-26). The Roman council under Gregory II. anathematizes all ravishers (can. x. xi. ib. tom. iii. p. 1866). The Capitula of Herard of Tours forbid the marriage of the parties concerned (cap. cx., ib. tom. v. p. 457). The Council of Meaux, A.D. 845, advises it (can. lxx., ib. tom. iv. p. 1494).

Second Marriage.—Is previous marriage an impediment to a second, third, or fourth marriage? This is a question which was raised in the early church, and discussed with some warmth, and, like the celibacy of the clergy, was answered somewhat differently at different times and in different places. Certainly there is nothing in Holy Scripture to forbid successive marriages (at least so far as the laity are concerned); the question of the second marriage of the clergy has been considered above). St. Paul distinctly states that after the death of one party to the contract the other may marry again, provided that the second husband or wife be a Christian (Rom. vii. 2; 1 Cor. vii. 39); and he desires that under such circumstances young widows should remarry (1 Cor. vii.; 1 Tim. v. 14).

The teaching of the early church was framed on that of St. Paul; but some misconception of the views of early writers has arisen, owing to their designating both marriage after divorce and marriage after death by the same name of second marriage. Thus Clement of Alexandria, in the third book of the Stromateis, which is devoted to the subject of marriage, speaks with reprobation of second marriage: but a careful examination of the context leads to the conclusion that he is speaking of a second marriage while the first husband or wife is still alive (c. xii.); for in the same chapter of the same book, he plainly declares second marriage permissible, adding, however, that he who marries a second time falls short of the highest evangelical perfection. Whether the third canon of the council of Neo-Cæsarea which condemns "those that have fallen into several marriages," refers to successive or to simultaneous marriages, has been questioned, but it is likely that it is aimed at some form of polygamy or marriage after divorce, not at marriage after death (see Brouwer, de Jure Connubiorum, lib. ii. c. xix. § 7, Op. p. 569, Delphis, 1714).

Hermae Pastor deals with the question altogether in St. Paul's spirit, and almost adopts his words "Qui nubuit, non peccat sed si per se manserit, magnum sibi conquirat honorem apud Dominum" (lib. ii. Mand. 4, apud Cotelierii Patres Apostolicos, tom. i. p. 90; Amsterdam, 1724, where see note). The Apostolical Constitutions (c. ii.) permit second marriage, reprove third marriage, and forbid fourth marriage. "For you ought to know this, that once marrying according to the law is righteous, as being according to the will of God; but second marriages after the promise [of widowhood] are wicked, not on account of the marriage itself, but because of the falsehood. Third marriages are indications of incontinency. But such marriages as are beyond the third are manifest fornication and unquestionable uncleanness. For God gave one woman to one man in the creation; for they two shall be one flesh. But to the younger women let a second marriage be allowed after the death of their first husband, lest they fall into the condemnation of the devil and many snares and foolish lusts, which are hurtful to souls, and which bring upon them punishment rather than peace" (lib. iii. c. 2). Origen goes so far as to say that second, third, and fourth marriages exclude from the kingdom of heaven, but he proceeds to explain that by the kingdom of heaven he means that church "which hath neither spot nor wrinkle nor any such thing," that is, the invisible body of perfect Christians. He allows that the twice married are in a state of salvation, but says that they will not receive a crown at their Master's hands (Hom. xvii. in Luc., Op. tom. iii. p. 953); and elsewhere he says that a woman who marries twice will not forfeit salvation, but will enjoy less beatitude (Hom. xix. in Jerem., ib. p. 267). Tertullian, vehement monogamist as he was, yet allows that second marriage is only an obstacle to saintliness, not in itself unlawful (ad Uxor. lib. i. cap. 7). Fulgentius, in his work on the Faith, declares second and third marriage permissible (de Fide, c. xlii., Op. p. 484, Ants. 1574). Hilary of Poitiers follows St. Paul in teaching that second marriage is lawful (Tract. in Psalm. lxvii.; Op. p. 194; Paris, 1693). Cyril of Jerusalem pronounces second marriage a thing to be pardoned (Catech. iv. 16, Op. p. 60, Oxon. 1703). The Oration (falsely) attributed to Amphiloehius holds it permissible in case there are no children by the first marriage (Orat. in Occursu Domini, Op. p. 32, Paris, 1644). Pope Gelasius declares it permissible in laymen, though not allowable in the clergy (Epist. v. cap. xxii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 903). Epiphanius (Haeres. lix., Op. tom. i. p. 497), Theodoret (Com. in 1 Cor. xvii. 39), St. Ambrose (de Viduis, c. xi., Op. tom. ii. p. 203), St. Augustine (de Bono Vid. c. vi., Op. tom. vi. p. 435), St. Jerome (Epist. xxvii. ad Marcellam, Op. tom. ii. pars 2, p. 64), pronounce in like manner in favour of the legality and against the propriety of a second marriage. This was the general sentiment of the early church. The severer view was banished from within the borders of the church and became a distinctive mark of Montanists and Novatians. See Tertullian, de Exhortatione Castitatis, c. vii., and de Monogamia, passim. The council of Nicaea (can. viii.) deliberately condemned the Novatian view by requiring that none should refuse to hold communion with Digamists.

Second marriages were discountenanced by the imposition of a penance, but how soon this practice arose is questioned. Some think that they find it enjoined in the canons of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 360, the first of which rules that "in accordance with the ecclesiastical canon, those who have been married a second time in a free and lawful way, and have not taken their wives in a clandestine manner, are to be allowed communion (ex venia dari communionem) after a little time has passed, and they have had a period for prayer and fasting (orationibus et jejuniis vacaverint).¹ The last expression has been not unfrequently understood, and it is understood by Hefele (Hist. of Councils, bk. vi.), to refer to an ecclesiastical penance that the married couple had to undergo for their offence in marrying a second time; but it may only mean that a space was to intervene after marriage, which was to be devoted by them to prayer and fasting before they offered themselves at the Lord's table. The "ecclesiastical canon" referred to in the Laodicean canon is not one that restrains second marriages, but, no doubt, the eighth canon of the council of Nicea, which is in favour of them; and the practice of setting apart a time for prayer and fasting before communicating after marriage, whether regarded as a penitential discipline or not, was looked upon as a proper act of reverence, whether the marriage was the first or the second. (See Herard's Capitula, cap. lxxxix., Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 456. Compare also the so-called fourth council of Carthage, can. xiii., Hefele, bk. viii.; and Theodore's Penitential, lib. ii. cap. xii. §§ 1, 2.) By the end of the 7th century this period of prayer and fasting was distinctly regarded as a time of penance, but it was a penance imposed upon those who contracted a first marriage, as much as upon those who entered on a second marriage, the only difference being that a longer period was assigned in the latter case than in the former. Theodore of Canterbury orders that in a first marriage the husband and wife are to refrain from church for thirty days, and then to do penance for forty days, and give themselves to prayer, before communicating, while a man who makes a second marriage is to do penance for a year on Wednesdays and Fridays, and to abstain from flesh meat for three Lents. This is a plain instance of penance being required for second marriage, but it is equally plain that the offence for which penance has to be done is rather that of marrying than of marrying a second time (Penitential, lib. i. c. xiv. §§ 1, 2). No doubt, however, from very early times a difference was made not only in respect to the honour paid to first and second marriages, but also in the ceremonies with which they were performed. The Council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, forbids presbyters to be present at the festivities of a second marriage, and the ceremonies of crowning the bride and bridegroom, and giving the benediction were commonly, though not universally, omitted. Ὁ δίγαμος οὐ στεφανοῦται became a familiar Greek saying. St. Basil speaks of a penalty due to digamy as already a well-known custom in the year 375. The early Roman discipline is probably exhibited to us in the commentary attributed to St. Ambrose, supposed to have been written by Hilary the Deacon. "First marriages are godly; second marriages are permitted: first marriages are solemnly celebrated under the benediction of God, second marriages are left without honour, even at the time of celebration, but they are allowed on account of incontinency" (Com. in 1 Cor. vii. 40, Op. tom. ii. p. 138). See also Durandus, Rationale Div. Offic. i. ix. 15, Op. p. 28, Venice, 1577; and the office for the marriage of Digamists in Goar's Euchologium, p. 401, Paris, 1647. In the East Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 814, fixes two years as the period for suspension from communion for a second marriage (Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1052).

St. Basil's canons forbid third marriages, but did not require the separation of the parties married. Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 687, imposes a penance of seven years, on Wednesdays and Fridays, with abstinence from flesh meat for three Lents, on trigamists, or any who contract more than three marriages, but pronounces the marriages valid (Penitential, lib. i. c. xiv. § 3). Nicephorus of Constantinople, A.D. 814, suspends trigamists for five years (Hard. Concil. tom. iv. p. 1052). Herard of Tours, A.D. 858, declares any greater number of wives than two to be unlawful (cap. cxi., ibid. tom. v. p. 457). Leo the Wise, emperor of Constantinople, was allowed to marry three wives without public remonstrance, but was suspended from communion by the patriarch Nicholas when he married a fourth. This led to a council being held at Constantinople, A.D. 920, which finally settled the Greek discipline on the subject of third and fourth marriages. It ruled that the penalty for a fourth marriage was to be excommunication and exclusion from the church; for a third marriage, if a man were forty years old, suspension for five years, and admission to communion thereafter only on Easter day. If he were thirty years old, suspension for four years, and admission to communion thereafter only three times a year.

A widow might not marry again till the expiration of the old Romulean ten-month year from the time of her husband's death. By Theodosius this term was extended to twelve months (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. viii. leg. 1).

II. MARRIAGE CEREMONIES. The marriage rite was divided into two parts, the betrothal and the nuptials, each of which had its own peculiar ceremonies attached to it. The betrothal was a legal contract, entered into between a man and a woman, binding them to marry within a given time, which time came to be fixed at two years; the nuptials were a further contract, whereby each gave to the other certain rights over himself or herself, and received in turn the gift of certain rights over the other. Betrothal could be omitted without absolutely and in all cases invalidating the marriage, but when formal betrothal had taken place, nuptials could not be declined by either party without incurring both ignominy and punishment. The council of Elvira condemned parents who break their promise given at espousals to excommunication for three years (Conc. Elvib. can. liv.). If the woman breaks her troth, Theodore of Canterbury's Penitential condemns her to restore the money which the man had given for her, and to add to it one-third; if the man refuses, he is to lose the money that he had paid. A betrothed woman may go into a monastery instead of marrying, but her parents may not give her to another man unless she shews an utter repugnance to the proposed match (lib. ii. c. xii. §§ 33, 34).

A. Betrothal ceremonies. We are fortunate in having both a definition of betrothal and a description of the ceremonies which accompany it given us by pope Nicholas in his Replies to the Bulgarians, who had asked his counsel, A.D. 860. "Betrothal," he says, "is the promise of future nuptials made by the consent of the contracting parties and of their guardians;" and he explains that the betrothed proceed to their nuptials at some suitable time "after the man has betrothed the woman to himself with arrhae by adorning her finger with a ring of fidelity, and the man has handed over a dowry agreed to by both of them in a written form containing his covenant before witnesses invited on both sides." This passage embodies an account of the traditional practice which had existed for centuries previous to the date of Nicholas, for he distinctly states that he is relating to the Bulgarians "the custom which the holy Roman church has received from old" (Nicol. Respons. ad consulta Bulgarorum, Resp. iii., Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 354). We see here that there are four things necessary to make betrothal regular: 1, arrhae; 2, a ring; 3, a dowry; 4, witnesses.

1. The most essential of these ceremonies was the bestowal of the arrhae, or earnest money, supposed by some to have been originally given by the man as the symbolical purchase-money of the maiden, answering to the Jewish rite termed כֶּסֶף ("by money"), recalling in a sort both the Roman coemptio, and the barbaric practice of purchasing wives. But it is probable that it was no more than a pledge such as was given in other cases where bargains were struck which could not be immediately carried out. It served to assure the woman that she should hereafter share her husband's worldly goods, of which the coin given at espousals was an earnest, and it was evidence which might be exhibited by the aggrieved party in case of a breach of promise of marriage. Thus we read that Andarchius went to law with the daughter of Ursus, alleging as proof of his espousals with her that he had given her an arrha. (See Gregory of Tours' History, lib. iv. c. 41, apud Hist. Franc. Script. tom. i. p. 322, Paris, 1636.) That the practice existed among the Western nations before they were Christianized is proved by the ambassadors of Clovis betrothing Clotilda to him by presenting a shilling and a penny, "according to the custom of the Franks." The Espousals service is called by the name of ἀκολουθία τοῦ ἀρραβάνου or ordo in nuptiarum subarrhatione in the Greek Euchologion (Goar, p. 380, Paris, 1647). Subarrhæ came to be equivalent to espouse. [ARRHÆ.]

2. The ring is described by pope Nicholas as making part of the arrhae. It was used in pre-Christian times in marriages, and was probably borrowed by the Jews from pagan usage. Among the Jews it occasionally took the place of the piece of money, the payment of which constituted one of the three forms of Jewish marriage. When this was the case, an examination was instituted to see if its value were equal to that of the legally required coin before it was accepted as an equivalent (Selden, Uxor Ebraica, ii. 14). Among Christians it was probably adopted, not only as part of the arrhae, but as having (if it were the same as the seal ring described by Clement of Alexandria), a symbolical meaning like that of the presentation of a bunch of keys, shewing that the wife had the charge of the household goods. "He gives a gold ring," says St. Clement, "not for ornament, but that she may with it seal up what has to be kept safe, as the care of keeping the house belongs to her" (Paedagog. iii. 11, Op. p. 287). Other and less material symbolism easily attached themselves to the ring: it was a type of fidelity, of safely guarded modesty, of union, of protection, of the Holy Spirit's encircling grace. Tertullian testifies to its use, in the words "digitum quem sponsus oppignerasset pronubo annulo" (Apologet. c. vi., Op. p. 7). In later times the ring was blessed by a special service. Some Eastern rituals required the interchange of two rings (Goar, Euchologium, p. 385). The latest issued Rituale, that of the Old Catholics, contains a form for the blessing either of two rings or of one (Old Catholic Ritual, p. 39, Eng. tr. Oxf. 1876).

3. The dowry is next mentioned. Among the Greeks and Romans it was the custom that the dowry should be paid or promised at the betrothal by the relatives of the woman (see Plautus, Trinummus, act v.); with the Hebrews (as with the Germans—see Tacitus, de Moribus Germanorum, c. xviii.) the dowry was paid by the man (Gen. xxxiv. 12; 1 Sam. xviii. 25), but occasionally the father gave a dowry to his daughter (Judges i. xv.). The Hebrew custom prevailed in the early church, and is embodied in the civil as well as in the canon law (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 13; lib. ii. tit. 21). St. Augustine says that a good wife looks upon the tabulae matrimoniales as instrumenta emptionis suae, whereby her husband has become her lord (dominus) and she has been made his handmaid or slave (ancilla), as she gladly acknowledges (Sermo xxxvii. cap. 6, Op. tom. v. p. 225, ed. Migne). The promise of a dowry was generally consigned to writing, which was read before the witnesses to the betrothal, and it became a formal legal document, of the nature of a marriage settlement. The following is an abridged form of nuptial tablets as used by the Jews: "On such a day of such a month in such a year at such a place, such an one, the son of such an one, said to such an one, the daughter of such an one: 'Be thou betrothed to me for wife according to the ordinances of Moses and the Israelites, and I, if it please God, will pay you respect and honour, I will give you food and sustenance, and I will dress you in the way that Jewish husbands do who honour, maintain, and clothe their wives as they ought. I also give to you, as the dowry of your maidenhood, £4, as the law requires, and I pledge myself to give you in addition board and clothing, and I will live with you according to the customs of the whole earth.' Then she gave assent to be his wife. He then declared that he would give such and such a sum as an addition to the original dowry. The goods which the woman brought with her are estimated at such and such a sum. . . We have sealed this tablet or dowry settlement at the time above-mentioned; the whole matter is clear, settled, and de-er-mined" (Selden, Uxor Ebraica, ii. 10, Op. tom. iv. p. 619). In the Christian tabulae matrimoniales, the end for which marriage was instituted was also inserted: "nam id tabulae indicant ubi scribitur, 'Liberorum procreandorum causa'" says St. Augustine (Serm. ix., Op. tom. v. p. 88, ed. Migne); and again, "Recitantur tabulae, et recitatur in conspectu omnium attestantium, et recitatur, 'Liberorum procreandorum causa'" (Serm. li., ibid. p. 345); see also his Enarr. in Ps. lxxxi. (Op. tom. iv. p. 1045).

4. Witnesses were required to be present, before whom, as we have seen, the marriage settlements were to be read and handed over. They were to be friends of both parties, and their presence was required not only to prevent fraud in the matter of the dowry, but also to give a public character to the transaction, that there might be a proof before the world of the consent of both parties to the contract. One of them acted as best man to the bridegroom (amicus interior, conscius secreti cubicularis, St. Aug. Serm. ccxciii., Op. tom. v. p. 1332) and one as bridesmaid, and, in case of the mother's death, as temporary guardian to the bride. It would appear probable from a passage in St. Ambrose (de lapsu Virginis, c. v., Op. tom. ii. p. 310) that the requisite number of witnesses was ten (Cf. Ruth iv. 2, where the number of witnesses called by Boaz is ten).

5. Some minor ceremonies, which were less essential to the rite, have also been handed down. One of these was a kiss, which might or might not be given, but which, if given, was considered to bind the betrothed more closely to each other, so that, in case of the man's death, half of his betrothal gifts were delivered to his betrothed; whereas if there had been no kiss, they were all returned to his relations (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 5, leg. 5; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 3, leg. 16).

6. Another ceremony of similar nature was that of joining hands, which is mentioned together with that of the kiss by Tertullian: "Corpore et spiritu masculo mixta sunt per osculum et dexterās, per quae primum resignantur pudorem spiritūs" (de Virg. Veland. c. xi., Op. p. 179).

7. In the time of Tertullian, the veil was assumed by the woman at the betrothal and worn thenceforward, but the custom was not universal (Rebeccam quidam adhuc velant), and in later times, like the offering of the ring, was transferred to the nuptials (Tertull. ibid.).

8. Siricium in the 4th century speaks, in an epistle which (rightly or wrongly) is regarded as genuine, of a benediction of the priest at betrothal, of so solemn a nature as to make it sacrilege in the betrothed woman to marry another man (Siric. Epist. ad Himer. § 4, Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 848). The betrothal benediction, however (if it existed), must not be confounded with that which was given at the nuptials.

B. Nuptial ceremonies. Pope Nicholas proceeds, in the Reply above quoted, to enumerate the nuptial ceremonies which were in use in his day with the same minuteness with which he described the betrothal ceremonies. He writes: "First of all they are placed in the church with oblations, which they have to make to God by the hands of the priest, and so at last they receive the benediction and the heavenly veil." He adds: "After this, when they have gone out of the church they wear crowns on their heads, a supply of which it is usual to keep always in the church" (Nic. Respons. ubi supra).

The first thing that forces itself upon our notice on reading the above passage is that in pope Nicholas' time, and for such previous times as the ceremonies described by him had existed, marriage was regarded as a religious rite; being (1) performed in a church, (2) accompanied by offerings and oblations made to God by the married persons through a priest, (3) followed by the solemn benediction of the church, together with (4) other ceremonies of an ecclesiastical character: and this was the aspect in which marriage was viewed from the times of Tertullian, as is proved by the following passage: "How shall I state the blessedness of a marriage which the church brings about, and the oblation confirms, and the benediction seals, angels attest, and the Father ratifies" (ad Uxor. lib. ii. c. 8, p. 171). In these words Tertullian, as is pointed out by Gothofred (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 7, leg. 3, tom. i. p. 280), contrasts the marriage ceremonies of the Christian church, A.D. 200, with the ceremonies used by heathens on the same occasion. Among heathens, marriages were brought about by persons called conciliatores. In the case of Christians, the place of the conciliatores is taken by the church, that is, by the officers of the church, namely, the bishops, priests, deacons, and widows (see the passage of Tertullian referred to just below), the heathens' offering of arrhae is replaced by the oblation of prayers and alms offered through the priest; for the sealing of the marriage settlements is substituted the seal of the church's benediction; the testimony of angels stands in the place of the testimony of human witnesses; and ratification by a heavenly Father takes the place of the expressed consent of parents. Tertullian's rhetorical description does not of course imply that the old ceremonies were abolished, but it does imply that an ecclesiastical character was given to them, and that they were carried out under the control, and by the hands, of ministers of the church. Elsewhere Tertullian states that Christian marriages had to be announced to the church, and were allowed, or disallowed, by bishops, priests, deacons, and widows (de Pudicitia, c. iv.; de Monogam. c. xi., Op. p. 531). One object of this regulation may have been to prevent ignorant members of the flock from transgressing various laws of the state with which they might be unacquainted; but this was not its only purpose; the church, that is, the bishops, priests, deacons, and widows, would thus become the conciliatores of a Christian's marriage, according to the idea employed in the previously quoted passage. St. Ignatius, in like manner, says that people who marry ought to be united with the cognizance and approval of the bishop: μετὰ γνώμης τοῦ Ἐπισκόπου (St. Ignat. Epist. ad Polycarp. c. v.). St. Ambrose says that marriage has to be sanctified by benediction (Epist. xix., Op. tom. ii. p. 844); Gregory Nazianzen writes that at the marriage of "the golden Olympias" there was a number of bishops (ἐπισκοποι ὄμιλος), and that he too, though absent in body, was present in will, taking part in the festivity, and joining the young couple's hands together, and placing them in the hands of God (Epist. lvii., Op. tom. i. p. 815, col. 1690). The (so-called) fourth council of Carthage (can. xiii.) in the 6th century speaks plainly of priestly benediction being received by the bride and bridegroom (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 979). Synesius uses the expression, "The holy hand of Theophilus gave me my wife" (Epist. 105).

There is no reasonable doubt that the place in which Christians were ordinarily married was a church, so soon as it became safe and customary for them to meet in churches for religious purposes, and that the way in which they were ordinarily married was by a religious ceremony.^k Nevertheless, it is equally true that marriages could, and, especially in the East, often did, take place in houses (see St. Chrys. Hom. xlviii. in Gen. c. xxiv.), and that the religious ceremony does not form, and was not regarded as forming, the essence of marriage. The essence of marriage consists in the contract agreed to and publicly made between the contracting parties.^l Consequently, marriages unaccompanied by the blessing of the church were still considered to be marriages, though they were looked on with disfavour, and, as Tertullian says, ran the risk of being condemned as adultery (De Pudicitia, c. iv.). Accordingly, a law of Theodosius Junior, A.D. 428, distinguishing between the essentials and non-essentials of marriage, declares that the omission of other rites such as arrhae, dowry, and a festive procession, did not invalidate a marriage, provided that (1) the contracting parties were of equal station (see above, under the heading Conditio), (2) they broke no specific law by their union, (3) they gave their consent, (4) their friends were present as witnesses. The law recognised no more than the above-named four qualifications for a valid marriage,^m nor did the church attempt to annul what the law allowed. Probably the feeling with which these marriages were regarded on which the church's blessing was not invoked was much the same in the early church as it is at present with ourselves. The secular marriage was acknowledged to be valid; but the parties contracting such a marriage were supposed to have incurred serious loss by depriving themselves of the church's blessing on their union, and to have acted undutifully and only as irreligious persons would act. This liberty of contracting marriage otherwise than by the benediction of the church continued in the West till the time of Charles the Great, A.D. 800, and in the East till that of Leo the Philosopher, A.D. 900. These two emperors enacted that all marriages were invalid except such as were performed by a priest.

There is no sign or hint of marriage being regarded as a sacrament, in the stricter sense of that word, in early times. It is supposed by some that it began first to be so regarded in the time of St. Augustine, A.D. 430, but this is a mistake arising from the use which St. Augustine makes of the word "sacramentum," which he uses frequently in connexion with marriage, but nowhere in the modern sense of the word sacrament. Calvin states that it was not regarded as a sacrament down to the time of Gregory (Instit. lib. iv. cap. 19, § 34, Op. tom. ix. p. 396, Amsterdam, 1567), but he does not say that it then began to be so regarded. The period when this took place is so late that it does not fall within the limits of the time assigned to this dictionary. Binterim's attempts to father it upon Tertullian, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, and other early writers, are so manifestly futile as to raise a smile (Denkwürdigkeiten, sechster Band, erstes Kapitel, § 2, 3).

The constituent parts of the marriage service, as named by pope Nicholas in the passage quoted above, are 1. The oblations. 2. The benediction. 3. The veiling. 4. The crowning.

1. The Oblations consisted mainly of prayers, which, however, were accompanied by a gift of money. The offering of these formed the introductory portion of the ceremony, answering in some sort to the prayers and thanksgivings which in our form for the solemnisation of matrimony precede and accompany the blessing pronounced by the officiating priest upon the contract.

2. The Benediction was a form not unknown to the Jews; amongst whom it was given, not necessarily by a priest, but by the eldest friend or relative present. The following is an abridgement of a Jewish formula of benediction:—"Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, who hast created all things for Thy glory! Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the creator of man. The barren shall rejoice and cry for joy as she gathers her children with joyfulness to her bosom. Blessed art Thou who makest Zion to rejoice in her children! Make this couple to rejoice with joy according to the joyousness which thou gavest to the work of Thy hands in the garden of Eden of old! Blessed art Thou who makest the bride and bridegroom to rejoice! Blessed art Thou who hast created for the bridegroom and bride joy and gladness, exultation, singing, cheerfulness, mirth, love, brotherly kindness, peace, and friendship! O Lord our God, may there be heard in the cities of Judaea and in the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth and gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and bride, the voice of the bridegroom's and bride's mutual affection out of their cham-

^k Van Espen considers it doubtful if marriages were contracted in a church, though they were no doubt contracted in the face of the church (De Spons. et Matr. vi. 4).

"A contract of eternal bond of love,
Confirmed by mutual joinder of the hands,
Attested by the holy close of lips,
Strengthened by interchanging of your rings;
And all the ceremony of this compact Sealed in my function by my testimony."

Twelfth Night, v. 1.

The essence of the marriage was the contract: all that was necessary (strictly speaking) on the part of the priest was his testimony to the contract having been fully made and declared.

^m Apuleius introduces Venus saying that Psyche is Cupid's wife, on the ground that "Impares nuptiae, et praeterea in villâ sine testibus, et patre non consentiente legitimae non possunt videri." (De Asino aureo, lib. vi. p. 104.)

ber, and the young men's festive song! Blessed art Thou who makest the bridegroom to rejoice with the bride" (Selden, Uxor Ebraica ii. 12, Op. tom. iv. p. 625). The particular form of the Christian benediction, which differs from the Jewish by being a blessing on the newly married pair instead of a thanksgiving to God, was at first probably left to the officiating minister, but it would soon have become stereotyped in the rituals of the several churches. The following is a form on which it will be seen that the final benediction in the solemnisation of matrimony in the English church is framed:—"O God, who by Thy mighty power hast made all things of nothing, who, after other things set in order, didst appoint that out of man (created after Thine own image and similitude) woman should take her beginning, teaching that it should be never lawful to put asunder those whom Thou hadst pleased should be created out of one; O God, who hast consecrated the state of matrimony to such an excellent mystery that in it Thou didst typify the Sacrament of Christ and the Church; O God by whom woman is joined to man, and so blessed a union was instituted at the beginning as not to be destroyed even by the judgment of the flood; look mercifully upon this Thy servant now to be joined in wedlock, who seeks to be defended by Thy protection. May there be on her the yoke of love and peace! May she be a faithful and chaste wife in Christ, and may she continue a follower of holy women! May she be loveable to her husband as Rachel, wise as Rebecca, long-lived and faithful as Sarah! May the author of wickedness gain no advantage against her from her acts! May she continue in the faith and commandments, constant to one husband! May she avoid all unlawful deeds. May she strengthen her weakness by the help of discipline! May she be modest, grave, bashful, and instructed in God by learning! May she be fruitful in child-bearing! May she be approved and innocent, and may she attain to the rest of the blessed, and to the heavenly kingdom! And may she see her sons' sons to the third and fourth generation, and may she reach the rest of the blessed and the kingdom of heaven, through," etc. (Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae ritibus I. ix. 5, Ordo iii. ex MS. Pontificali Monasterii Lyrensis).

3. The practice of veiling is mentioned by Tertullian (de Veland. Virgin. c. xi.) and by St. Ambrose (Epist. xix. 7, Op. tom. ii. p. 844); the former of whom speaks of it as a praiseworthy heathen custom commonly used in the ceremony of betrothal, after which (in Tertullian's days) the desponsata wore the veil habitually. The heathen veil, called flammeum, was of a yellow colour. The colour adopted by Christians was purple and white, though the name flammeum was still sometimes used (St. Ambr. de Virgin. c. xv.; de Inst. Virg. c. xvii.). It is probable, as St. Ambrose has observed (de Abrah. I. ix. 93), that the word nuptials is derived from the word obnubere, which means to veil. In the earliest times the veil was part of the married or espoused woman's dress, akin in form and purpose to the Eastern yashmak. But after the first few centuries it ceased to be worn by them, and the veiling came to be a symbolical act, making part of the marriage ceremony, and symbolising the woman's forsaking all others and keeping her charms for her husband alone, and also her being submissive to him. "Ideo velantur ut noverint se semper viris suis subditas esse" (Durand., Rat. Div. Off. lib. i. c. ix. 9). In the West the word velatio came to signify the whole marriage ceremony, and it became customary to lay the veil on both bride and bridegroom at the time of the benediction (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. 2, ix.).

4. The crowning was also originally a heathen custom (Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulide, l. 905), and was therefore at first disallowed by Christians (see Justin, Apol. c. ix.; Tertull. Apolo. i. 42), but was soon permitted in the East (see Clement of Alexandria, Paedagog. ii. 8, for a discussion on the lawfulness of the use of crowns). The same custom prevailed among the Jews. The crowns were made of gold, silver, olive, myrtle, or flowers; their use in the city of Jerusalem was forbidden during the Roman siege, as being too great a sign of joy for such sad times. This shews that they were regarded as a symbol of rejoicing by the Jews; and as such probably they were adopted by the Christian Church, though they came to be looked upon rather as rewards for victory over passion and tokens of virgin purity, in consequence of which they were not given at second marriages. In the Greek church they came to play a much more important part than in the Latin. In the West as we learn from pope Nicholas's reply to the Bulgarians, they were no more than a festive ornament worn by the married pair on leaving the church. In the East the crowning, which was once only a part of a lady's wedding attire (see St. Amator's Life, Acta SS. May, tom. i. 52), became so substantial a part of the nuptials that the whole marriage was called the Crowning, as in the West it was called the Veiling. The crowns were placed on the heads of the bride and bridegroom immediately after the benediction, appropriate prayers being said at the same time. The following is an extract from a form given by Goar:—"After the amen (to the benedictory prayer) the priest takes the crowns and first crowns the bridegroom saying 'The servant of the Lord is crowned, for the sake of the handmaid of the Lord, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.' The woman is crowned in the same manner. Then he joins the right hand of the woman with the right hand of the man. Then is sung, 'With glory and honour hast thou crowned them, thou hast placed crowns of precious stones upon their heads.' Then the deacon says, 'Let us pray,' and the priest offers the following prayer: Crown them with Thy grace, unite them in temperance and dignity, bless them with a good old age and with unshaken faith. Grant them length of days; grant to them all things expedient for them, fear of Thee and thought of Thee; give them the fruit of the womb, comfort them with the sight of sons and daughters; let them rejoice in Thee and respect the words of the Apostle, 'Marriage is honourable and the bed undefiled.' Hear us, O Lord our God who wast present at Cana in Galilee and blessed the marriage there by Thy presence, miraculously changing the water into wine. O Lord of all, bless the marriage of this Thy servant and this Thy handmaid as Thou didst bless Abraham and Sarah: bless them as Isaac and Rebekah: bless them as Jacob and Rachel: crown them as Joseph and Asenath, as Moses and Sipporah. May Thy eyes be upon them and Thy ears open to hear the voice of this prayer. May this be fulfilled to them that which is spoken by the Prophet, saying, 'Thy wife as the fruitful vine on the walls of thy house, thy children like olive branches round about thy table; behold thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord'" (Euchologium, p. 396).

At the end of eight days the crowns were solemnly removed while the following prayers were used: "O Lord our God, who crownest the year with Thy blessing, and hast given these crowns to be placed upon the heads of those united to one another by the law of marriage, rewarding them thus for their continence, because they have come pure and clean to marriage instituted by Thee, do Thou bless their union, now that they lay aside their crowns, keep them inseparably united, that in everything they may give thanks to Thy most holy name, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, now and ever, world without end, Amen. Peace be to all. Bend your heads to the Lord. O Lord, we glorify Thee, confirming the contract of Thy servant, and finishing the office of the marriage in Cana of Galilee, and taking off its symbols. Glory to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now and ever, world without end, amen" (Goar, Euchologium, p. 400).

5. The marriage-pomp, another ceremony which, as we see from the law of Theodosius Junior above quoted, was so common as by some to be thought essential to the validity of nuptials, consisted partly of a procession which noisily conducted the bride to the bridegroom's house with torches and lanterns and shouting and songs, and partly of feasting, singing, and dancing in the house. The songs and dances, used both in the procession and at home, having come down by tradition from ancient heathen days, were of an immodest character, like the ἐπιθαλάμια and Fescennina of Greece and Rome (see the description given by St. Ambrose of Samson's wedding-feast, Epist. xix., Op. tom. ii. p. 846), and were therefore vehemently denounced by fathers of the church (see St. Chrysostom, Hom. xlviii. and lvi. in Genes.; Hom. xii. in 1 Cor., Op. tom. iv. pp. 490, 539, tom. x. p. 105), and by councils (see council of Laodicea, canons liii. liv., Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 790); though the festivity itself was not objected to. Gregory Nazianzen has left us a charming letter in which he excuses himself for not having been present at the festivities which accompanied Olympia's wedding on the ground that a gouty old gentleman was out of place among dancers, though in heart he joined with them in their amusements (Epist. lviii., Op. tom. i. p. 815). The expression "uxorem ducere" is derived from this fetching home of the wife.

6, 7. Two other ceremonies of slighter character have to be named. One was joining the hands of bridegroom and bride, to which we have seen Gregory Nazianzen referring (Epist. lvii.), as being done by himself, or one like himself, that is, a bishop or minister of the church; the other was untying the hair of the bride, which we may gather from Optatus (lib. vi. p. 95, Paris, 1702) was customary both in marriages and in devoting virgins to the service of God. At the same time that her hair was untied it is probable that the keys of the household were delivered to her (St. Ambr. Epist. vi. § 3, ad Syagrium, Op. tom. ii. p. 77).

We can now follow a primitive Christian through the different scenes of his marriage. As soon as, by the intervention of his friends and relations, he had fixed on a woman for his consort who was of marriageable age, and not too nearly akin to himself, nor disqualified for his wife by the enactments of any special law, and had gained her consent, and that of her parents or guardian, he announced his purpose to the officers of his church, and if they pointed out no obstacle arising from ecclesiastical or civil law, a day of betrothal was fixed. On the day appointed the parties met in the house of the future bride's father, in the presence of as many as ten witnesses, the bride being dressed in white (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 11); and the man offered his arrhae, among which was a ring which he placed upon the third finger of the woman's left hand. These having been accepted, he proceeded to hand over to the father of his betrothed an instrument of dowry or marriage settlement, the delivery of which, after it had been read aloud, was testified by the witnesses present. The betrothal was now complete, but it was generally confirmed by a solemn kiss between the betrothed and a joining of hands. It is probable that an informal prayer for a blessing upon the couple completed the ceremony, and in the earliest times a veil was at this time assumed by the woman. The betrothal over, the man returned to his home, and the woman continued living under her father's roof, both of them bound to the other to fulfil a contract of marriage at some future time within the next forty days, or at furthest the two succeeding years, but holding communication with each other only through the best man and the bridesmaids, or other relatives and friends. At the time of betrothal the nuptial day was generally named, which might be at any season of the year except during Lent (Conc. Laod. can. lii.).^a

When the wedding day had arrived each of the betrothed, accompanied by friends, proceeded to a church, where they were received by the priest for the solemnization of their marriage. The bride was arrayed in the veil, which she had worn since her betrothal, as she walked to church during the first two or three centuries (Tertull. de Cor. Mil. c. iv.; de Veland. Virg. cxi.), but after that time she received the veil from the priest's hands as part of the marriage ceremonial. The ceremony, or service as we may call it, commenced with prayers offered by the priest in behalf of the bridegroom and the bride, an offering in money being at the same time made by them. After this the free consent of each to the contract made between them was declared. The officiating minister then joined their hands, and (perhaps) placing his hand on their heads,^b he uttered over them a form of benediction, conveying to them the blessing of the church upon the union which had been effected by the contract made and declared between them. Immediately after the benediction in the Greek church, at the conclusion of the whole service in the Latin, crowns of gold and silver, if the bride and bridegroom were rich, of leaves or flowers if they were poor, brought from the treasury of the church, were placed upon their heads, and arrayed in these, they returned to the house of the bride's father, from whence, as the evening approached, the wife was carried by her husband to his home in a joyous procession, attended by a concourse of friends uttering acclamations and wishing joy to the newly-married pair. On arriving at his home, the husband led in his wife, and she untied her hair as a symbol of his authority over her, and he delivered over to her a bunch of keys as a symbol of her authority over the household. The evening was spent in festivity, which consisted of feasting, dancing, and singing. At the end of seven days the crowns were restored to the church in a solemn manner.

^a Lent was the only forbidden season. A supposed canon of the council of Lerida, in the 6th century, interdicting the celebration of marriages in Advent, in the three weeks preceding the Feast of John the Baptist, and in the period from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, is spurious.

^b Cui enim manum imponit Presbyter? Cui autem benedict? (Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iii. c. vi. Op. p. 4 C 2)

If, however, there were any who desired that a religious character should not be given to the ceremony, they were permitted to dispense with it; and their marriage was regarded as valid provided only that they made a contract one with another without fraud or compulsion, and declared it before an adequate number of witnesses, and did not otherwise transgress the imperial laws.

III. DIVORCE. Our Lord's rule laid down in respect to divorce is plain and simple. He disallows it on any other ground than that of fornication or adultery on the part of the woman.^p This continued to be the rule of Christian conduct down to the time of Constantine. There is a consensus amongst the doctors of the early church that no other cause is adequate for the dissolution of marriage. Thus, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. ii. c. cxiii., Op. p. 506), Tertullian (adv. Marc., lib. iv. c. xxxiv., Op. p. 449), and somewhat later, St. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt., Op. tom. vii. p. 227), St. Basil (Epist. Canon II., can. xxi.), and St. Jerome (Epist. ad Amand., Op. tom. iv. p. 162). In the case of the clergy divorce was made imperative on the discovery of the wife's adultery by the councils of Neocaesarea and Elvira (canons viii. and lxx.): laymen were left to their own judgment in the matter; but a canon of Theodore of Canterbury requires anyone who keeps his wife under such circumstances to do penance for two years on two days of the week and fast days, or to abstain from living with her as long as her penance for adultery lasts (Penitential, lib. i. cap. xiv. § 4). But, as was to be expected, a difference of opinion grew up as to the force of the word fornication. The Allegorists, according to their manner, insisted on understanding the word spiritually as well as literally, and thus they made it bear the meaning of idolatry, infidelity, and covetousness, as well as carnal fornication. So Hermae Pastor ("Is qui simulacrum facit moechatur," lib. ii. mand. iv., apud Patres Apostol., ed. Coteler, tom. i. p. 89). This view was adopted by St. Augustine (de Serm. Dom. in Monte, cap. xvi., Op. tom. iii. p. 1231, ed. Migne), but in his Retractations he expressed some doubt as to its correctness: "Quatenus intelligenda atque limitanda sit haec fornicatio, et utrum etiam propter hanc liceat dimittere uxorem, latebrosissima quaestio est" (lib. i. c. xix. 6, Op. tom. i. p. 66).

Such differences of opinion as existed between theologians arose from their interpreting the word fornication with greater or less latitude; but there was a substantial agreement among them that no crime, however heinous, could have the effect of dissolving the contract once formed, with the one exception of the wife's fornication. Not so the civil law.^q Constantine appears to have wished to make a compromise between the lax practice which had come down from heathen times and the strict rule which had hitherto been acknowledged by Christians, though not always acted upon. Accordingly he passed a law, A.D. 331, allowing divorce to a wife if her husband should be a murderer, a poisoner, or a robber of graves; but specifically disallowing it on the ground of his being a drunkard or a gambler, or given to women (muliercularius). By the same law divorce was allowed to the man if his wife were an adulteress, or a poisoner, or a procurer (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. i., tom. i. p. 310). Honorius, A.D. 421, passed a law of a similar character with that of Constantine, which allowed other causes—"morum vitia et mediocres culpae"—as adequate besides the three named by the first Christian Emperor (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. 2, ibid. p. 313). Honorius's law did not remain long in force; but it, or Constantine's, was the law of the empire during the time of some of the chief church writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. It was abrogated, together with the law of Constantine, A.D. 439, by Theodosius Junior, who restored the laxity allowed by the civil law before the time of Constantine—"durum est legum veterum moderamen excedere." Ten years later, however, Theodosius found it necessary to draw the reign tighter, and he published a law, A.D. 449, enumerating the causes which were now held to be adequate to justify a divorce. To the three crimes named by Constantine he added those of treason, sacrilege, manstealing, and similar offences (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. xvii. leg. 8, Corp. Juris, tom. ii. p. 457). And this was followed 291). It is not certain that it is of the marriage benediction that Clement is speaking.

^p That in Matt. v. 42, ἡ πορεία is used in the sense of πορεία, or rather that the generic term is employed when the specific word might have been used, was not questioned in the early church, nor is there any sufficient cause for questioning it, much as has been written upon it. (See Selden, Uxor Ebraica, iii. 23, 27.)

^q "Quamdiu vivit vir, licet adulter sit, licet sodomita, licet flagitius omnibus cooptetur et ab uxore propter haec scelera derelictus, maritus ejus reputatur, cui alterum virum accipere non licet" (St. Jerome, Epist. ad Amand., loc. sup. cit.). "Mulieri non licet virum dimittere licet sit fornicator, nisi forte pro monasterio. Basilii hoc judicavit." (Theodore, Penitential, lib. ii. 14, xii. § 6.) See also the twelfth council of Toledo, A.D. 681, can. viii., which excommunicates a man for deserting his wife for any other cause than fornication (Hard. Conc. tom. iii. p. 1723), and the council of Soissons, A.D. 744, can. ix. (ib. p. 1934). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, forbids husbands to dismiss their wives until they have proved their adultery before the bishops of the province, on pain of excommunication, can. xxv. (ibid. tom. ii. p. 1001).

by a law of Valentinian III. forbidding dissolution of marriage by the mere consent of the parties concerned. Again reaction followed reaction. First, a law was passed by Anastasius, A.D. 497, making divorce by mutual consent legal (ibid. leg. 9). Next, Justinian, A.D. 528, recalled the second law of Theodosius Junior (that of the year A.D. 449), adding, however, to the causes there specified impotency lasting two years (ibid. leg. 10), or three years (Novell. xxii. 6), a desire for the monastic life (Novell. cxvii. 18), and a lengthy captivity (Novell. xxii. 7). Justinian's nephew, Justin, restored the liberty of divorce by consent (Novell. cxi.), and thus the law continued, as we learn from Photius (Nomocanon, tit. xiii. c. iv., Op. p. 200, Paris, 1620), to the year 870, and indeed to the year 900, when Leo the Philosopher once more replaced it on the footing in which it was under Justinian, before the alteration made by Justin.

The laws of the Western nations as they became christianised were similar in character to those of the empire. The Visigoths inserted into their code of laws, A.D. 460, the original rule of Christianity, such as it was before it was altered by Constantine (Leg. Visigoth. lib. iii. tit. vi. c. ii.), adding, however, that the wronged husband might do anything that he pleased with the adulteress and her paramour (ibid. tit. iv. c. iii.). Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, republished and confirmed with his authority, A.D. 500, the law of Constantine, allowing three causes of divorce, and three only, to the husband and to the wife. The Burgundians at the same date allowed divorce to the man for the causes specified by Constantine, but not to the woman. Among the Franks and the Alemanni divorce by mutual consent was permitted in the 7th century. At the Carlovingian era the law was generally made stricter, though Charles the Great himself divorced his wife Bertha and married Hildegard, holding himself to be in such matters above the laws. At the beginning of the 10th century Howel the Good, with three bishops, went to Rome "to consult the wise in what manner to improve the laws of Wales," and after the laws were drawn up "went a second time to Rome and obtained the judgment of the wise there, and ascertained those laws to be in accordance with the law of God and the law of countries and cities in the receipt of faith and baptism." Nevertheless the laws on divorce are remarkably lax. A husband and wife may separate before the end of seven years from their marriage-day on the husband's paying her dower to the woman; after seven years, on sharing their goods between them, the husband taking two-thirds of the children; but, "if a man deserts his wife unlawfully and takes another, the rejected wife is to remain in her house until the end of the ninth day; and then if she be suffered to depart entirely from her husband, everything belonging to her is to go in the first place out of the house, and then she is to go last out of the house after all her property: after that, on bringing the other into the house, he is to give a dilysdard (certificate) to the first wife, because no man, by law, is to have two wives. Whoever shall leave his wife and shall repent leaving her, she having been given to another husband, if the first husband overtake her with one foot in the bed and the other out, the first husband, by law, is to have her." (Cyfreithiau Hywel Dda ar ddull Dyfed, bk. ii. c. xviii. §§ 1, 2, 28, 29, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, i. 247.)

As in marriage, so in divorce, St. Paul supplements the teaching of our Lord by stating the law in a case which must have soon arisen among the early Christians. In 1 Cor. vii. 12-16 he lays down the rule that a marriage that has taken place between two heathens is not to be broken off by one of the two becoming a Christian; the marriage still holds good, and the convert to Christianity may not separate from his or her consort on the plea of his infidelity. But if the non-Christian party to the contract chooses to desert the one converted to Christianity, the latter is free from the previously existing conjugal obligations. In this passage St. Paul does not justify divorce, but only a separation, in which the Christian convert is merely to be passive. In the early church the negative character of this permission was recognised; in later times it has become changed into a positive right on the part of the convert, to be exercised at the discretion of the bishop, or rather it is declared a positive duty which must be performed by him, except a dispensation be obtained from the bishop (Liguori, Theologia Moralis, v. 957); and the meaning of "infidelity" is extended so as to include "heresy" (ibid. iii. 17). The modern Latin law of divorce, which allows four causes of divorce quoad vinculum (death, conversion, preference of monastic life, papal dispensation), and six causes of divorce quoad torum (adultery, ill-treatment, solicitation to heresy, leprosy, supervenient heresy, mutual consent) (Liguori, Theologia Moralis, vi. 957-975)—has only to be mentioned here in order to say that it was unknown to the early church.

Form of Divorce.—The Jews had a ceremonial of divorce as well as of marriage. The following are formulas given by Selden (Uxor Ebraica, iii. 24, Op. tom. iv. p. 797):—

"You may go to what man you will. This is a bill of divorce between me and thee; a letter of quittance, and instrument of dismissal, so you may marry whom you please."

"On such a day, of such a month, of such a year, I, such an one, son of such an one, from such a place, and by whatever other name or surname I, or my parent, or my birthplace, are known by, of my own will and purpose, and without compulsion, dismiss, quit, repudiate thee, such an one, daughter of such an one, from such a place, and by whatever other name or surname thou, or thy parent, or thy birthplace art known by, who up to this time hast been

* The author of the commentary that goes under the name of St. Ambrose, appears to have been the first to argue that the believer from whom his unbelieving consort had departed might marry again. If those who were separated from their wives by Ezra, he urged, might marry again, how much more those whose marriages had been dissolved by the infidelity of their consorts (Pseudo-Ambrose in 1 Cor. vii. 15)! Theodore of Canterbury ruled at the end of the 7th century, "If the wife is an unbeliever and a heathen, and cannot be converted, let her be dismissed" (Penitential, lib. ii. c. xii. § 18). If a husband and wife have separated while still heathens, and then been converted to Christianity, the same authority rules that the man may do as he pleases as to taking or leaving his wife (ibid. § 17).

my wife. And now I dismiss, quit, and repudiate thee that thou be free, and have the power of going away and marrying any other man. And no one on earth is to hinder thee from this day forward for ever. And now, behold, thou art permitted to be the wife of any man. And this is to be thy bill of divorce, the instrument of thy dismissal, and the letter of thy quittance, according to the law of Moses and the Israelites."

The above bills had to be signed by two witnesses and formally delivered to the wife or her proctor.

The Greek and Latin formulas were much shorter: It was only necessary to say, Ῥήναι πρᾶττε τὰ σά—Ἀνὲρ, πρᾶττε τὰ σά: or Τὰ σεαυτῆς πρᾶττε—Τὰ σεαυτοῦ πρᾶττε—and the Greek marriage was broken off. The Roman marriage was a more serious thing than that of any of the Greeks except the Spartans. To break off a marriage effected by confarreatio there was a form called diffarreatio, and a marriage by coemptio was dissolved by a form called remancipatio. For a length of time divorces were not heard of among the Romans; but under the empire they became common. Sometimes the nuptial tablets were broken and the key of the house taken from the woman, but the most significant part of the proceedings was the use of the form of the words:—"Tuas res tibi habeto" (Plautus, Amphitryon, act iii. sc. 2), or "Tuas res agito." Espousals were broken off by the formula:—"Conditione tuâ non utar." And the Lex Julia de adulteriis required the presence of seven witnesses to make a divorce valid. The early Christians followed for the most part the Roman practice; but as the marriage was contracted in the face of the church, so also the divorce might not be effected without the church's cognisance. We have already seen that the council of Agde, A.D. 506, excommunicates the man who presumed to dismiss his wife until he has proved her guilt before the bishop of the province in which he lived (can. xxv., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1001).

Remarriage after divorce.—The distinction between separation a mensâ et thoro and divorce a vinculo (the last of which alone qualifies for remarriage) was not formulated in the early church: and this is perhaps one reason why the imperial laws passed so readily, as by the swing of a pendulum, from severity to laxity, and from laxity to severity. There are fewer canons of councils bearing upon the question of remarriage after divorce than might have been expected. In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vi. c. 17), and in the so-called fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (can. lxi.), the clergy are forbidden to be married to a divorced woman, which implies that under some circumstances at least a divorced woman might be married. In the Apostolical Canons, indeed, there appears a rule forbidding a man who has divorced his wife to marry again, and forbidding marriage to a divorced woman on pain of excommunication (can. xlviii.); but this canon is commonly understood to refer only to men who had illegally put away their wives, or to women who had illegally separated from their husbands. (See Balsamon's exposition, In Canon. Apostol. p. 258, Paris, 1620.) At the council of Arles, A.D. 314, it was enacted that young men who had put away their wives for adultery should be advised not to marry again as long as their first wife was living, but no yoke of compulsion was laid upon them (can. x.). The council of Elvira, about the same date, decreed that a woman who had separated from her husband without cause and had married again should be for ever excommunicated; and that a woman who had separated from her husband on the ground of his adultery, and had married again, should not be received to communion until her first husband was dead; and that a woman who had married a man that had separated from his wife without cause should be for ever excommunicated (cans. viii. ix. x.). The last of these canons implies that the man who separates from her with sufficient cause might marry again. Tertullian dissuades remarriage in all cases, but in his treatise addressed to his wife he allows that it is lawful after death or divorce (Ad Uxor. ii. 1). In his treatise on Monogamy he declares marriage after divorce unlawful (c. xi.) Lactantius holds remarriage permissible in the husband who has dismissed his wife for adultery (Inst. vi. 23). Remarriage in the man is by implication permitted by the council of Vannes, A.D. 465 (can. ii., Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 797). Origen (in opposition to the opinion of some of his contemporaries) and St. Jerome declare it not permissible in the woman (Orig. Com. in Matt. xiv. 23, Op. tom. iii. p. 347; Hieron. Epist. ad Ammand., Op. tom. iv. p. 162). Elsewhere St. Jerome pronounces against it in both parties (see in Matt. xix. 9, Op. tom. iv. p. 87). Athenagoras disallows it altogether (Legat. c. xxxiii.). Pope Innocent I. in his letter to Exuperius condemns it in both parties (Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 1005). At the second council of Milevis, A.D. 416, it was forbidden to both parties (can. xvii., ibid. p. 1220; and at a council of Carthage of the year 407, from which the prohibition was adopted as the rule of the African church (Cod. Eccles. Afric. can. cii.). The prohibition was repeated by a council of Nantes, of uncertain date, supposed by some to have been held in the year 658 (can. xii., Hard. Concil. tom. vi. p. 459), by the council of Herford (Hertford) under archbishop Theodore, A.D. 673,* (cap. x., ibid. tom. iii. p. 1017), by the capitulary of Aix, A.D. 789 (cap. xliii., ibid. tom. iv. p. 836), and by the council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (can. x., ibid. tom. iv. p. 859). The prohibitory rule is enforced by Hermæ Pastor (lib. ii. mand. iv. tom. i. p. 87, ed. Cotelier), St. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. xvii. Op. tom. vii. p. 227), St. Basil (Moralia, Reg. lxxiii. 1, Op. tom. ii. p. 494, Paris, 1637). St. Augustine speaks with hesitation (De Fide et Oper. c. xix., Op. tom. vi. p. 221). Epiphanius declares that the Word of God does not condemn a man who marries again after having separated from a wife proved guilty of adultery, fornication, or any such base guilt (Haer. lix. 4). Theodore's Penitential allows a husband's remarriage if the woman was his first wife, and permits the wife's remarriage, on her repentance, after five years' (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 5). Elsewhere he orders that a man who divorces his wife and marries again shall do seven years' severe penance or fifteen years' light penance (lib. i. cap. xiv. § 8). If we are to reconcile these two rulings, we must suppose that in the latter case is meant a man who has divorced his wife for some less offence than fornication. If a wife leaves her husband, and he thereupon remarries, he is to do one year's penance; if she returns to the husband whom she had left, having lived innocently meantime, she is also to do one year's penance; if she does not return, she is to do three years' penance (ibid. § 13). If a wife haughtily refuses to be reconciled with her husband, after five years he may marry again with the bishop's leave (lib. ii. cap. xii. § 19).

The civil law permitted remarriage. A law of Honorius enacts that if a woman put away her husband for grave reasons, she might marry after five years; and that a man in like case might marry as soon as he thought proper; if the reasons for the divorce were of a less grave character, the man must wait for two years before taking another wife; if he had no reasons he might not marry again, but the injured woman might remarry after the lapse of a year (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xvi. leg. 2). See also the Codex Justinianus, lib. v. tit. xvii. legg. 8, 9. The laws of Ethelbert, established in the time of Augustine for England, A.D. 597, enact with great simplicity that an adulterer is "to provide another wife with his own money" for the injured husband, "and bring her to him" (Doom xxi. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils of Great Britain, iii. p. 45).

The general conclusion that we arrive at from a review of the documents and authorities of the early church is that while the remarriage of the guilty party was sternly and uncompromisingly condemned, there was no consensus on the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the remarriage of the innocent party. After a time an ever-widening divergence exhibited itself on this point, as on others, in the practice and teaching of the eastern and western divisions of the church. Eastern theology at length framed for itself rules shortly expressed in the following canons, found in the synodical decisions of Alexius, who was patriarch of Constantinople in the beginning of the 11th century:—

"1. No clergyman is to be condemned for giving the benediction at the marriage of a divorced woman, when the man's conduct was the cause of the divorce.

"2. Women divorced by men whose conduct has been the cause of the divorce are not to be blamed if they choose to marry again, nor are the priests to be blamed who give them the benediction. So, too, with regard to men.

"3. Whoever marries a woman divorced for adultery is an adulterer, whether he has himself been married before or not, and he must undergo the adulterer's penance.

"4. Any priest who gives the benediction at the second marriage of parties divorced by mutual consent (which is a thing forbidden by the laws) shall be deprived of his office" (see Selden, Uxor Ebraica, iii. 32, Op. tom. iv. p. 855).

The teaching embodied in these canons and the practice founded upon it has continued to be the teaching and the practice of the Oriental church to the present day. In the East, therefore, the once doubtful question of the legality of the remarriage of the innocent party after divorce has been resolved in the affirmative sense; in the Latin church it has been determined in the negative, except when a papal dispensation has intervened, which, according to modern Roman theology makes all things possible and allowable. In England the law of the land permits the remarriage of both parties when a divorce has been judicially declared; but having regard to the consciences of the clergy of the church, in whose eyes the remarriage of the guilty party would be presumably a wrong act, it does not require that the ceremony of the second nuptials should be performed by them.

MARRIAGE (IN ART). The form of treatment, or the amount of notice, which the Christian rite of marriage received from the artists of the primitive church varied with the view taken of the solemn union of man and woman by her authorities. The ascetic principle, which had almost entirely prevailed in the Eastern world, began to influence Italy and Europe almost as powerfully after the sack of Rome by Alaric. It need not be connected in our minds with misanthropy, the desire for power, or any equivocal motive; it was related more closely to terror at the wickedness, distress, and degradation of the present world, with the desire of escape from some of its dangers, and especially, as a consequence of these sufferings, with the hope of the speedy coming of Christ to judgment, and the end of the world. That this had a direct effect on art is proved by the number of mosaic pictures, in particular, which direct the thoughts of the worshipper to the scenery of the Apocalypse, the symbolic or trance-seen manifestations of the coming of the Son of Man; or image forth His glory in Heaven, contrasted in the same picture with His presence as the Lamb of Sacrifice among men on this side of Jordan, and in the wilderness of the world. It might be expected accordingly that four or five centuries, at least in Italy. The monuments or relics connected with marriage seem to be of two kinds; either cups, glasses, signets, or other memorials of the union of the parties, or sepulchral effigies commemorative of the marriage bond as perfected and completed, by their death in wedlock. The earliest of these latter which we possess is the tomb of Probus and Proba, early in the latter half of the 4th century. The fragments of cups and platters have principally been found in catacombs or tombs of early date; and as it seems agreed that the catacombs were never used for fresh burials after the taking of Rome by Alaric, and with less frequency for some time before that event, these relics cannot be later than the 4th century. [See GLASS, CHRISTIAN, note 5, p. 734.] That few or none of them are earlier or later than the 4th century (unless certain Greek forms be excepted) seems highly probable.

Taking these memorial glasses first, there are two given by Martigny (Dict. p. 388) from Garrucci's Vetri, &c. trovati nei cimiteri dei primitivi Cristiani, tav. xxvi. 11, 12 (see woodcut, No. 1), which seem to indicate the ritual of Christian marriage in the earliest times. The parties stand side by side with joined hands; or rather the husband takes the right hand of the wife in his, as if in the act of plighting troth. Martigny refers to Tobit vii. 13 on this point, but that passage describes the action of a father in giving his daughter away to her husband. There is exact resemblance between the action of the two figures, and that of Hercules taking the hand of Minerva, on a heathen glass given in Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. xxvii.; Garrucci, tav. xxxv.⁴ Above the figures is the monogram of our Lord to indicate wedlock in Him. The crown of marriage sometimes takes the place of the monogram, as in fig. 11, pl. xxvi. (see Tertullian, de Corona, xiii. "coronant nuptiae sponsores;," and in other cases the symbolism is completed by a figure of Christ placing the crown on their heads (woodcut, No. 2). Inscriptions are frequent on these glasses, arranged round the figures (see ib. d.) giving their names, with "Vivatis in Deo," or some other words of blessing.

A rolled paper or volume is sometimes placed near the bride, and is thought to refer to the dowry. See Garrucci, tav. xxvii. 1; Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 3, "tabulae nuptiales." The bride stands on her husband's right invariably. She is not veiled, and is richly dressed and ornamented, perhaps in remembrance of Ps. xlv. 10, 14, 15. As to the veil, see MARRIAGE, p. 1108, and VEIL. He further mentions an interesting relic figured in P. Mozzoni's Tavole Cronologiche della storia della Chiesa, Venice, 1856-63, saec. iv. p. 47. It is a small chest belonging to a lady's wardrobe, with heathen figures carved on it, accompanied nevertheless by the upright monogram, combined thus, A P ω with the A and ω , and the motto SECUNDE ET PROJECTA VIVATIS IN CHR. It may have been a wedding present. A gold medal at sec. v., p. 55 (a volume of this work is assigned to each century), such works of art as either represent or commemorate the marriage of Christian persons would chiefly or entirely be confined to the first is said to have been struck at the marriage of Marcianus and Pulcheria. They are represented with nimbi, the figure of the Lord above with the cruciform nimbus, and the legend FELICITER NUBTIS surrounds the device.

II. As memorials of the family, a number of gilded glass vessels and devices are in existence, which appear to represent deceased heads of families; often with their children (Buonarrotti, tav. xxiii. xxvi. &c.; Garrucci, xxx.) or crowned by the Lord (xxix. 1). These were probably used at agapae, and indicate a connexion or relation between the Christian and the ethnic funeral feast. Engraved stones and rings are common; one from P. Lupi (Severae Martyris Epitaph. p. 64. 1) represents two fishes embracing an anchor, which may or may not symbolise a Christian pair.

But our chief examples are found on sarcophagi. That of Probus and Proba has been mentioned, and will be found in Bottari, tav. xvi. (Airinghi, vol. i. p. 283). It represents the wedded pair with an aspect of deep distress, as in the act of parting.

The sarcophagus of Valeria Latobia (p. 291) has two figures bearing the same aspect; at least, if Bosio's draughtsmen are to be trusted, Valeria is taking her husband's hand by the wrist (reversing the ordinary action) as if bidding him farewell. They are separated by an object, which may be taken for three large rolls of paper or parchment bound together, and the husband carries the usual volumen also. Airinghi thinks they represent the scriptures. Martigny thinks the smaller roll is the consular mappa.

The dolphins on the tomb of Valeria are probably symbolic of affection, and the turtle-doves or other birds in the spandrels of the small arches on that of Probus and Proba may have the same meaning. See St. Ambrose (de Abraham, ii. c. 8, 53), with reference to Luke ii. 22 sqq. "duos pullos columbarum quod in columba spiritalis gratia sit, in turtura incorruptae generationis natura, vel immaculata corporis castimonia."

Martigny mentions a marble sarcophagus, carved apparently on the same principle of composition as the last-mentioned, of dividing the front by pillars into arched recesses, where the spaces are filled by figures of the different ages of a soldier, and of his courtship and marriage. It was discovered at Arles in 1844. (See Bulletin de l'Institut de Corresp. Archéol. an 1844, p. 12 sqq.) It is in good classical style, and might be taken for a heathen monument, if the miracle of the loaves were not sculptured on the sides. This may be a Christian addition made to an antique sarcophagus, and doves and fruits are also found on the ornamental carvings.

For children and domestic scenes on the glass and gold cups, see Garrucci, Vetri, tav. xxix. 45, xxxii. 11, 2, 3, xxxi. 4. Lesson learning is going on in xxix. 4; and in xxxii. 1 a mother offers her breast to her child. [R. St. J. T.]

MARTYR. The Greek word μάρτυς signifies one who has such immediate knowledge of past events as is derived from actual participation in them, and does not keep this knowledge to himself, but makes deposition of it freely as a freeman, and makes it his μαρτυρία or evidence, the knowledge being such as to constitute a μαρτύριον, or testimony, as affecting a question not only of facts but of merits.

I. i. The history of the Christian modification of the term is as follows: (a) The office of public, oral, ocular testimony was insufficiently discharged till the testimony was recorded, as the sentence against Christ had been passed, in a court of law. The word is used specially for such official testimony, of Stephen (Acts xxiii. 20), of Paul at Rome (Acts xxiii. 11, 1 Tim. ii. 6), of James (Heges. ap. Eus. ii. 23), of Peter and Paul (Clem. Rom. 5), of John (Polycrates ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24).

(b) The idea of martyrdom at first was not of maltreatment, but of a perilous dignity. The witnesses won their title of honour by courage without suffering. The title was co-ordinate with bishop and teacher (Polycr. ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24), and prophet (Eus. H. E. v. xviii. 7). The typical instances are the grandsons of Jude, who were accused before Domitian and released unscathed, and took the lead ever after in the churches as martyrs (Hegesipp. ap. Eus. H. E. iii. 20, 32).

(c) The martyrs would have been mere confessors, not witnesses, but that they "endured as seeing Him who is invisible." Thus they not only "confessed," but "witnessed the good confession." The confessors were "the companions of the martyrs" (Bullettini, 1864, p. 25). "Confession," says Clement of Alexandria, "is possible for all; the grace of testifying by speech is only given to some" (Strom. iv. 9). Steadfastness under torture was the testimony to which the advocates of Christianity appealed. It was needful that the honours and authority of martyrdom should not be won too easily. Hence, not merely peril, but actual suffering became indispensable to constitute martyrdom. Those, for instance, who had been condemned to the quarries were honoured as martyrs (Philosophumena, ix. 12; Tert. de Pudicit. 22).

(d) Bloodshedding (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 4), instead of speech, became the mode of the testimony. "The custom of the brotherhood," says Origen (in Joann. ii. 28, t. iv. p. 88, cf. Cypr. Epp. x. 2, xxviii. 1, xxxvi. 2), "calls those alone properly martyrs who have testified to the mystery of godliness by the shedding of their own blood." This public testimony, expressed not in words, but in blood, was far more than testimony; it was martyrdom.

(e) Many Christian Virginias and Lucretias committed suicide to escape the brutal lusts of their persecutors. They are extolled as martyrs by Eusebius and Chrysostom (Eus. H. E. viii. 12, 14; Chrys. T. 1, Hom. 40). Augustine pronounces the practice unlawful, unless instigated by a special revelation (De Civitate Dei, I. xvi.-xxv. 30-39).

(f) Martyrs were made by popular riots and lynch law, without any judicial proceedings (Eus. H. E. vi. 41).

(g) It was once a complaint "Martyrio meo privor, dum morte praevenior" (Cypr. de Mortalitate, p. 167, ed. Oxon.), and this applied even to deaths in prison before the case was heard. There seem to have been cases of suicide in gaol to avoid torture (Tertullian, de Jejunio, c. 12). But the names of those who died in prison were recorded in A.D. 177 (Eus. H. E. v. 4), and in Africa, in A.D. 202 (Acta Perpetuae, c. 14), and they are expressly reckoned as martyrs by Cyprian (Ep. 12 (37)).

(h) Flight from persecution, though reproached by Tertullian (de Fugá), was enjoined by Christ (Matt. x. 23), and the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 3, cf. viii. 45) recommend the fugitives as deserving the same care as the martyrs in gaol. Those who perished in the hardships of their flight were recognised by Cyprian as martyrs, whose martyrdom was witnessed by Christ (Ep. lviii. (lvi.), c. 4).

(i) The death of the Innocents murdered by Herod was regarded as an active martyrdom, "testimonium Christi sanguine litavere" (Tert. in Valentin. c. 2), "martyria fecerunt" (Cypr. Ep. viii. 6). The recognition of it as such was closely connected with the sanction of infant baptism (Cypr. Ep. lxiv. (lix.)).

(k) Athanasius recognises as martyrs those who fell at the hands of the Arians. (Ath. ad Mon. p. 277.)

(l) In A.D. 368 some Christians, put to death for calling an officer of Valentinian's to justice, were celebrated as martyrs. The testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 7) to this fact is most explicit and circumstantial, though absurdly derided by Gibbon. So Augustine (in Psalm. 140, c. 26) calls John Baptist a martyr to truth and justice.

(m) Augustine says one becomes a martyr on a sick bed by refusing to be cured by magic (Serm. 286, c. 28; cf. Serm. 318).

(n) Augustine says again, You will go hence a martyr if you have overcome all the temptations of the devil (Serm. 4, c. 4).

(o) Readiness for martyrdom is regarded as itself martyrdom (Chrys. ii. 601, ed. Migne).

ii. We have traced the change of the meaning of the word from witness to martyr. As a title of honour among the Christians, the term was adopted into Latin along with Christianity. In the languages of Oriental Christendom it is represented by some native equivalent that has undergone a like change of meaning. The testimony of innocence and endurance was transfigured into the "peace, and grace, and glory" of martyrdom. What this meant and was, may be seen in the acts of the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons (Eus. H. E. v. i.), and of Perpetua. Martyrdom could not be perfect while the martyr still lived in the flesh. This was dimly apprehended by Ignatius, and was clearly grasped by the Lyonnese confessors. (Eus. H. E. v. ii.) To their brethren they seemed martyrs many times over; they themselves declined the title. "They are already martyrs whom Christ the Veritable Martyr has taken to Himself: we are confessors mean and lowly." The line was not immediately and universally drawn where they drew it. They themselves, though declining the title, exercised the prerogatives of martyrs. In Cyprian's time the lapsed went round to the martyrs everywhere, and corrupted the confessors too (Cyp. Epp. 20), and therefore Cyprian wrote to the martyrs and confessors (Epp. 10, 15). A martyr as distinct from a confessor was one who had shed his blood, and could grant absolution. But in Rome the title was by that time limited to the dead. (Cyp. Epp. 28, 37.) Cyprian usually conforms to Roman usage (cf. Epp. 22, 27, 66), though at the close of his days he wrote to the martyrs in the mines (Ep. 76). "What martyr," asks Tertullian, "is a denizen of the world, a suppliant for a shilling, at the mercy of the usurer or the physician?" (Tert. de Pudic. c. 22.)

The first great interruption of the peace of the church in the third century seems to have fixed the title to the departed, namely, Maximin's persecution in Rome, those of Decius and Valerian in Africa.

By the beginning of the 4th century the limitation of the term martyr to the defunct seems to have been quite established, though it is just possible to doubt whether in writing "A whole choir of martyrs greets you at once," St. Lucian (A.D. 312) means to convey a salutation from his fellow prisoners, or the tidings of an auto da fé. He adds that Anthimus has been consummated in the course of martyrdom (Routh, Reliquiae, iv. p. 5). Death, the consummation of martyrdom, was already regarded as the consummation of the martyr. After the triumph of the church under Constantine, "living martyr" became an oxymoron. Yet Gregory Nazianzen in the oration (no. xx) in which he so uses the phrase, speaks of Basil being gathered as "a martyr to the martyrs," though it was only his whole life that was his martyrdom.

Before the close of the 4th century the Pagan

Latin historian Ammianus Marcellinus (xxii. 17) says: "Those who when subjected to compulsion to make them deviate from religion have endured torture and persevered to a glorious death with faith unbroken, now are called martyrs." Elsewhere he explains the term to signify "divinitati acceptos" (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 7).

iii. Limitations of the title.

(1) Heretics were excluded. Martyrs were at first of any sect that suffered for the name of Christ. The early Gnostics declined martyrdom (Revelation ii. 14, 15; Tertullian, Scorpice, i.; Epiphanius, Hist. Haer. xxiv. 4; Clem. Strom. iv. 4), saying that the martyrs died for Simon of Cyrene. But the Marcionites (Eus. Mart. Pal. 10) and the Montanists courted it. Apollinaris of Hierapolis tells that in his time Catholic martyrs refused communion with Montanists to the last (Eus. H. E. v. 16). Compare Const. Apost. v. 9.

(2) Schismatics were excluded. Cyprian (de Unitate, c. 14) says, He cannot be a martyr who is not in the church. So the Roman confessors (Cyp. Ep. 36). Augustine says, Outside the church you will be punished everlastingly though you have been burnt alive for the name of Christ (Ep. 173 (204), c. 6).

(3) Self-sought martyrdom was not allowed as such. Such a would-be martyr lapsed at the time of Polycarp's martyrdom (Mart. Polyc. c. 4). Clemens Alexandrinus speaks of self-surrender as heretical, and founded on disbelief in the Creator (Strom. iv. 4). There were instances in which it was justified (Tertullian, ad Scapulam, 5; Acta Theodoti, Ruinart), and some such martyrs, e.g. Euclipsus and Eulalia, were most celebrated. Eusebius approved the practice (Mart. Pal. 3; H. E. vii. 12). But Mensurius of Carthage (Aug. Breviculus collat. diei III. xiii. 25) and Peter of Alexandria (Canon ix.; Routh, iv. 32) forbade it.

(4) Iconoclasm (without imperial fiat) was disapproved by the teachers of the church. The 60th canon of Illiberis states, If any break idols and be slain on the spot, as it is not written in the gospel, nor found to have been done under the apostles, he is not to be received into the number of the martyrs. The 41st canon even allows the faithful to have idols in their houses if they fear that their slaves would offer violence in case of their removal.

(5) Individual scruples were refused recognition. Resistance to the obligations of military service, (which was the ground of the martyrdom of Maximilian in Mauritania in A.D. 296: see his Acts in Ruinart,) is made a bar to communion by the third canon of the 1st council of Arles.

(6) "Martyrem non facit poena sed causa." The conception that suffering is martyrdom is implied in the practice of the Donatists of offering themselves to armed wayfarers, and demanding with terrible threats the stroke of martyrdom (Aug. Ep. 185 (50); T. ii. coll. 7, 8). But this was disapproved by others of their number (Aug. Ep. 204 (61); T. ii. col. 940).

iv. Those who were arrested and not yet heard in court were called martyrs designate (Tertullian ad Martyres). Those of whose firmness their brethren were not quite confident are named by Tertullian uncertain martyrs (Tert. de Sejuni, c. 12).

v. The later Greeks adopt a classification of martyrs into various classes.

Hieromartyrs are the martyrs of the clergy.

Hosiomartyrs are martyred monks.

Megalomartyrs are the martyrs of the soldiery.

Parthenomartyrs are virgin martyrs.

Anargyri, the title of the twin physicians Cosmas and Damian, is extended to Sergius and Bacchus, and to John and Cyrus, two similar pairs.

We find the term megalomartyr in Theophylact Simocatta (v. 14). Some trace of such classification appears in Polycrates ap. Eus. H. E. v. 24.

II. Laws under which the Christians suffered.—

(1) General. In ancient civilisation idolatry was almost inseparable from daily life. Education (Tertullian, de Idololatriâ, c. 10), commerce (ib. c. 11), public amusements (ib. c. 13), marriages, funerals, social intercourse (c. 16), domestic service (c. 17), state affairs (c. 18), military duty (c. 19), all involved idolatry. The Jews, indeed, had dealings with the Gentiles everywhere and kept clear of idolatry. Hence, while the only intolerance shewn to other religions was an occasional attempt to keep the worship of Isis outside the walls of Rome (Dio, liv. 6, Val. Max. I. iii.), Judaism was detested, and all the charges rebutted by Tertullian from the Christians, secret enormities (Tert. Apol. 7-9), impious atheism (ib. 10-28), disaffection to the empire (ib. 29-35), enmity to mankind (ib. 36-41), laziness (ib. 42-46), priestcraft (ib. 46-49), are brought also as calumnies against the Jews (Tac. Hist. V. 4, 5; Juv. Sat. xiv. 96 ff.). Besides disbelief in the gods led easily to sacrilege (Acts xix. 37; Rom. ii. 32), a charge not brought against the Christians. (Tert. Apol. 41.) Yet the Jews were tolerated, were protected in the observance of their code, exempted from civil action on the Sabbath, excused from adoring the image of the emperor, and even permitted to make proselytes. Enactments in their favour are collected by Josephus (Ant. Jud. XVI. vi.).

Stringent as were the Roman laws against treason, a crime into which words as well as acts might be interpreted—especially any disrespect to the emperor's images—and which rendered all ranks alike liable to torture (Paul. Sent. v. xxix.; Sueton. Octav. 27; Amm. Marcell. xxix. 12; Arnob. iv. 24; Digest. XLVIII. iv.), the only acts of the Christians which could be construed as treasonable were such as were freely permitted to the Jews. The example of Joseph might encourage either Christian or Jew to swear by the life of Caesar. (Tert. Apol. 32.) They could plead that to call him a god before his death would be ill-omened (ib. 34).

Again, meetings for worship might be construed as treasonable (see Digest. XLVII. xxii. 2, XLVIII. iv. 1), and were at any rate strictly illegal, even in fulfilment of a vow, and even for veterans, unless express imperial or senatorial sanction for them were producible (Sueton. Julius, 42; Octav. 32; Digest. III. iv.; XLVII. xi. 3, xxii.), and the old laws against even private worship of gods unrecognised by the state (Cic. de Leg. ii. 8) were not quite extinct (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32); but Jewish worship, public or private, had sanction.

The formation of guilds and clubs was strictly forbidden by Trajan (Plin. Ep. x. 42, 43, 97). Afterwards it was more and more frequently permitted to the lower classes for one special purpose, the burial of the dead. These guilds had a common chest like little commonwealths, and an agent, called an actor or syndic, who appeared for them in any legal disputes (Dig. III. iv. 1). All the functions of the church were permitted to them, as the church is described by Tertullian. "Approved elders preside. Everyone brings a little sum on a certain day in the month, or when he pleases, and only if he pleases, and only if he can. From this stock payments are made, not for feasts, but for support and burial of the poor and of destitute orphans and bedridden old people and shipwrecked sailors and convicts in the mines or islands or jails" (Tert. Apol. 39). This was only illegal because senatorial sanction was requisite in each case.

Witchcraft was a capital crime by Jewish law. Roman procedure varied, for people of that sort were always being forbidden and always being retained (Tac. Hist. i. 22). "Burn him alive" is the outcry of the rabble in Lucian's Asinus, c. 54, but the law given by Paulus (Sent. V. xxiii. 17) decreeing this death for the wizards and crucifixion or the beasts for their accomplices may be later. Death or banishment is the penalty that we find historically in the 1st century (Tac. Ann. ii. 32, xii. 52; Dio, lvii. 15; Juv. Sat. vi. 660 ff.). Supposed possession of magical powers was enough to make a humble individual formidable and culpable for treason.

Any departure from the ordinary reverence for the gods might easily be linked with an attempt to turn the gods into slaves. Two main branches of supernatural art, astrology and exorcism, were largely in Jewish hands, and Moses was reputed to have been a mighty wizard.

Any new superstition was looked upon as a school of magic—"Magi estis quia novum nescio quod genus superstitionis inducitis" (Acta Achatii, § 7, Ruinart). Otherwise works of beneficence would rather lead the rabble to regard the wonder-worker as a god than as a wizard. Busy slander might produce a revolution of feeling, but to all supernatural pretensions, magisterial scepticism had a ready answer, the doom of death.

(2) Special. Thus far we have reviewed the first part only of the laws against the Christians, namely the previously existing legal principles that could be turned against them by "unjust disputations of the juris-consults." These charges of impiety, foreign superstitions, treason, unlawful assemblage, magic, appear to M. Le Blant sufficient to explain all the persecutions. But Lactantius (Instit. Div. v. 11) tells us that Ulpian also collected in the first book of his last work, De Officio Proconsulis, another set of laws, which the very nature of the case and the whole tenor of the acts of the martyrs and of the writings of the apologists prove to have existed, the "sacrilegious constitutions" and "nefarious rescripts" of the emperors directly censuring it.

It was indeed necessary in order to bring the principles which are specified above into play against the Christians, that there should be authoritative definitions, distinguishing Christianity from the lawful religion of Judaism, and refusing it sanction for its rites or concessions to its scruples. It was needful that the various suspicions of guilt, which could not be urged against the same act under different laws, without transgressing a principle of jurisprudence (Digest, XLVIII. ii. 14), should all be brought under one head, and summed up into a single crime.

(a) If we inquire when Christianity was first made criminal, the answer of antiquity is unanimous. In A.D. 64, his mistress, Poppaea, being a Jewish proselyte (Jos. Ant. Jud. xxviii. 11; cf. Tac. Ann. xiii. 45, xv. 6), Nero had made Rome a very Sodom, when a fiery doom fell. The flames spared the Jewish quarter across the Tiber, so, as culprits were wanted in order to remove the suspicion from Nero himself, the conflagration was charged on members of the new sect, who confessed and betrayed the names of others. Then a decree of the emperor, probably also of the obsequious and not reluctant senate, made the profession of Christianity a crime, supposed to imply enmity to the human race, and sentenced to be visited with death, by beasts, crosses, flames, or novel horrors invented on purpose.* Their deaths were turned to sport, and Nero gave his own gardens for the show (Tac. Ann. xv. 44; Sulpicius, Hist. ii. 41; Tert. Apol. 5). We have no hint of any opportunity of pardon on recantation, for those once arrested. The persecution was extended to the provinces (cf. I Pet. iv. 12-19), and even a civis Romanus ingenuus like Paul was beheaded (Tertullian, Scorpiace, 15).

The Neronian persecution has only left us two certain names of martyrs, Peter and Paul, of each of whom their disciple, Clement, says emphatically, ἐμαρτύρησεν (c. 5), while of the other victims murdered by Nero he only says that they suffered unhallowed outrages (c. 6). "Guilty as the Christians were," says Tacitus (l. c.), "pity for them arose." Yet on Nero's death, when all his other constitutions were cancelled, we are told that this decree against the Christians alone remained ("permansit erasis omnibus hoc solum institutum Neronianum," Tertull. ad Nationes, i. 7). So we learn from Dio that Vespasian in A.D. 70, after Jerusalem was taken, wrote to Rome, "wiping out the disgrace of those who had been condemned for what were called impieties by Nero and those who had ruled after him, alike of the living and of the dead, and putting an end to accusations on such charges"

(Dio Cassius, lxxvi. 9). The senatus-consultum against the Christians remained apparently unrepealed, only suspended by this imperial despatch (cf. Eus. H. E. v. 21).

(b) In the reign of Domitian, if we may trust the Colbertine Acts of Ignatius (c. 1), there were many persecutions. The grandsons of Jude, sent as prisoners to Domitian by Invocatus, as chiefs of the house of David, were dismissed contemptuously as harmless peasants, and Domitian stopped this persecution (Hegesipp. in Eus. H. E. iii. 20, 32).

In A.D. 95, in the exaction of tribute from the Jews, profession of faith was made imperative for every one, and the Christians were accused of atheism. Some were put to death, others were strip of their property. Among the chief sufferers were Clemens and Domitilla, cousins to the emperor, and parents of his heirs. Clemens, though consul of the year, was beheaded: Domitilla was only banished to the isle Pandataria. Glabrio, who had been consul with Trajan in A.D. 91, and had been compelled to fight with a lion in the very year of his consulate, was now put to death, on the same charges as the rest, and also on the ground of his easy victory over the lion. Compare Suetonius Domitian, c. 12: "deferebantur qui vel improfessi judaice viverent," Dio Cassius, lxxvii. 14, Bruttius in Eus. H. E. iii. 18, and Hieronym. Ep. 96 [27] and Eus. Chron. Olymp. 218. Domitilla has given her name to a Roman cemetery, where De Rossi has found inscriptions identifying the site as her property, and a shrine adorned with first century Christian paintings, and especially with a vine branch (καλήμα) in allusion to the name of Clemens. (Bullettini, 1865, pp. 33 ff., 91 ff.) In A.D. 96 Nerva proclaimed general toleration (Dio Cassius, lxxviii. 1), and closed the second oecumenical persecution, and the last till the days of Decius (Melito ap. Eus. H. E. iv. 26; Tert. Apol. c. 5; Lactant. de Mortibus, c. 3).

(c) Trajan is universally recognised as a persecutor. The chronology of his reign is somewhat hard to determine. According to the Colbertine Acts of Ignatius, the triumph over the Dacians was followed by a persecution of the Christians, Christianity being regarded by the soldierly Trajan as insubordination. Trajan's first triumph over the Dacians was in A.D. 102. It seems to have been somewhat later in his reign that Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, suffered (Hegesippus, ap. Eus. H. E. iii. 32, cf. Zahn, Patres Apostolici, ii. 307).

In A.D. 112, according to Mommsen, Trajan wrote his famous rescript to Pliny (Plin. Ep. x. 97, 98), making Christianity still a capital crime, but forbidding search for the offenders, or anonymous accusations, and decreeing pardon for any who recanted. Under this law it was possible for bold Christians to present apologies for the faith without being themselves arraigned. The apologies of Aristides and Quadratus presented to Hadrian in A.D. 125 (cf. Clinton ad ann.) were immediately followed by the rescript of that emperor to Fundanus, insisting that definite illegal acts must be alleged against the Christians by responsible accusers (Eus. H. E. iv. 9; Melito ap. Eus. iv. 26; Justin, Apol. I. ad fin.; Aube, pp. 264, 275).

Nothing certain is known about the persecution of the Christians by Hadrian. The martyr acts

* The construction of the passage in Tacitus is obscure, but becomes clearer if we suppose him to be transcribing with a change of tense the actual terms of the senatus-consultum, which in that case seems to have been artfully worded, so as to stretch phrases descriptive of the old punishment of parricide, to be sewn up in a hide with a dog and thrown into the river, and of simple crucifixion, so as to make them include the novel sports of dressing men up as beasts, and setting dogs at them, or setting dogs at them as they hung on their crosses. "Pereuntibus addenda ludibria: ferasum tergis contacti laniatu canum intereant aut crucibus affixi; aut flammandi, atque ubi defecerit dies in usum nocturni luminis urantur." The tunica molesta, or plaguy shirt, seems to owe its origin to the charge of arson. The victim's throat was not fast, lest he should inhale the smoke and suffocate himself. The threat of this penalty was afterwards used to compel a gladiator to play the part of Mucius (Martial, Epig. x. 25).

assigned to his reign do not inspire confidence. The first historian who reckons him as a persecutor is Sulpicius Severus, and he connects his persecution with the foundation of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem. This seems probable enough, for we must remember that till then the Hebrew church survived, that the foundation of Aelia was an insolent rearing of the abomination of desolation on the sacred sites, that at the same time circumcision was forbidden, and that these events synchronized with the deification of the vile Antinous (Clinton, A.D. 130-132). Barcochbas, the leader of the Jewish revolt, practised all manner of cruelties upon the Christians (Justin. Apol. I. 31), and the mother church of Jerusalem ceased to be, and was succeeded by a Gentile congregation at Aelia (Eus. H. E. iv. 6). The only martyr of this reign of whom we have certain knowledge, is the bishop of Rome, Telesphorus, whose execution may be assigned to A.D. 136 or 137.

There is some uncertainty as to the identity and date of Arrius Antoninus, an urgent persecutor in Asia, who, when all the Christians of the town presented themselves before him in a band, ordered some to be led off to execution, and said to the rest, "Wretches, if you want to die, there are precipices, and you have halters." (Tertull. ad Scap. c. 5.)

The chief danger of the Christians, however, was from popular outcries, and the most prominent members of the church bore the brunt of the assault, and quenched the fury of their adversaries by their death (cf. Origen in Joann. vi. 36; t. iv. p. 133). A notable instance is Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who was burnt on Saturday the 23rd of February, A.D. 155 (Waddington, Vie du Rhéteur Aristide, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, 1867, t. xxvi. pp. 203 ff., 232 ff.). The sufferings of the martyrs were the occasion and the staple of the apologies. Thus the apology of Justin complained of the martyrdom of Ptolemy by Urbiculus, i.e. between A.D. 156 and 160. This seems to have elicited the extant rescript of Pius (cos. iv. trib. pot. pp. xxi. i.e. A.D. 158—given as of Marcus in A.D. 161, by Eusebius, H. E. iv. 13), addressed to the council of Asia, demanding proof, not merely of Christianity but of treason, and in default of such proof, threatening the accuser with condign punishment. The genuineness of this rescript has been doubted, because of its frank recognition of the piety of the Christians, and of their superiority to the sycophants who accused them. This seems to us quite in keeping with the character of Pius.

(d) Marcus, the noblest of the emperors, appears as a persecutor. His sincere piety in troublous times probably decreed universal religious observances with which the Christians could not comply. Both the acts of Justin (A.D. 166), the earliest that appear really to be taken down by a notary at the time, and the apology of Melito (Eus. H. E. iv. 26), written upon occasion of the martyrdom of Sagaris of Laodicea, A.D. 167 (Aubé, p. 362), speak of edicts ordaining that all who were caught should be compelled to sacrifice. If there were no reversal of the decision of Trajan, and no hunt after the Christians were decreed, there were at any rate plenty of "concussions." The Christians were driven to build their splendid tombs underground, as in the case of Januarius (Bullettini, 1865, p. 97). The emperor's justice replied to the apologies of Melito and of Apollinaris (Eus. H. E. iv. 27. v. 5) by a law which condemned the accuser of Christians to death whether his charge were substantiated or not (Tert. Apol. 5). This was subsequent to the deliverance of the army by an unexpected fall of rain in A.D. 174. The rescript of the emperor ascribing this to the prayers of a Christian legion is an undoubted forgery, and is not that to which Tertullian alludes (l. c., cf. ad Scap. 4). It is however possible that Marcus may have commended the piety of the Legio Fulminata, and that Apollinaris may have pointed out that in that legion the Christians were numerous.

But though convinced that the Christians were not atheists, and stern in repressing the attacks made upon them by private sycophants, Marcus was not ubiquitous and was not unprejudiced. Christian martyrs appeared to him to die in a spirit of irrational emulation, τραγῆδως κατὰ ψυχὴν παράταξιν (Med. xi. 3), and hence he was disposed to regard Christianity as a frightful fanaticism. His hatred of priestcraft made him decree that whoever scared men's minds with superstition should be banished to an island (Dig. XLVIII. xix. 30.). Meanwhile he was himself somewhat prieststridden by his philosophers: the senators were for the most part utterly opposed to the new religion, and not likely to be impartial judges, and popular uproar did not always present itself as the voice of a rabble, but sometimes, as at Vienne and Lyons in A.D. 177, as the act of a municipality. The governor, on that occasion, found Christian prisoners awaiting him accused by the whole town of Lyons, and himself proceeded to commit an advocate who appeared for them and avowed his Christianity, to torture the heathen domestics of the Christians and to extract supposed evidence of cannibal banquets and incestuous orgies, to permit the murder by the rabble before the tribunal of bishop Pothinus, who was supposed to be the Christ worshipped by the Christians, and finally to consult the emperor about those who were Roman citizens without permitting them to go and plead their own cause before him. Marcus wrote back that those who recanted should be released; those who persisted should be drummed off, i.e. cudgelled to death. A similar decree appears in the acts of Caecilia, which are referred by De Rossi to this date. It seems to have called forth the apology of Athenagoras. The Gallic governor assumed a certain liberty in interpreting it. He gave up to the beasts all who were not Roman citizens, and one who was. Other tortures were applied to them in the amphitheatre for the amusement of the people, e.g. a chair of red-hot iron, in which the prisoner was fastened. This is noteworthy as indicating the effect of persecution of the Christians in whetting an appetite for horrors, —Tertullian (ad Martyres, 5) tells of some who volunteered to run a course in a flaming shirt,—and also in undermining the old fabric of chartered liberties, and reducing the world under the tyranny of the emperor and his emissaries. The rescript of Marcus is important as definitely sanctioning the employment of torture to induce recantation. Those who persisted in confession were liable to torture, and it came to be used not only to elicit confessions of imaginary guilt, but to compel denial of the faith (Tert. Apol. 2). The fact is that those who proclaimed, I am a Christian and among us no evil is done, not only failed to supply evidence against the Christians, they bore irrefragable evidence in their favour (cf Eus. H. E. v. 1-4).

Christianity was left by Marcus in a most anomalous position. It was a capital crime either to be a Christian, or to accuse another of being so. Thus the accuser of the senator Apollonius, in the reign of Commodus, was put to death by having his legs broken, but Apollonius himself, after pleading his cause before the senate, was beheaded (Eus. H. E. v. 21). The proceedings of the governors varied. One suggested an answer that would enable him to acquit, another bound the culprits over to satisfy their townfolk, a third let them off with a little torture, a fourth beheaded them, a fifth burnt them alive (Tertull. ad Scap. 4). There were convicts in the mines in Sardinia on the ground of their faith, whose release was obtained of Commodus by his Christian concubine, Marcia. A list of them was furnished her by bishop Victor, and the name of Callistus was omitted, because he had been guilty of breach of the peace in disturbing the Jews in their synagogue (Philosophumena, ix. 12). There were believers in high station in the palace (Iren. c. Haer. iv. 30).

(e) The power of the senate, so hostile to Christianity, was overthrown along with the dynasty of Trajan (Gibbon, ch. v.). No Christians followed the standards of the usurpers Albinus, Niger, and Cassian (Tert. ad Scap. 2), but Severus, the military despot, who proved victorious, had many Christian favourites whom he sheltered, and his son was reared on Christian milk (ib. 4).

Yet Severus was compelled (A.D. 202) to forbid conversions to Christianity (Spartian, Severus, c. 17), and the persecution which ensued, the first that made martyrs in Africa (Tertullian, ad Scap. 3), was so fierce that the Christians thought the end of the world must be drawing nigh.

In another way, however, this emperor enabled the church to acquire a sort of legal recognition. Severus made the permission of funeral guilds to those of slender means, provided they met only once a month, universal through Rome, Italy, and the provinces (Dig. XLVII. xxiii. 1), and committed charges of illegal association to the jurisdiction of the city praefect (ib. I. xii. 1 or 14). The church saw her opportunity. The archdeacon Callistus (A.D. 198) was set over the new cemetery on the Appian Way. A sum of hush money, distributed in presents at the Saturnalia, prevented awkward questions about the religion of the new funeral society, though it was indeed no secret, and the clergy were booked, by the police, among the taverns, gambling houses, brothels, and thieveries. But the recognition in any way of the clergy by the state increased their power and responsibility, and made the independent ambiguous position of the martyrs apart from the clergy above the laity, disturbing discipline by indulgences, a thing less and less tenable. Meanwhile, as wardens of the cemeteries pursuing their other offices of charity under cover of attending to the tombs, the clergy, instead of little meetings from house to house, could organize grand celebrations in subterranean halls before the monuments of the heroes of the faith; and to conform their phraseology and ritual as much as possible to heathen models was an obvious precaution. The danger that lurked in such conformity remained wholly unsuspected (Philosophumena, ix. 12; Tertullian, de Fuga, 12, 13; Bullettini, 1866, pp. 8-11, 19-22).

(f) The extension of the Roman franchise by Caracalla to all the free subjects of the empire made the torture of Christians thenceforward the torture of free Romans. We do not read of direct sanction of Christianity or repeal of the laws against it, till the days of Alexander Severus. "Christianos esse passus est." He proposed to erect a temple, and gave the preference to the guild of the Christians over the guild of the cooks, when they disputed about a piece of land. His successor, Maximin (A.D. 235-237), aimed a persecution at the clergy only (Eus. H. E. vi. 28), which seems not to have been oecumenical only because his rule was not everywhere firmly established. It affected Egypt and Asia (Firmilian ap. Cypr. Ep. 75, c. 10), and above all Rome. Pontianus and Hippolytus were transported to Sardinia, and there died (Cat. Liberianus); Anteros, after six weeks' episcopate, was put to death, it is said, for his diligence in collecting and treasuring up the acts of the martyrs (Cat. Felicianus). Protocletus and Ambrose of Caesarea were exhorted to martyrdom by Origen. It is a question whether the martyrs mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 4, 5) ought not to be referred to this persecution rather than to that of Severus, for Isidore of Pelusium expressly mentions Maximin as the persecutor of Potamiaena (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca, c. 3). The one part to which the persecution seems not to have extended is Africa (Dodwell, Diss. Cypr. xi. 48-50).

This outbreak was followed by a period of imperial favour. The emperor Philip is said to have been himself a Christian.

Decius (A.D. 250) instituted the third oecumenical persecution, by what laws we know not, but he seems to have given the reins to a great popular onslaught, which at Alexandria had begun a year before without waiting for imperial encouragement, but which was let loose universally by Decius.

The persecution of Decius appears to have summed up in itself the characteristics of all previous persecutions: direct and universal like those of Nero and Domitian, it was conservative and disciplinary in aim like that of Trajan, it employed torture for the direct purpose of forcing recantation like those of Marcus and Severus, and it broke through a period of peace and was directed principally against the clergy like that of Maximin. The Acta Sincera belonging to it are those of Pionius, Achatius, Maximus, Petrus Lampsacenus, Lucianus. The story that Decius was so impressed by the answers of Achatius of Pisidia, which were reported to him, that he recalled the edict of persecution, is somewhat confirmed by the cessation of persecution before the close of his reign. Cyprian returned, and a new pope was elected in the early part of 251 (Lipsius, Chron. Rom. Bisch. p. 18).

Persecution was renewed under Gallus, occasioned by the plague (A.D. 252, 253).

In A.D. 254 commences a formal registration of the bishops in the state archives. Valerian seems to have hoped thus to keep control over the church without the necessity of making martyrs. In 257 he had the bishops interrogated and banished (Vita Cypriani, c. 11). Reports of the interrogatories were published (Cypr. Ep. 77; Dionys. Alex. ap. Eus. H. E. vii. 11), and seem to have earned the bishops the title of martyrs. At least Dionysius of Alexandria is commemorated as such, though he survived the persecution and died in peace. But in A.D. 258, Valerian wrote that all the clergy should be executed offhand, nobles and knights degraded and stript of their property, and only put to death if they still persisted, ladies should be banished, officers of the household led off in convict gangs to penal labour (Cypr. Ep. 82).

Gallienus (A.D. 260) stopt the persecution and gave legal sanction to the church body, and reinstated it in possession of its corporate property (Eus. H. E. vii. 13).

Aurelian had intended (Eus. H. E. vi. 30), or even decreed (Lact. de Mortibus, 6) a persecution, but the execution of the design was frustrated by his death (A.D. 275). The peace of the church endured till the opening of the 4th century.

Like his great master in statesmanship, Aurelian, Diocletian also appeared as a protector of the church so long as he was occupied with rebels or foreign foes. But in his 17th year (A.D. 300) before his final triumphs, when he was anxiously awaiting news from the East, he expelled all Christians from the army (Eus. Chron. H. E. viii. iv.; ° Lact. de Mort. 10). In A.D. 303 he was induced by Galerius reluctantly to re-enact the edicts of Valerian, with some exceptions and additions. His decree was placarded at Nicomedia on February 23. No blood was to be shed, but (a) the churches were to be razed, (b) the sacred books were to be burnt, (c) the Christians were to be disfranchised and outlawed, (d) liberti and addicti (οἱ ἐν οἰκετῆραις) persisting in Christianity were to be reduced to slavery (Eus. H. E. viii. 2; Lact. de Mort. 13). Two conflagrations in the palace caused the torture and execution of the Christian domestics, and a second decree incarcerating the entire clergy (Lact. de Mort. 14, 15; Eus. H. E. viii. vi. 9). The celebration of the Vicennalia at the close of the same year, which was the occasion of the release of all other prisoners, was signalled by the employment of torture to force the Christians to sacrifice (Eus. ib. 11). The results of these edicts are graphically portrayed in the Acts of Theodotus: "All the chiefs of the brethren were kept fast in prison; their houses were ransacked; the unbelievers plundered whatever came in their way; freeborn virgins were shamelessly violated; there was no place of safety even for those who fled; they could not long endure their hunger, so that many gave themselves up to be taken." Altars were placed in the law courts that none might plead a cause without first sacrificing (de Mortibus, 15). A whole Christian town with its inhabitants was burnt in Phrygia (Eus. H. E. viii. xi.). New tortures were invented. The victims were stretched on a rack (equuleus) or hung up with stones fastened to their feet, then beaten in that posture with cudgels, rods, or scourges; then torn with iron hooks (ungulae, pectines); then rubbed with salt and vinegar; then burnt bit by bit from the soles of their feet upwards with torches or hot-iron plates, water being meanwhile thrown in their faces to keep life in them (Eus. H. E. viii. vi.; cf. Lact. de Mort. 21), or dragged along the rough ground to restore consciousness (Eus. H. E. viii. x.). Those who were remanded to jail were put in the stocks with their feet far asunder, and high up so that they had to lie on their backs. All these things were done before the persecution had properly commenced.

Throughout the west, in Italy, Africa, Spain, and even in Gaul and Britain, except as far as Herculius was checked by his subordinate Constantius, possession of Christian books, attendance on Christian meetings, and concealment of Christian fugitives, were already reckoned capital crimes. Such interpretation was put on the bloodless decrees of Diocletian by his colleague (Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 48, 1152, 154 ff. 172 ff.). In the East it was still illegal to kill, but not to mutilate a Christian (Eus. Mart. Pal. ii. 1). To understand the horror of the persecution it must be borne in mind that it was similar to the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, a sudden subversion of legal security, a sudden disruption of peaceable society, nay, a sudden withdrawal of imperial favour.

In 304 the persecution raged most fiercely, for Herculius was still supreme in the west, and Diocletian was not in a condition to control Galerius in the east. At the beginning of the year a new edict extended the obligation of sacrifice to all the people of every town, and sanctioned the arrest of the consecrated virgins of the church and their consignment to the brothels (Eus. Mart. Pal. 3; Acta Irene, c. 5; cf. Acta Theodorae, c. 1). Even this did not satisfy the enemies of the church. In April a senatus-consultum (cf. Martene, Thes. iii. 1649) and a rescript of Herculius decreed the seizure of Christians "wherever found," and recognised that the penalty might be death (Mason, p. 212 ff.).

On the 1st of May, 305, Diocletian and Maximianus Herculius abdicated. Constantius, who had retained the confessors and dismissed the apostates among the officers of his own household (Eus. Vit. Const. i. xvi.), did not, of course, urge the persecution further in the west, but the church was not reinstated in her legal rights, and the western Caesar was a nominee of Galerius. In the east under Galerius and Maximin the persecution raged with redoubled fury, and a law was promulgated condemning the Christians to die by slow fire (De Mortibus, 21). The mode of punishment varied from province to province. In Cappadocia their legs were broken; in Mesopotamia they were subordinated by hanging their head downwards over a smoky fire; in Pontus they had their nails torn off, and other tortures too horrible to relate; at Alexandria their ears, noses, and hands were cut off; in the Thebais they were fastened to two boughs brought together by force and then let go, and so torn asunder. Meanwhile the pitying soldiery would force them to sacrifice, or drag them off by their feet and set them among the apostates, and stop their mouths if they tried to say anything (Eus. H. E. viii. iii. ix. xii.).

On the death of Constantius, July 25, 306, Constantine was proclaimed in Britain, and his first act was to repeal the prohibition of Christianity (Lact. de Mort. 24). In October, Maxentius, son of Hercules, usurped the purple in Rome. Severus, who was sent against him, was defeated and put to death. Hercules resumed the purple along with his son, and they allied themselves with Constantine. Toleration was doubtless a condition of alliance, and a new bishop of Rome was elected; but to grant the church her right of imposing penance on apostates must have been intolerable to Hercules. Brawls ensued, the old emperor was forced to flee, and the same fate of exile was imposed on two successive popes, Eusebius and Marcellus. In the 6th year the Christians had their feet maimed and their eyes put out instead of being put to death (Eus. Mart. Pal. viii.). In the autumn there was a new edict enjoining sacrifice on man, woman, and child (ib. ix.). In April, 311, the dying Galerius with Constantine and Licinius, put out an edict of toleration (Eus. H. E. viii. xvii.; Lact. de Mort. 34). This was suppressed by Maximin, who only wrote to his governors, bidding them desist from persecution (Eus. H. E. ix. i.). On the death of Galerius he made himself master of all Asia. He then induced the inhabitants of the towns to present petitions to him entreating him to continue the work (Eus. H. E. ix. ii. iv.; Lact. de Mort. 36), and decreeing for their own part expulsion of the Christians. Christian Armenia flew to arms (Eus. H. E. ix. viii. 2). Plague and famine gave the Christians new opportunity for charity (ib.).

In Rome the property of the church was restored, in accordance with the edict of Galerius, by Maxentius to Melchiodis in July, 311 (Aug. ad Dom. post coll. i. xiii.; t. ix. p. 662; cf. Cat. Liberianus). There are legends of martyrdoms at Rome in presence of Diocletian about the close of the reign of Maxentius, e.g. the four crowned saints and Sebastian, and we know that Maxentius and Maximin were secret allies, and Diocletian was accused of favouring them (Victor. Epist. xxxix. 8). Whether Maxentius had turned persecutor or not, the victory of Constantine was none the less a triumph for the Christians. Before the close of 312 he met Licinius at Milan and put forth the famous edict of toleration (Eus. H. E. ix. ix. 9, x. v.; Lact. de Mort. 45, 48; Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, p. 333). This was at once communicated to Maximin and stopt his designs of persecution, though (as before) he substituted a rescript of his own (Eus. H. E. ix. ix. 11). But before the close of the winter he declared war, vowing, if victorious, to exterminate the Christians. The army of Licinius called on God most high and holy. Maximin fled (Lact. 46, 47), and decreed toleration and died (Eus. H. E. ix. x. 6 ff.).

The universal toleration promised by the edict of Milan was, however, impossible. The church as a corporate body possessed property, and the question necessarily arose who were the true members of the corporation. In this question the state could not but interfere, and claim a right of regulating the conditions of membership in the interests of public morality.

III. Roman Procedure.—There was a regular form for accusers to give in. "L. Titius professus est se Maeviam lege Julia de adulteriis ream deferre, quod dicit eam cum C. Seio in civitate illa domo illius mense illo coss illis adulterium commisisse" (Digest, ii. 3). The proconsul decided whether to commit the culprits to prison or to a soldier, or to admit them to bail, or to leave them at large (ib. iii. 1). Those who had confessed their guilt were put in chains till sentence was passed (ib. iii. 5). The police courts often sent up prisoners with a brief of the evidence against them: the higher courts were forbidden to condemn without fresh hearing (ib. iii. 6). Jailors were often bribed to leave the prisoners unchained, or to afford them means of committing suicide (ib. iii. 7), but jailors who let their prisoners escape through culpable negligence were liable to be punished with death (ib. iii. 12). To kill, scourge, or torture a Roman citizen, or to detain him from proceeding to Rome to plead his cause there, was to be guilty of assault on the public peace (ib. vi. 8, 9). Nobody might be condemned in his absence without a hearing (ib. xvii. 1). A prisoner might not be stripped of his possessions till he were condemned (ib. xx. 2). There was great liberty of appeal, even for slaves, who might appeal on their own behalf, if their master or a commissioner of his did not appeal for them (ib. XLIX. i. 15). On behalf of freemen anyone might appeal who was shocked at the cruelty of the sentence (ib. 6). The appeal was drawn up in writing, stating who appealed, and against whom, and from what sentence (ib. 1), but in court a man might simply say, I appeal (ib. 2). The proceedings in court were taken down by official shorthand writers, and carefully preserved (Amm. Marc. xxii. 3; Cod. Theod. II. xxiv. 3, Lydus de Magister. ii. 20).

IV. Treatment of sufferers by their brethren.—Christians in prison and in danger of death, (martyres designati, Tert. ad Martyres) were naturally objects of great solicitude. The most graphic picture of the treatment that an imprisoned Christian, so called "martyr," in the 2nd century would receive from his brethren, is given by Lucian in his Life of Peregrinus, c. 12. After relating how that rogue turned Christian in Palestine, he proceeds: "Then at last he was arrested on this charge and put into prison: Proteus was caught. Not he! that very circumstance gained him no small stock of credit to stand him in good stead during the next stage of his life in his favourite game of making a sensation. In short, when he was put in prison the Christians took it to heart, and left no stone unturned to have him out again. Then, when that proved impossible, all other kind offices were done him, not half-heartedly, but in business-like fashion and in good earnest, and right from early morning you might see at the gaol-door old women waiting about, certain widows, and little children that were orphans. But their official personages even slept inside the gaol along with him, bribing the gaolers. Then dinners of various viands were carried in, and their sacred treatises were read, and the worthy Peregrinus (for he still went by that name) was called by these people a new Socrates. Nay, there are certain cities even in the province of Asia, from which some of the Christians came, deputed by their community, to help the man and support him in court and comfort him. They display incredible alacrity, when anything of this kind happens of public concern. And as an instance in point, much wealth accrued to Peregrinus from them then, by reason of his incarceration, and he made no small revenue out of it. . . He was released by the man who was then governor of Syria. . . He went forth a second time on his wanderings, with the Christians for a bank to draw upon for travelling expenses. As their soldier and servant he revelled in all abundance. And for some time he battered so: then he committed some transgression against their law also, was seen, I fancy, eating of their forbidden meats, and they came to him no more."

This hostile account is fully confirmed by Christian evidence. The jailors came to count on gains when they had Christian prisoners (Acta Pionii, c. 12); and when the officials forbade the access of visitors for fear of attempts at a rescue by magical arts (Acta Perpetuae, c. 16), the prisoners seem sometimes to have been in danger of starving (Acta Montani, c. 9). Directions were given by Cyprian that the confessor Celerinus, though but a reader, should have the salary of a presbyter (Cypr. Ep. 39). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 23) forbid confessors to arrogate to themselves episcopal functions; and the 25th canon of Illiberis, which enjoins that if any bring letters of commendation as confessors, these shall be taken away and simple letters of communion given them, because all under the vaunt of that name everywhere make game of the simple (concutiunt simplices, the word used for violent threats, from the military). Compare also Apollonius (Eus. H. E. v. 19), who speaks of Montanist martyrs exacting coin from orphans and widows. And though Callistus had obtained recognition as a martyr, contrary to the wishes of Victor, that bishop thought it necessary to pension him (Philosophumena, ix. 12).

V. Prerogatives of Martyrs before Death.—The honours which martyrs received from their brethren in this life were far more than the material emoluments. "Martyrs," in the old sense, signed as martyrs to the decrees of councils (Eus. v. xix.). The bloodshedding of martyrdom was a sacrament, a baptism that replaced or renewed the baptism of water (Tert. de Bapt. c. 16); one of the seven ways of obtaining remission (Orig. in Lev. Hom. ii. 2, t. ii. p. 190); the wanderer's last refuge (Tert. Scorp. 6), in which not only soils were washed off, but stains bleached white (ib. 12), in which angels were the baptizers (Cypr. ad Fortun. pref. 4). Baptism was a time for prayer (Tert. de Bapt. 20, Perpetua 2), and so was martyrdom. It did not suffice for a martyr to have purged his own sins (Tert. de Pudic. 22): they began to be in such dignity that they might ask what they would (Perpetua, 3, 7): "martyrs gave grace to those that were not martyrs," and received the penitent apostates into communion (Eus. H. E. v. i. 40, ii. 7, 8): they had a right to be heard in claiming absolution for their brethren, as they did actually atone for their brethren's faults; they wearied out by their patience the fury of the adversaries and broke down the power of evil (Orig. t. iv. p. 133; Eus. H. E. vii. xli. 16); moreover, their peace was so divine, that to be at peace with them could not but be to be at peace with God (cf. Cypr. Ep. xxiii.). Hence martyrs excelled confessors by their power of receiving back the lapsed (Cypr. Epp. 20 [17], 10 [8]). Soon as a martyr was thrown into jail, seekers of grace gathered round (Tert. de Pudic. 22). "What martyr," asks Cyprian, "is greater than God or more merciful than the divine bounty, that he should fancy that we are to be kept by his own aid?" Cypr. de Lap. s.v. c. 20. [LIBELLI.]

VI. Modes of Death.—The sixth title of the xlviiiith book of the Digest treats of punishments. These were very various. Burning alive was supposed the most frightful death, and was reserved for deserters or slaves who murdered their masters. Crucifixion came next, the lot of brigands. Those condemned to be thrown to beasts lost their franchise and freedom forthwith, and might be kept to be tortured for further evidence before their sentence took effect (ib. 29). But praefects were forbidden to throw criminals to the beasts just to please a popular outcry (ib. 31). Criminals might of course die under torture, but were not to be put to death by torture, unless the above ways be so reckoned. Roman citizens were simply beheaded with the sword. Men might be condemned, not to be thrown to the beasts, but to fight with them. Then there was slavery in the mines with heavier or lighter chains; the lime-works and sulphur works were considered the worst, and the mines furnished occupation to women as well as to the miners. Then there was transportation to an island, which involved loss of citizenship, though not of freedom (ib. xxii. 6, 15). Then there were various modes of flogging, a cudgelling was thought more honourable than a scourging; there was labour in public works, banishment to an island, perpetual or temporary banishment. In almost every case the punishment varied according to the station of the offender. This is exemplified in the chief instance that we have of a persecution of the Jews. The crimes of some would-be Jewish missionaries in A.D. 19 brought the whole community into trouble. Four thousand of the humbler sort were shipped off to Sardinia to be employed against the brigands—"if they died, small loss"—the rest were to recant by a given day or leave Italy (Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Jos. Ant. Jud. xviii. 5).

VII. Treatment of the Bodies of the Dead.—The bodies of criminals, and even the ashes of such as had been burnt alive, except sometimes in cases of treason, were given up for burial to any who might ask for them (Digest, XLVII. xxiv.). At first such leave was only granted to private individuals; for funeral guilds were not yet allowed, and most of the early cemeteries bear the name of some wealthy owner. But the graves were recognised as possessing a religious sanctity. "Religiosum locum," says Marcianus, "unusquisque sua voluntate facit, dum mortuum infert in locum suum" (Digest, i. viii. 6; cf. Gaius, Instit. ii. 6). In 303, at the beginning of the persecution, Diocletian found it necessary to have the bodies of the martyrs dug up and thrown into the sea (Eus. H. E. viii. 6). Thenceforth he refused them burial. Instances of the measures taken to rob the Christians of the relics will be found in the acts of Claudius and Asterius, of Victor of Marseilles, Theodotus of Ancyra, Vincent of Valencia, Irenaeus of Sirmium, &c. &c. They were generally thrown into the sea in sacks. At Caesarea, on one occasion, they lay guarded, and the dogs threw them all about the city (Eus. Mart. Pal. 9). The more grievous the wrong done to the holy bodies, the greater the eagerness to requite them with due honour. There is a legend of a Roman lady sending her paramour to the east, where persecution was still raging, to bring her some relics (Ado, June 5). Antony strongly protested against the Egyptian practice of keeping the mummies of the martyrs in private houses, whereas "even the body of the Lord was buried out of sight" (Athanas. Vita Antonii, ii. p. 502). The same practice is forbidden in one of the Arabic constitutions which claim to be of the council of Nice (Labbe, Conc. ii. 350).

VIII. Sepulture of Martyrs.—The subject of Christian sepulture in general is treated under BURIAL, CATACOMBS, OBSEQUIES.

Of differences in the manner of sepulture of martyrs, which should enable future investigators to distinguish them after they had been forgotten, we have very little evidence. The title was sometimes inscribed on the tomb, either at the time of the interment or not long after (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 60, 61). In the lives of the popes, by Anastasius, Eutychian is said to have decreed that martyrs should not be buried without a purple dalmatic. Their blood was collected and buried with them (Prudentius, Peristeph. xi. 141-144), but the separate vessels supposed to contain blood are now recognised as receptacles for the wine of the agapae, or else forgeries.

Leibnitz tested a red sediment on a fragment of ancient Christian glass with sal-ammoniac, and finding the solvent successful, concluded that the sediment must be blood (Boldetti, p. 187). Palm branches, once supposed to distinguish martyrs, are common in the Christian epitaphs of the 4th century (ib. p. 271). These were the signs by which the Romanists used to pretend to distinguish the bodies of martyrs. Mabillon, under the pseudonym of Eusebius Romanus, entered a powerful protest (De Cultu Sanctorum Ignotorum, Paris, 1698). Compare Martigny (Dict. des Antiquités Chrétiennes, SANG DES MARTYRS).

It was very usual to inter the relics of the martyrs under the altar. [ALTAR, CONSECRATION.] There seems to be an allusion to this custom in Rev. vi. 9. The monuments were at first above ground. The monument of James the Just was to be seen in the days of Hege-sippus (Eus. H. E. ii. xxiii.), and the trophies of Peter and Paul were shewn at the Vatican and on the Ostian way (Gaius ap. Eus. H. E. ii. xxv.). So long, of course, as the cemeteries were in Christian possession, the tombs of the martyrs would not be forgotten. It was only the confiscation of the cemeteries by Diocletian that caused uncertainties.

There was of course a peculiar sacredness attaching to the bodies of the martyrs. They bore visible stamps of celestial joy triumphing over earthly malice. When tortured into a mass of sores, the application of fresh cautery some days after healed them. They came forth from their dungeons with shining faces, and seemed to emit a heavenly fragrance (Eus. H. E. v. i. 19, 30). The martyrs themselves sometimes discouraged the desire for relics (Ign. ad Rom. 4; Pontius, Vit. Cypr. 16); but sometimes gave them (Acta Perpetuae, 21). The relics were regarded as more precious than gold (Mart. Polyc. 18), and the taunts of the Jews that the Christians would leave Jesus and worship Polycarp (ib. 17) but increased their devotion. The heathen attempted to make the resurrection of the martyrs impossible (Eus. H. E. v. i. 54-58) by forbidding the interment. Martyrs often suffered away from their own churches, e.g. Ignatius, and the possession of the bodies of martyrs gave lustre to the churches and seemed a guarantee of the purity of their doctrine (Polycr. ap. Eus. H. E. v. xxiv. 2-4). Hence translations were necessary. These could not be effected except by stealth or by imperial permission. It was probably by imperial permission that pope Fabian (Cat. Liberianus) translated the bodies of Pontianus and Hippolytus from Sardinia to Rome. [RELICS.]

A statue of Hippolytus was set up outside his church.

A graffito praying for the peace of Pontianus was found in the papal crypt, and is referred by De Rossi to the times of Fabian. It was cut across when the crypt was altered by Damasus (Rom. Sott. ii. 80, cf. 381-396).

IX. Cultus.—Cultus, with rites of private direction, of the spirits of the departed, was not a new religion, though it was continually swelling the roll of divinities. But the graves were under the general supervision of the pontifical college, and might not be repaired without their permission (Digest, xi. vii. viii.; Bullettini, p. 89).

A pagan's will directing the construction of a memorial chamber [CELLA MEMORIAE] with an exedra or summer-house, marble and bronze statues of himself seated, a lectica and stone benches with drapery, cushions, and vestments, and an altar to contain his bones, an orchard to be attached, and the property to be inalienable from the tomb, two freedmen to be wardens on yearly pay, and all the freedmen to club together to keep up a yearly feast at the place, and to elect club masters yearly who should sacrifice monthly through the summer at the tomb, is given by De Rossi in the Bullettini, 1863, p. 95. A monument has also been discovered, probably of a Jew, in which sepulture is granted to the freedmen themselves and their descendants, provided they "belong to my religion" (ib. 1862, p. 80). The celebration of the eucharist and of agapae at the tombs was only illegal, because the dead had died as traitors.

Heathen^a cultus of the departed in general

was based upon the notion that their souls were hovering about their bodies, and stood in need of the good offices of the living to their bodies. Christian belief is that the departed need the salvation of survivors, that they without us should not be made perfect (Heb. xi. 40). Undutiful neglect of their corpses was thus injurious to the dead, as it was perilous to the living (Cypr. Ep. 8). Their souls were not supposed to hover about their bodies, but their memory was the strongest incentive to that devotion on the part of survivors which they really needed. Hence their tombs from the first (cf. Heb. xiii. Rev. vi. Martyria Ignatii et Polycarpi) were places for the celebration of the Eucharist.

When the competition between heathen and Christian worship had once begun, the heathenish notions of honouring the dead by wakes and with waxlights began to gain currency among the Christians. In the canons of Illiberis, in or just after the time of the persecution of Diocletian, it is ordained that "waxlights should not be burnt by day in the cemetery," and the reason given for this prohibition is as superstitious as the practice prohibited, "for the spirits of the saints are not to be disquieted" (Can. Elib. 34; Routh, Rel. Sacrae, iv. 265). [LIGHTS.]

At the same council (can. 35) women were forbidden to keep vigil in the cemeteries, because under the pretext of prayer they commit sin. [VIGILS.]

When Constantine restored the property of the church, the re-erection of memorial edifices and celebration of festival anniversaries was commenced under prosperous auspices. If every city had a patron deity, almost every city had a native guardian saint. In the west, Prudentius enumerates the martyrs in whom diverse cities gloried. Carthage had Cyprian; Cordova, Aciscius and Zoellus and another trio; Tarragona, Fructuosus and his deacons; Girona, Felix; Calahorra, Chelidonius; Barcelona, Cucufas; Narbonne, Paul; Arles, Genesius; Conplutum, Justus and Pastor; Merida, Eulalia; Tangier, Cassian; Fez, the Massylitans; Valencia, Vincent; Saragossa boasted Encratis and a group of eighteen (Prud. Peristeph. iv). Rome seemed to be crowded with martyrs: they were buried there in heaps, and the number only, not the names, inscribed upon the tomb: in one sepulchre lay sixty (ib. xi).

So throughout the 4th century, the rival cults contended for that which is the first necessary of a ritual system of hero-worship, the honour of being the national religion. Paganism had the prestige of antiquity; martyr-worship was recommended by imperial favour, by its innate superiority, and by the independent vital force of the church of Christ.

The deities of the heathen were by this time generally recognised among the heathen themselves as merely deified men, and it was easy to demonstrate from the heathen myths that they were bad men. The vices of the gods and heroes were the commonplace of ancient philosophers, and Christian preachers. A race of true heroes had sprung up. To bow before the horrible leavings of butchery was mortifying to human pride, and the 20th canon of the council of Gangra, A.D. 324, was passed against those who disdained the worship at the shrines of the martyrs. But if ridiculous and disgusting in outward form, and moving the disgust of aristocratic scholars like Eunapius (Vita Aedemi, 78, 81), the new worship could yet justify itself by appeal to Plato and to Hesiod (Eus. Præp. Evang. xiii. 22), as the old hero-worship in a better spirit.

Private appropriation of the martyrs being forbidden, the privilege of worshipping in the public cemeteries became the more precious. The great question between the various parties of Christians in the 4th century was which of them had the right of community of creed and communion in worship with the ancient champions of the common faith. Each great city had its own cemeteries; for those of Alexandria and Jerusalem see De Rossi, Bullettini, 1865, pp. 57 ff. and 84. From this heritage of ancient memories the Catholic body was, during great part of the 4th century, unjustly excluded, and so they were grasped with the more tenacity when they were regained. Meanwhile the prohibitions of heathen worship by Constantius (Cod. Theod. xvi. x. A.D. 341-356), and the galvanic resuscitation of it by Julian (Amm. Marcell. xxv. 4), and the renewed abandonment of the temples at his death (Soc. iii. 24) and interdiction of bloody sacrifice by Valens and Valentinian (Liban. Orat. de Templis, ii. 163) sent multitudes into the church with fresh appetites for ritual and devotional exercises.

The most striking instance of the support gained by the cause of Christian verity and independence from its ominous alliance with the popular fetishism, and from the supposed testimony of devils whom Christ would have gagged at once, is that afforded by the "invention" of the bodies of Protasius and Gervasius at Milan, in A.D. 386, by Ambrose. From the place where they were found, the church of SS. Nabor and Felix, De Rossi argues very probably that they were really martyrs, for it was an ancient Christian cemetery (Bullettini, 1864, p. 29). But they had been quite forgotten, and a dream led Ambrose to the excavations which disclosed two almost gigantic skeletons with a prodigious quantity of fresh, liquid blood. As the bishop, who was steadily resisting the claim of the Arian empress for a single church in which to worship, bore the relics through the city to his new basilica, demoniacs were seized with convulsions, and the demons owned the power of the martyrs and the error of Arianism, and left their victims. The relics cured a well-known citizen who had been many years blind. Undeniable facts will not convince sceptics, and the Arians derided the miracles, but the Catholics regarded them as a gracious interposition of Providence on their behalf (Ambros. Ep. xxii.; Augustine, Conf. ix. 7; De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8).

The year after the occurrence of these miracles the Arian empress was a fugitive and a suppliant at the court of the first Catholic Christian emperor, the great Theodosius, who finally suppressed Paganism, and who acknowledged by his submission to penance the power of the church to grant or withhold to the sovereign of the world the bread of his life, but who prepared himself for the contest with the last champion of Paganism, the usurper Eugenius (Ambr. Ep. 57) by going round all the places of prayer with the priests and the people, lying prostrate in sackcloth before the tombs of martyrs and apostles, and begging help from the intercession of the saints (Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. xi. 33).

X. Intercession of Martyrs.—While martyrdoms were frequent they were regarded as a kind of perpetual embassy from the church on earth to her Lord. They were requested to bear their friends in mind when they entered into the presence of Christ (Eus. Mart. Pal. 7). Fructuosus, A.D. 258, answered such a request by saying, I must needs bear in mind the whole church spread from east to west (Acta Fructuosi, c. 5). Origen says, Of the martyrs John writes that their souls assist at the altar: he who assists at the altar performs the function of a priest: it is the office of a priest to plead for the sins of the people; I fear lest since we have no more martyrs it be with us as with the Jews who have no temple. Our sins remain in us (Orig. in Num. x. 2, t. ii. p. 302). The belief derived from the words of Christ (Luke xxiii. 47, Rev. ii. 7), that the souls of the martyrs and theirs alone passed up into the presence of the Lord in Paradise, was confirmed by the dreams of the martyrs themselves (Acta Perpetuae, 4, 11, 12; Tertull. de Anima, c. 55). Moreover the crown which Paul mentioned as laid up for him against the last day (1 Tim. iv. 8) was supposed to be already given them (Mart. Polycarp. 19; Eus. H. E. v. 2, § 37; Acta Fructuosi ad fin.), and they were regarded as the future assessors of Christ in judgment (Cypr. Epp. vi. 2, xv. 3, xxxi. 3, de Lapsis, 17).

To these general beliefs Origen (l. c.) added a peculiar doctrine of his own, which he supported by Paul's phrase "to be spent" (2 Cor. xii. 15; 2 Tim. iv. 6), that Christ's sons joined with him in taking the sins of the saints. In his Exhortation to Martyrdom, c. 50, he suggests that perhaps some will be bought by the precious blood of the martyrs. In the same writing (c. 38) he suggested that after death the father would love his children more skilfully, and pray for them more continuously (t. i. p. 299). So he averred that the souls of martyrs not only interceded with the Lord, but themselves administered forgiveness to those who prayed (ib. c. 30, p. 293). He had been taught that those who had gone before contended in prayer for those who were following after, and licked up their adversaries as an ox licks up the grass (in Jesu Nave, xvi. 5). He gives as a mystery not to be written down the doctrine that the souls of good and bad men become good and evil angels (in Rom. ii. 4, t. iv. p. 479), and he seems to speak of martyrdom as necessary for attaining eternal life, though good works might lead to glory, honour, and peace (ib. c. 7, p. 483).

These beliefs naturally found expression in the forms of Christian worship. Thus as regards the martyrs, in the prayer for the whole church, it was not said "we beseech thee for them," but "we offer on their behalf"—an important difference (Const. Ap. viii. 12), and in the bidding prayer the faithful were not bidden to pray for them, but remember them (ib. c. 13). Prayers for them there were in the sense of pious wishes, but not in the sense of earnest entreaties, such as were made for others of the dead (Perpetua, c. 7). The Nestorians indeed whose liturgies seem in other respects to give the prayer in a more ancient form, requested that the sins of the martyrs might be forgiven them. "O Lord our God, receive from us by Thy grace this sacrifice of thanksgiving, the reasonable fruit of our lips, that the memory of the just men of old, the holy prophets, blessed Apostles, martyrs, &c., and all sons of Holy Church may be before Thee, that of Thy grace thou wouldst give them pardon of all sins that they have done in this world in a mortal body and in a mutable soul, as there is no man who sinneth not" (Renaudot, Lit. orient. coll. t. ii. p. 620). Epiphanius appeals to such prayers as a proof of the wide distance that the church acknowledged between the holiest saint and the Lord (Epiph. c. Haer. 75, § 7). But Augustine says we do not pray for martyrs, for they have fulfilled the love than which no man hath greater. We ask them to pray for us (Aug. in Joann. tract. lxxxiv. t. iii. coll. 847). And again, it is a wrong to pray for a martyr (Aug. Serm. 159, v. 867).

Invocation of the martyrs was fostered by Christian orators, whose theology was influenced by the teaching of Origen, but whose rhetorical training had been received in schools of pagan panegyric. Their sermons vividly depict, and enable us to enumerate, the superstitions which they encouraged.

Basil, in his Oration on Barlaam, speaks of the martyrs as fishers of men after their death, drawing myriads as in a drag-net to their tombs, p. 139. On Mamas, he cuts short the praise of the martyr to proceed to the lessons he meant to enforce, but not to disappoint the expectations of his audience, who had come to hear an encomium, he says, "Remember the martyr (1) all who have enjoyed a sight of him in dreams, (2) all who have lighted on this place and have had him for a helper in your prayers, (3) all whom he has helped at work, when invoked by name, (4) all whom he has brought home from way-faring, (5) all whom he has raised up from sickness, all to whom he has restored children already dead, all whose life he has prolonged. Bring all the facts together; work him up an encomium by common contribution. Distribute to each other, let each one impart his knowledge to the ignorant," p. 185. So Nazianzen in his sermon On Cyprian, in which by the way he goes wofully astray respecting that father's personal identity, bids them supply the tale of his good offices for themselves, as their own offering in his honour, (6) his knowledge of the future, (7) his overthrow of demons—"Cyprian's dust, with faith, can do all things, so they know who have tried it" (Greg. Naz. i. 449).

Gregory Nyssen, Basil's brother, preaching in honour of Theodore, after describing the church, the carved wood, the polished stone, the painted walls, the mosaic pavement, the cherished and treasured sweepings, bids them beseech the saint as a satellite (δορυφόρον) of God, as one that accepts their gifts just when He chooses. "He has gone away the fair and blissful road to God, leaving us the monument of his contest as a teaching-hall, gathering congregations, instructing a church, driving away demons, bringing down graceful angels, seeking for us from God the things profitable for us, having made this place a medicine-hall for various ailment; a haven for those tost with afflictions a storehouse of abundance for the poor, a beacon of refuge for wayfarers, a ceaseless festival of such as keep holy days. The throng never ceases, coming and going like ants. He it is who in these late years has stilled the tempest raised by the savage Scythians, opposing to their inroad no common weapons, but the cross of Christ, which is almighty." The saint is invoked and asked to have his heavenly duties of song. "We dread calamities and look for dangers; the grievous Scythians threaten war and are not far off: fight thou for us as a soldier; as a martyr employ in aid of thy fellow-servants, thy own freedom of speech. Thou hast passed away from this life, but still knowest the passions and wants of men. Pray for peace. To thee we ascribe the benefit of our preservation hitherto, and to thee we pray for future safety. Or if need be of more numerous entreaty, gather the choir of thy brother martyrs; remind Peter; wake Paul." (Greg. Nyss. iii. 578 ff.) Ephraim Syrus entreats the mother of the forty martyrs to intercede for him with them (Eph. Syr. II. 355, 391).

Basil, in his sermon on these forty martyrs, cries, "You often labour to find one to pray for you, here are forty. Where two or three are met in the Lord's name, God is there, but where there are forty, who can doubt His presence? These are they who guard our country like a line of forts. They do not shut themselves up in one place, but they are sojourners already in many spots, and adorn many homes, and the strange thing is, that they are not divided asunder on their visits to their entertainers, but are mingled up one with another, and make choral progress unitedly. Divide them into a hundred, and they do not exceed their proper number; bring them together in one and they are forty still, like fire" (Basil, ii. 155).

So in the next century Theodoret. "Their noble souls roam round the heavens dancing with the unembodied choirs. But as for their bodies, it is not a single tomb apiece that covers them, but cities and villages share them, and call them saviours of souls and healers of bodies, and honour them as patrons and guardians. The least little relic has the same power as the undivided martyr, and all this does not persuade you to hymn their God, but you laugh and mock."

Basil, the Gregories, and Ephraim, did much else besides lauding the martyrs. But in the west the title of Prudentius to fame lies mainly in the "passionate splendours" of the verse in which he hymns them, and the solitary devotion of the poet is more contagious than the fervour of the orators. "I shall be purged by the radiance of thy propitious face, if thou fill my heart: nothing is unchaste, that thou, pious Agnes, deigned to visit and to touch with thy footstep of blessing (Peristeph. xiv. 130-153). Be present now and receive the beseeching voices of thy suppliants, thou efficacious orator for our guilt before the Father's throne. By that prison we pray thee, the increase of thy honour; by the chains, the flames, the prongs, by the stocks in the gaol; by the litter of broken sherds, whence thy glory sprang and grew; by that iron bed, which we men of after days kiss trembling, thy bed of fire; have pity on our prayers, that Christ may be appeased and bend a prosperous ear and not impute to us all our offences. If duly we venerate with voice and heart thy solemn day, if we lie low as a pavement beneath the joy of thine approaching footsteps, glide in hither awhile, bringing down with thee the favour of Christ, that our burdened senses may feel the relief of thine indulgence" (ib. v. 545-568). So when they tried to approach Christ through the martyrs instead of seeking the martyrs in Christ, the martyrs began to usurp Christ's place.

The existence of a notion that it was a wrong to a martyr to leave him uncelebrated, as though he had looked for honour from posterity rather than from the Lord, is abundantly evidenced not only in the poems of Prudentius, but in the labours of the factious and pompous prelate Damasus (A.D. 366-384), who was a mainstay of the true faith, a stickler for the supremacy of the Roman see, and a great champion of virginity, but who is recommended to posterity mainly by his devotion to the shrines of the martyrs. He endeavoured to clothe the naked ugliness of the new rag-and-bone worship, not only with the clamour of rhetoric and poetry, but with the adornments of decorative art. [CATACOMBS.]

It remained for the leaders of the church to correct or justify the heathenised character of Christian worship. In one respect, in the west at least, they set about correcting it. The Christians were accused by the heathens and Manichees of turning the ancient sacrificial feasts into agapae. In the east these were forbidden in the churches by the 28th canon of the council of Laodicea, and so were celebrated at the outdoor shrines (Chrys. Hom. xlvii.). So Chrysostom urges his hearers. "If you want recreation, go to the parks, to the river side, and the lakes; consider the flower-beds; listen to the song of the cicadas; haunt the shrines of the martyrs, where there is health for the body and good for the soul, and no damage nor repentance after the pleasure" (in Matth. Hom. 37, t. vii. 477). So Theodoret boasted that instead of the Pandia and Dionysia there were public banquets in honour of Peter and Paul, and Thomas and Sergius, and Marcellus and Leontius, and Pantelemon, and Antoninus and Maurice, and the other martyrs, and instead of the old foul deeds and words they were sober feasts without drunkenness and revel and laughter, but divine hymns and sacred discourses and tearful prayer (Theod. Græc. affect. Cur. viii. ad fin.). But in the west Ambrose forbade these agapae at Milan (Aug. Conf. vi. 2), Augustine moved Aurelius to abolish them at Carthage (Aug. ad Aurel. Ep. 22), then himself abrogated them at Hippo (ad Alyp. Ep. 29, A.D. 395), and finally procured their prohibition by the 3rd council of Carthage, in A.D. 397 (can. 30). In Africa the feast was called, not agape, but laetitia. There were dances all night in honour of Cyprian (Aug. Serm. 311, t. v. col. 1415). Some brought food to the altars of the martyrs to be blessed and sanctified, and then took it to eat elsewhere or to give away (Aug. de Civ. Dei, viii. 27, t. vii. 255). At these feasts wine was sold in the churches. Paulinus of Nola was unable to get the custom done away, and tried to improve it by the introduction of sacred pictures (Paulin. Nat. Felicis, ix.)

Augustine rarely says anything to increase the popular devotion to the martyrs. In one sermon he exclaims, "In what Christian's mouth does not the name of the martyrs make a daily habitation. Would that it dwelt so in our hearts that we might imitate their passions, and not persecute them with our drinking cups" (in Ep. Joann. i. 2, t. iii. 1979). Again he says, "The martyrs hate your drinking bouts, but if they are worshipped they hate that much more. Who says, I offer to thee, Peter. Christ chose rather to be, than to claim, a sacrifice" (Serm. 273, t. v. 1250). Again he complains that the martyrs are more honoured than the Apostles (Serm. 298, t. v. 1365). But he observes that to rejoice at the virtues of our betters is no small part of imitation (Serm. 280, ib. 1283), and once he suggests, "If we are not quite worthy to receive let us ask through His friends" (Serm. 332, ib. 1462).

In the 8th chapter of 22nd book de Civitate Dei Augustine enumerates the ascertained miracles of the martyrs, and in the 9th chapter he points out the difference between these and the admitted miracles of the pagan heroes. The demons worked wonders in pride to prove themselves gods; the martyrs, or God for them, for the growth of faith in the one God. Their memorials are not temples. They are commemorated, not invoked. There is no priest of the martyr. The sacrifice is the body of Christ, which the martyrs are.

Against Faustus the Manichee, who urges that the theoretical monotheism and practical polytheism of the Christians were alike borrowed from paganism, so that they were not a new creed but a mere set of schismatics—"desciscentes a gentibus monarchiae opinionem primum vobiscum divulgastis, ut omnia credatis ex Deo, sacrificia vero eorum vertistis in agapes, idola in martyros, quos votis similibus colitis; defunctorum umbras vino placatis et dapibus"—Augustine answers that the martyrs are celebrated to excite our imitation that we may be associated with their merits and helped by their prayers, and that by the admonition of the places themselves a greater affection may arise to warm our love both to those whom we can imitate and to Him by whose help we are able. So we worship the martyrs with that worship of love and resort to this society with which holy men of God are worshipped in this life, but the more devoutly as the more securely. But with the worship of latria we worship only one God. But, he says, what we teach is one thing, what we have to put up with is another (Aug. c. Faust. xx. 4, 21, t. viii. 370, 384).

Theodoret says boldly that the Lord has raised the martyrs to the place of the heathen gods (Theod. Graec. aff. Cur. viii. ad fin.).

XI. Burial near the Martyrs.—Ambrose himself laid his bones beside Protasius and Gervasius (Ambr. Opp. ii. 1110). Damasus would fain have been buried in the crypt of Xystus, but that he feared to vex the ashes of the pious. "Our ancestors," says Maximus of Turin, "have provided that we should associate our bodies with the bones of the saints. While Christ shines on them, the gloom of our darkness is dispelled" (Max. Taur. Hom. lxxxi.). But this was a privilege that many desired and few obtained, as we read in an inscription, A.D. 301, given by De Rossi (Inscriptiones Christianae, i. 142). Augustine's work (De Cura Mortuorum) was written in answer to a question put to him by Paulinus, bishop of Nola, whether burial in such proximity to the saints were of benefit to the deceased. He answers that some are so good and others so bad that whatever is done for them after death is superfluous or useless, but many whose merits are only middling may be benefited by the actions of survivors; that sepulture in itself does no good to the soul, but that care for it is laudable, and the grave reminds people to pray for the deceased. The martyrs themselves did not care how they were buried. Men have visions of the dead, as they have visions of the living, but the souls of the dead are not concerned with what is done here, yet the dead may know what is passing on earth, for the martyrs do help their suppliants. The martyrs are perpetually praying, and God hears their prayers, and gives the suppliants who seek their intercession what He himself perceives that they want. The sacrifices of the altar, of prayers, and of alms are the only way of benefiting the departed (Aug. vi. 591 ff.). The epitaph of Sabinus the archdeacon, who was content to lie under the threshold of the church of St. Lawrence, is given by De Rossi (Bullettini, 1869, p. 33). See also Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, t. i. pp. 396, 471, t. ii. p. 219.

XII. Vindication of martyrs.—The many false claims to martyrdom made a kind of canonization necessary. This was called vindication.

Before Diocletian's persecution one Lucilla at Carthage was said to taste (i.e. kiss) the mouth of some martyr, if martyr it were, before the spiritual meat and drink, and when rebuked by Caecilian, then deacon, for preferring the mouth of a dead man, and if a martyr, not however as yet vindicated, to the cup of salvation, she went off in anger (Optatus, i. 16).

The clergy were the wardens of the cemeteries, and kept the register of martyrdoms as they occurred, and we have also seen the rules laid down for the qualifications of martyrdom. Doubts seem only to have arisen in Africa where there were numerous false claims of the Donatists, and in Gaul which had been so free from persecution, and so unsettled by barbarian invasions, that it had many unauthorised shrines. The 2nd canon of the Council of Carthage in the times of pope Julius decrees, "Martyrum dignitatem nemo profanus infamet, neque ad passiva corpora, quae sepulturae tantum propter misericordiam ecclesiasticam commendari mandatum est, redigat, ut aut insania praecipitatos aut alia peccati ratione disjunctos martyrum nomine appellet. At si quis ad injuriam martyrum claritati eorum adjungat infamiam, placet eos si laici sint ad poenitentiam redigi, si autem sint clerici post commonitionem et post cognitionem honore privari" (Labbe, Conc. ii. 714). And the 14th canon of the 5th council of Carthage, in the time of Augustine, decreed that no monument of the martyrs should be accepted except where a body or relics or the origin of a martyr's habitation was faithfully handed down by tradition (ibid. 1217). In Gaul, St. Martin was troubled at the reverence paid to a tomb of which no certain account could be given, and he had a vision of the occupant as a black criminal. So he dissuaded the people from continuing their devotion to it (Sulpicius, Vita Martini, 11). The Council of Aix in A.D. 787 decreed that the altars which are set up everywhere through the fields and ways as monuments of martyrs, in which no body or relics of martyrs are proved to be buried, be removed by the bishops of the places if possible. "If popular tumults do not suffer this, yet let the people be admonished not to frequent those places." Then the African canon is repeated, scenes of passions being allowed as well as birthplaces or homes, and they proceed to condemn trust in dreams. "The altars which are set up by inane revelations are altogether to be reprobated" (Labbe, Conc. vii. 979). Arian martyrs, such as George, acquired such celebrity in the East that it was impossible to exclude them from Rome, but their acts were forbidden to be read by a council under Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1263). [E. B. E.]

MARTYRARIUS, or Custos Ecclesiae, a keeper of a MARTYRIUM, or church of a martyr. The 13th canon of the second council of Orleans mentions them as a well-known class: "Abbatēs, martyriarii, reclusi, vel presbyteri apostolia dare non praesument." These relics were often preserved in little shrines or chapels (sacella), divided from the main building, a practice familiar to classic times, and of which there are notices in Cicero and other heathen writers; and in the larger churches, at all events at Rome, a separate guardian or martyrarius was permanently attached to each of these, who came to be called capellanus, i.e. chaplain, and was usually a priest. The Liber Pontificalis states of Pope Silvester, "Hic constituit ut qui desideraret in ecclesiā militare aut proficere, ut esset prius ostiarius, deinde lector et postea exorcista per tempora quae episcopus constituerit, deinde acolythus annis quinque, subdiaconus annis quinque, custos martyrum annis quinque," etc. The authority of this work, however, is not high for the early popes. Similarly, Zozimus, bishop of Syracuse, is said to have been in his earlier life "custos pretiosi loculi S. Virginis Luciae," apparently a shrine, and afterwards "ostiarius et templi custos." [S. J. E.]

MARTYRDOM, REPRESENTATIONS OF. The earliest representations of martyrdom with which the writer is acquainted occur in the Menologium of the Vatican library, which D'Agincourt places in the 9th or 10th century. See L'Art dans les Monuments, pl. xxxi. xxxii. xxxiii. The entire absence of any such pictures or carvings from the catacombs, or earliest Christian works of the days of persecution, has often been the subject of comment. Daniel between the lions unharmed, and the three children scatheless in the furnace, are the only tokens of the persecutions of the first two centuries.

The introduction of martyrdoms of saints not mentioned in Holy Scriptures probably synchronises with that of the Last Judgment, with its hell, in the 11th century. For the subject of the Holy Innocents, see INNOCENTS, p. 841. The writer knows of no representation of the latter earlier than the Chartres evangeliary, said by Rohault de Fleury (Évangile, i. 282, and plate) to be of the 9th century, but probably still later. Nor can he call to mind any representation,

MARTYRIA, martyr; commemorated at Tomi June 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MARTYRIUM (μαρτύριον). Originally the spot where a martyr endured martyrdom, and where his remains were buried. When chapels and churches came to be built over these consecrated places, they assumed the same name, and were known as "martyries." A martyr is defined by Isidore as "locus martyrium, graeca derivatione, eo quod in memoriam martyris sit constructum, vel quod sepulchra sanctorum ibi sint" (Isid. Etymol. lib. xv. c. 9). The term gradually gained a more extended application, "postea omnis Ecclesia titulo cuiusvis sancti vocata est martyrion" (Suicer, sub voce),—partly justified by the fact that no church could be consecrated without containing the relics of a martyr. Thus we find the terms μαρτύριον or ἐκκλησία used without any distinction, and often applied to the same building. Thus the church built by Constantine on Calvary is called by Athanasius: τὸ σατήριον μαρτύριον (Apol. ii. tom. i. p. 801). and by Sozomen τὸ μέγα μαρτύριον (H. E. ii. 26). and Jerome says "cujus industria Hierosolyma martyrion exstructum est" (Hieron. Chron. 7; Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 40; Theophanes, ann. 32 Const.). The same name is given to the church of St. Thomas at Edessa (Socr. H. E. iv. 18), and to those of St. John and of the Apostles at Constantinople (Pallad. pp. 63, 159), and to the basilica of St. Peter at Rome (Athanas. Epist. ad Solitar. tom. i. p. 834), and to the church at Constantinople where the relics of the 40 martyrs were discovered (Soz. H. E. ix. 2). The church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon, which was the place of meeting of the oecumenical council, called ἐκκλησία in the exordium of Acta i. and ii., is styled μαρτύριον in Acta iii. (Labbe, iv. 371). The Council of the Oak was also held in a "martyrion" where the body of Dioscorus of Hermopolis, one of "the Tall Brethren," was subsequently interred (Socr. H. E. vi. 17), and it was in "the martyrion" of Basiliscus, in the vicinity of Comana, that Chrysostom died (Pallad. 99). Though they are often regarded as synonymous, that μαρτύριον was not identical with ἐκκλησία appears from the complaint of the Eastern bishops at the council of Ephesus to the emperors that Cyril and the Western prelates had closed against them "both churches and martyrises," τὰς ἁγίας ἐκκλησίας καὶ τὰ ἅγια μαρτύρια (Theodoret, Epist. 152, 153). The Theodosian code expressly sanctions the erection and adornment of martyr-chapels, "quod martyrion vocandum sit," over the graves of saints (Cod. Theod. de Sepulchris violatis, tit. xvii. lex vii. vol. iii. p. 152). [E. V.]

MARTYRIUS (1) Martyr; commemorated May 29 (Usuard. Mart.), at Rome (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr with Marcianus, notaries; commemorated Oct. 25 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 272). [C. H.]

MARTYROLOGY (Martyrologium, μαρτυρολόγιον). This word denotes a list of martyrs, especially one arranged according to the succession of their anniversaries. In the East such a list was more commonly called a menology.

[MENOLOGY.] A martyrography meant a tale of martyrdom (v. Ducauge, in voce).

In the earliest adducible example of the celebration of the anniversary of a martyr's death, the commemoration of Polycarp, who died Feb. 23, A.D. 155 (Mart. Polyc. c. 21; cf. Zahn, in loco), we may note a few points bearing on the history of martyrologies. (1) the celebration was local at the martyrium (ib. c. 18); (2) yet the anniversary was made known to a neighbouring church and all churches (ib. Salut.); (3) only the most notable of the martyrs was commemorated by name, and the others who suffered about the same time were joined with him and merely numbered; (4) the martyr was burnt on a public showday, which happened to coincide with a high sabbath of the Jews, the 7th Saturday before Easter: so the birthday of Geta (March 7) became to the Christians the birthday of Perpetua, and continually heathen festivals must have been hallowed by Christian martyrdoms, as butchering martyrs was a holiday sport; (5) on a subsequent coincidence of the same Jewish and heathen anniversaries in A.D. 250 the martyr Pionius was arrested; in like manner it must often have happened that a martyr's anniversary was honoured by another martyrdom. This was the case, for example, with Cornelius and Cyprian, Sept. 14 (cf. De Rossi, i. 275); with Fabian and Sebastian (Kal. Philocali, Jan. 20); with Fructuosus and Agnes, Jan. 21 (Aug. Serm. 273; Op. Migne, v. 1250). We note this, because a statement in the article on CALENDAR is liable to some misconception.

Martyrologies appear to have been originally indices to the martyr acts preserved in the archives of each church, arranged for convenience by the calendar, according to the anniversaries on which such acts would be read in public. Tertullian speaks as though the Christians had their own calendar (Habes tuos census, tuos fastos: nihil tibi cum gaudio saeculi, De Coronâ, c. 13). In Cyprian's time it was the practice "to celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs," who had suffered before the Decian persecution, "with anniversary commemoration" (Cypr. Ep. 39 or 34). Of Anteros, who was pope for a month and ten days (Nov. 24, A.D. 235, to Jan. 3, A.D. 236) in the persecution of Maximin, we are told that "he diligently sought out the acts of the martyrs from the notaries and laid them up in the church, for which thing he was made a martyr by the prefect (Pupienus) Maximus" (v. De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 181). The anniversaries on which the acts would be read included not only those of the death, but those of the solemn entombment of the martyrs, as in the case of Pontianus and Hippolytus, buried on Aug. 13 by Pope Fabian (ib. 78). Fabian is said, in the lives of the popes, to have appointed seven subdeacons and seven notaries to collect the acts of the martyrs in their entirety. Cyprian directs his presbyters and deacons to note the days on which the martyrs depart this life, and adds that Tertullus, a brother who ministered to and buried the martyrs, had written and did write to signify to him the days on which the brethren died in the prison (Cypr. Ep. 12 or 37).

Martyrologies are of various kinds—

I. Lists contained in popular almanacs of such anniversaries as were observed as important festivals.—Of this kind is the earliest extant martyrology, that contained in the Almanac for the city of Rome, transcribed by the calligrapher Furius Dionysius Philocalus, A.D. 354, sometimes called after Liberius, who was then pope, sometimes after Bucherius, who discovered and published it in his commentary on Victorinus (Aegidius Bucherius, de Doctrina Temporum, Antwerp, 1634, pp. 236–288). It has been recently edited by Mommsen (Ueber den Chronographen vom Jahre 354, Abhandlungen der königlich sächsischen Gesellschaft, b. ii. Leipzig, 1850). The calendar contained in this almanac is the earliest that can be called Christian, inasmuch as it contains the dominical, as well as the nundinal, letters and a cycle for determining Easter, but it marks only heathen festivals. Then follow (2) the birthdays of the Caesars; (3) the series of consuls to A.D. 354 from the Fasti Capitolini; (4) a table of the days on which Easter would fall from A.D. 312 to A.D. 412; (5) the praefects of the city from A.D. 254 to A.D. 354; (6) Depositio Episcoporum, the list of the funeral days of the popes for the same century; (7) Depositio Martyrum; (8) the chronological catalogue of the popes down to Liberius; (9) a chronicle down to A.D. 334 [CHRONICON HOROSII, Dict. Christ. Biog.]; (10) a brief Roman history to Licinius; (11) the regions of Rome.

The list of episcopal funerals begins at precisely the same epoch as the lists of city praefects, A.D. 254, and was arranged, not chronologically, but in order of the calendar, in A.D. 336, the subsequent entries being appended at the close, not inserted in their places according to the calendar. It is manifest that the collection of documents belongs really to the reign of Constantine and was merely continued up to date in A.D. 354; and also that when the almanac was put together the epoch at which both the lists commence was not at the distance of an exact century.

De Rossi (Rom. Sott. ii. iii.–x.) infers that the two lists are probably drawn from the same source, the archives not of the church but of the state. Compare Tert. de Fuga in Persec. c. 13; Eus. H. E. vii. 13 and 30; Acta apud Zenophilum, App. in Augustin. v. 794; Cypr. Ep. 55 (52); from which passages it appears that the civil power took cognisance of the succession of the clergy.

Marcellus is not included among the popes in this list of anniversaries, and Xystus is to be found not among the popes but among the martyrs. The Depositio Martyrum also includes Fabianus, Jan. 20; Pontianus, Aug. 13; Calistus, Oct. 14; all of them martyr popes between A.D. 200 and A.D. 250, and De Rossi believes the entry Corneli in Calisti, on Sept. 14, to have been accidentally omitted by the copyist. But it does not contain Telesphorus (Iren. ap. Eus. H. E. v. 6). We may probably conclude that all the popes mentioned in the Depositio Episcoporum died in peace, but we must not suppose that no earlier popes were martyred.

In both catalogues the cemetery is in each case specified. They are catalogues, not of deaths, but of entombments. In three instances in the second catalogue where consular years are added, the commemorations are of translations effected in those years (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 214–215). The same catalogue includes two feasts that are not entombments at all, the Nativity, Dec. 25, and the Chair of Peter, Feb. 22, and one feast of African martyrs, Perpetua and Felicitas, March 5, in which cases no cemetery is named, but in the case of the only other non-Roman martyr, Cyprian, the note is added, "Romæ celebratur in Calisti." The second catalogue does not seem to include any martyrs earlier than the 3rd century, and is certainly not a complete list of Roman martyrs from that time forward. It is only the Feriale, Heortologium, or list of chief feasts of the Roman church. To pretend with Dodwell that it gives all the Latin martyrs, not only of Italy but of other provinces, is extravagantly absurd.

These two catalogues, which together form the earliest martyrology, are reprinted from Bucherius (p. 267), by Ruinart (Acta Sincera, p. 692, Paris, 1689), and from Mommsen (p. 631) by De Smedt (Introductio Generalis, p. 512). The Calendar of Philocalus is printed by Migne (Patr. xiii. 621) side by side with another that affords an interesting comparison, rather for the elimination of the heathen than for the introduction of a Christian element, namely, the calendar of Polemeus Silvius (A.D. 448). This latter, though it contains seven of the chief Christian holidays (LAVRENTIVS), is in no sense a martyrology. A Roman calendar of much later date (Migne, cxxxviii. 1189) will afford further interesting comparison.

II. Lists of anniversaries honoured by the church with special services.—That there were such, and that they differed in each different locality, we know from Sozomen (H. E. v. 3), who tells us that Constantia and Gaza, though only a couple of miles apart and for civil purposes forming one city, had each its own feast days of its own martyrs and commemorations of its own bishops. We can hardly say that we have any such extant that date from before the 6th century. It is almost certain that the ecclesiastical martyrology of the Roman church in the time of Liberius was fuller than the lists preserved in the work of Philocalus. These lists, however, prove one important point. While the civil year began on Jan. 1, the ecclesiastical year at Rome began a week earlier, on Christmas Day.

The fragment of an Ostrogothic calendar, discovered by Mai, and referred by him to the close of the 4th century, contains only local saints (for bishop Dorotheus, Nov. 6, and the emperor Constantine, Nov. 3, were specially Gothic saints) and apostles, Philip, Nov. 15; Andrew, Nov. 30. [CALENDAR.]

Information regarding the anniversaries of the church is chiefly to be drawn from the sacramentaries or from the sermons of the fathers. Basil only preaches in honour of Cappadocian, Chrysostom at Antioch of Antiochene saints. But Augustine at Hippo celebrated not only local or even African martyrs, but the Spanish bishop Fructuosus and the Roman virgin Agnes (Jan. 21), the Spanish deacon Vincent (Jan. 22), Protasius and Gervasius of Milan (June 19), the Roman Lawrence (Aug. 10), the Maccabees (Aug. 1), Stephen (Dec. 26), the Nativity of the Baptist and his Decollation, perhaps the conversion of Paul (Opera, v. 1247 ff.).

The sacramentaries of Leo (A.D. 440–461) and Gelasius (A.D. 492–496) are genuine and authentic monuments of their respective epochs, which the Gregorian sacramentary is not. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 126.) The sacramentaries, however, are only significant in their additions to the calendar; their omissions only shew that the authors did not compose or find special prayers for the omitted feasts that seemed worth preserving. The sacramentary of Leo in the nine months extant, retains seven and omits eleven of the anniversaries of Philocalus, adds six anniversaries of Roman martyrs at Rome, one of a Roman away from Rome, one or two of non-Roman martyrs, and four of Scriptural personages (John Baptist, Andrew, John, and the Innocents). (For the sacramentaries Muratori, Liturgia Romana Vetus may be consulted.)*

The calendar of Polemeus illustrates the same tendency to greater universality that was beginning to affect martyrologies. While retaining only two Roman anniversaries from the twenty-two of Philocalus, he adds a new foreign martyr (Vincent) and four celebrations of Scriptural facts (Epiphany, Passion, with the mission of the Apostles (Mar. 25), Stephen, the Maccabees).

The Carthaginian calendar or martyrology given in Migne (Patrol. Lat. xiii. 1219) is probably later than A.D. 505.

III. General Martyrologies.

A. The Syriac Martyrology.—"The names of our lords the martyrs and victors, with their days on which they won crowns."

This is the title and description of an ancient Syrian martyrology discovered by Dr. W. Wright in the "well-known Nitrian MS. Add. 12,150," written A.D. 412, "extending from fol. 251 vers. to fol. 254 rect.," and published by him in the Journal of Sacred Literature, vol. viii., N.S.; London, 1866, pp. 45–56, with an English version, pp. 423–432.

It avowedly computes the months after the Greek, i.e. our present reckoning, but gives them Syriac names, [MONTH.] The latter Kânûn, Shebât, Adâr, Nisân, Izâr, Hazîrân, Tâmûz, Ab, Ilûl, the former Teshri, the latter Teshri, the former Kânûn. This last, which is equivalent to December, begins the year. The martyrology opens, not with the Nativity, but with the apostles Stephen, Dec. 26, and John and James, Dec. 27, at Jerusalem, and Paul and Peter at Rome, Dec. 28. Thenceforward, with only two exceptions (Perpetua, March 7, and Exitus (i.e. Xystus), bishop of Rome, Aug. 1), the martyrs belong to the eastern provinces of the empire. Thirty anniversaries are assigned to Nicomedia, twenty-one to Antioch, sixteen to Alexandria, six to Caesarea in Cappadocia, five to Ancyra, others to another Alexandria, to Amasea, Aphrodisia, Axiopolis, Bononia in Rhaetia, Byzantium, Caesarea in Palestine, Chalcedon, Corinth, Edessa, Eumeneia, Hadrianople, Helenopolis, Heraclea in Thrace, Hierapolis, Laodicea, Lystra, Melitene, Nicopolis, Nisibis, Pergamus, Perinthus, Salona, Sirmium, Thessalonica, Tomi; also to Bithynia Galatia and Isauria; while twenty-four are named without specification of place. With Peter of Alexandria, Nov. 24, "Here end the martyrs of the West." Then follow "The names of our lords the martyrs who were slain in the East:—" "Abâ,

* The Capitulare published by Fronte and by Martene (Thesaurus) was composed at the end of the 7th century, before 682, and retouched between A.D. 714 and 742. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. 128.)

the first, Dali, the second;" others, "of the number of the ancients;" others, "ancient martyrs;" next, "the bishops slain in the East;" by their sees, not their days; "then the priests," "the deacons," &c.

B. The Hieronymian Martyrology.

"The names of nearly all martyrs collected in one volume, with the passions marked for each day, without indicating how each one suffered, but only the name, place, and day of the passion, so that every day many of divers lands and provinces are known to have been crowned." This is the description given by Gregory the Great (Epist. viii. 39) of a volume that they possessed at Rome, and believed the church of Alexandria to possess likewise; "and daily," he adds, "in veneration of them we perform solemn rites of masses." This martyrology appears to have differed from the preceding in giving at least one martyr for each day, and being not only half but quite oecumenical. Two ancient extant martyrologies satisfy these conditions; the lesser Roman, and the Hieronymian; but the claim of the former to be that here intended is now universally disallowed.

The extant allusions to the Hieronymian martyrology are as follows. Walafrid Strabo, abbat of Reichenau (A.D. 842), tells us that the litanies of the saints are believed to have been taken into use after Jerome, following Eusebius, wrote a martyrology (de Rebus Eccl. c. 28; Patr. Lat. xiv. 962). Aengus the Culdee professes to have used in his FEILIRE "the great parts of Ambrose, the works of Hilary in full, all that was written by Jerome, the martyrology of Eusebius." Bede (Retract. in Act. Ap. c. i.; Patr. Lat. xcii. 997) speaks of a book of martyrology taking its title from Jerome, and prefaced in his name (Hieronymi nomine ac praefatione attitulator), though Jerome is said to have been only the translator, and Eusebius the real author. Cassiodorus, in the earlier half of the 6th century, says, "Vitas Patrum, confessiones fidelium, passiones martyrum legite constanter, quas inter alia in epistola S. Hieronymi ad Chromatium et Heliodorum destinata procul dubio reperitis qui per totum orbem terrarum fluere" (de Inst. Div. Lect. c. 32; Patr. Lat. lxx. 1147). The preface in Jerome's name, mentioned by Bede and cited by Walafrid, is in the form of a reply from Jerome to a request of Chromatius and Heliodorus. And the passage of Gregory cited above is in reply to a request from Eulogius of Alexandria for Eusebius's collection of martyr acts, which could not be found.

Bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus inform their holy lord, brother Jerome, that they were present at the council of Milan (A.D. 390) when Theodosius, the most Christian prince, praised Gregory, bishop of Cordova, for being wont every day as he opened the mass, at morning if not fasting, at evening if he were, to mention the names of very many martyrs of whom it was the natal day. The council agreed to send a letter to Jerome to ask him to make inquiry for the most famous feasts (or feriale) from the archives of Eusebius of Caesarea, and thence address to them a list of the feasts of the martyrs. Jerome replies that we read (legitur) that when Constantine came to Caesarea (probably in A.D. 335), and told Eusebius to ask any boon that would profit his church, the bishop answered that the church was enriched by her own resources, but that he personally could not rid himself of the desire that, whatever had been done anywhere in the Roman state regarding the saints of God, the judges and their successors throughout the Roman world might be directed to search through the public records with diligent scrutiny and discover what martyr had won the palm in each province or city, under what judge, on what day, and by what suffering, and to transmit the facts taken from the authentic archives to himself by royal order. Hence he rewrote his church history, and declared the passions of nearly all the martyrs of all the Roman provinces. "Since on single days," Jerome proceeds, "the names of more than 800 or 900 martyrs of divers provinces and cities are named, so that no day can be found with fewer than 500, except Jan. 1, I have briefly and succinctly concerned myself with those alone who are in chief honour among their own people." These numbers, of course, must be divided by ten, an easy change. "At the opening of the book we have written the feasts of all the apostles, that various days may not seem to divide those whom one dignity sublimates in heavenly glory."

Baronius (praef. ad martyrologium, cc. 5-7) brought sundry objections against the authenticity of these letters, which have been completely refuted by Fiorentini (Vetust. Mart. pp. 57-59). His conclusions are accepted, but the decision of Baronius has not been set aside, even by Fiorentini himself.

Two points may be regarded as quite certain: 1. Eusebius had not received this grant from Constantine when he wrote his church history as at present extant, still less when he made the collection of pieces concerning ancient martyrs, to which he there refers. An index to that collection would be a kind of martyrology, and it is possible that we have traces of such in the Syriac martyrology of Wright, where fourteen times western martyrs are said to be "of the number of the ancients," an addition that seems in no case to be applied to those who suffered in the persecution of Diocletian, just as it distinguishes the old martyrs of Persia from those who were put to death under Sapor. The same title is applied in the Hieronymian martyrology to Hippolytus of Antioch. The martyrs that we know to have been included in Eusebius's compilation are Polycarp, Pionius, Carpus, Pothinus and his fellows, Apollonius. The whole work seems to be included by Jerome along with the martyrs of Palestine as "some little works upon the martyrs" (Hieron. de Viris Illustribus; Eus. H. E. iv. 15; v. 4, 21).

2. When we have removed from the extant copies of the Hieronymian martyrology all the clear and valuable notices of facts long posterior to Jerome with which they are enriched, the residue is not such as can by any possibility be attributed either to him or to his master, at least in any form in which it can at present be found in any MS. or deduced from comparison of all. The restoration needed is not merely the reparation of a damaged text; it is rather the recovery and reintegration of a perished book or books. The work is agreed to be not so much a single martyrology as a cento of martyrologies patched up of many ancient calendars, fitted together well or ill. The same martyrs and groups of martyrs often recur two or three times the same days, often for four or five days running. Places become people; and people are turned into places. Yet, however the martyrology has been swollen by impertinent accretions and inane repetitions, the more copious the text is the better. When it has been subjected to a reverse process of constriction and ignorant elimination, the confusion becomes hopeless.

The Martyrology consists chiefly of names of places in the locative case and of persons in the genitive, ranged under the several days from Christmas to Christmas, though a few further details are introduced.

The unabridged MSS. are (A), a MS. made at Corbie under one Nevelone in the 12th century, and printed, with arbitrary transpositions and silent conjectural supplementations, by D'Achery in his Spicilegium (il. 1 folio; iv. 617, 4to ed.), and reprinted by Migne (Hieron. ix. 447). This MS. is now in the Paris library (Cod. Lat. 12, 410). (B) Nevelone's autograph copy, in the same library (Fond. Corbie 5), discovered by De Rossi. (C) A 9th-century MS. found at Lucca by Fiorentini, copied from one made at Fontenelle under Wando, and not interpolated since Wando's death in A.D. 757. (D) Codex Blumanus. Another copy of the same Fontenelle MS. made at Weisenburg in A.D. 770, and subsequently interpolated with insertions belonging to that town. (E) A MS. that belonged to the church of Sens, now in the Queen of Sweden's collection in the Vatican (Cod. 567). These five, though of very different date, are of nearly equal value. (F) Codex Antwerpensis, or Epternacensis, a MS. in Anglo-Saxon letters, of the 8th century, made by one of the monks of St. Willibrord, the apostle of Friesland, in Epternach monastery, found by Rosswyde at Treves, now in the Paris library (Cod. Lat. 10,837). A page of facsimile is given in the Acta SS. for April (t. ii. p. ix.).

Of the above (C) is edited with a collation of (A) and (F) day by day, of (E) in fragments, and of (D) entire at the close, by Fiorentini (Vetusius Ecclesiæ Occidentalis Martyrologium, Lucae, 1667).

The Epternach MS., though the earliest, is by common consent pronounced the least authentic. It represents a British form of the Martyrology, and seems to bear a close relation to the Martyrology of Donegal—partly published by Todd and Reeves (Dublin, 1856), but buried for the most part in St. Isidore's, Rome—in which the topographical notes are omitted.

(G) De Rossi has discovered in Berne library (Cod. 289) a 9th-century copy belonging to the church of Metz, which retains the topographical notices in larger characters, dividing the martyrs of each day into distinct local groups.

All these MSS. have in common sundry arbitrary interpolations and corrections relating to early saints, which De Rossi traces to the misunderstanding of a 7th-century list of papal interments. He considers therefore that the extant MSS. did not diverge from their common stock till it had been subject to interpolation in the 7th century.

They all contain a number of notices relating to Gaul. These are partly shared in common between them; partly peculiar to the several groups. Those which are common to them all do not extend beyond the end of the 6th century, and refer especially to Auxerre. Moreover they all open each month with the notice, "Litaniae incitendas," and the proclamation of litanies on the calends, whatever connexion it may have with Jerome, was certainly an ordinance of Aunarius, or Aunacharius, bishop of Auxerre, circ. A.D. 600 (Acta SS. t. vii. Sept. p. 109).

Another principle is applied by De Rossi to confirm the conclusion to which these facts point. The ordination of a bishop was ordinarily only commemorated in his lifetime. The only ordinations of bishops noted in these martyrologies, besides that of the great St. Martin, are those of Aunarius (July 31), and of his contemporary Nicetas of Lyons (Jan. 19). The death of Aunarius is not noted; in some copies he is styled Dominus.

Hence De Rossi concludes that, in the time of Aunarius, "out of two or more tattered copies" of an earlier work that passed under the name of Jerome, "a clerk of Auxerre, ignorant of topography and history, put together the chaotic medley" from which our present copies are derived. (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. pp. x-xxi, xxv, 33-48.) Instead of keeping the texts of the fragments before him distinct, as parallel reproductions of the same, he has transcribed nearly the whole of each and run them into one. He seems also to have tried to piece two fragments together like a child's puzzle, and sometimes to have pieced them wrong.

The text, however, so ill restored by the monk of Auxerre, who, it may be observed, is supposed contemporary with Gregory the Great, was itself of the nature of a cento, according to the judgment of modern critics. The same principle that enabled De Rossi to refer the bungling recension to the time of Aunarius induces him to assign certain of the documents used in the compilation to the popedoms of Boniface I. (A.D. 418-422) and Miltiades (A.D. 311-314). On the 29th of December the martyrology has "Bonifacii episcopi de ordinatione," and this is certainly the right anniversary of the ordination of Boniface I. but not of his death, which is left uncelebrated. The burial of Miltiades is properly noted on Jan. 10; but again, and this time without mention of a cemetery, on July 2, the day of his ordination. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 112-114.) These documents, he concludes, were far too rare and precious to have fallen into the hands of an obscure Gallican monk. The Martyrology also contains numerous accurate notes of the fresh festivals instituted in Rome in the 5th century, especially by pope Sixtus III., and there is evidence that the Auxerre compiler had before him two copies, both enriched with these insertions (ib. ii. 36).

We may observe that the popedom of Boniface coincides with the last days of Jerome, within a decade of Wright's Syrian MS., and within thirty years of the council of Milan, and again, that the popedom of Miltiades coincides with the restoration of the church under Constantine, and the first compilation of the calendar of Philocalus.

Now all the notices in the calendar of Philocalus are contained, and sometimes in an earlier form, in the Hieronymian Martyrology. The same is true of almost all the notices in Wright's Syrian Martyrology, except some commemorations of bishops of Antioch. The Hieronymian Martyrology contains moreover all, or almost all, the martyrs of Palestine, whose acts are recorded and dated by Eusebius, whereas only Pamphilus, and perhaps a few others, are inserted in the Syriac Martyrology. It contains also Antiochene festivals celebrated by Chrysostom that the Syriac omits. Of African martyrs it contains nearly all the names that are to be found in the extant Carthaginian Calendar, and a great multitude more. Often it supplies us with the proper names of martyrs whom that calendar groups together under some local designation.

Critics have agreed in considering the Hieronymian Martyrology as a cento compiled from many church calendars. The only great family of church calendars, according to De Buck, with which it has little or no connexion is the Constantinopolitan (Acta SS. Oct. xii. 185). Yet even here light may often be shed on its obscure notices by comparison of the Menology of Basil. The Syriac Martyrology is pronounced by the same scholar to be the key to the hitherto insoluble enigmas of the Hieronymian text (ib.). We might say that the lesser work was a sample of the greater. The consideration of this valuable document, which was undiscovered when De Rossi wrote, leads us to ask whether the traditional account of the origin of the Hieronymian Martyrology be not worthy of more attention than it has received of late.

There is abundant evidence of the existence of a tendency, at the close of the 4th century, towards closer intercommunion and greater uniformity between different churches. Formation of liturgies, translation of relics, performance of pilgrimages, all were leading up to the demand for a Martyrology that should be more than local. The influences were already at work that culminated in the dedication of the Pantheon. The two great families of Western liturgies beside the Roman, are said to owe their origin to Jerome's earlier contemporaries, Ambrose and Hilary: a third, the Mozarabic, owes something to Prudentius. The impulse towards the compilation of the Martyrology is said to have been Spanish. Jerome himself assisted Damasus in ordering the shrines of Rome; but while the shrines of the martyrs were most important there, the reading of their acts was more customary in the East. The materials that Aengus the Culdee professes to have used are similar to those assumed by the critics for the Hieronymian cento, with one exception: he had before him not only Ambrosian and Gallican liturgies, Damasian topographies, De Viris Illustribus, and the like, but the Martyrology of Eusebius.

The task of collecting and combining various church calendars from all parts of the world would be so arduous that it is difficult to understand how the tradition of the enterprise should have perished while the results remain. The tradition that is preserved is, as we have seen, quite different, and at least affords some explanation of the combination of Roman and Eastern features in the structure of the work. But however the compilation was effected, the epoch to which it should be assigned can hardly be later than the time of Jerome. The impulses towards unification received rude checks from the barbarian invasions, and were dispelled anew by the rise of the Nestorian controversy. If, however, we assign the Martyrology to the date towards which we are driven by historical considerations on either hand, it is difficult to discover any one more likely to have performed the work in the manner of which ample traces survive than the author to whom the tradition has assigned it, and for whom a claim has been put in, whether by a forger or by himself.

Whatever view may be ultimately adopted of the origin of the Hieronymian Martyrology, its connexion with ancient Christian life may be summarized as follows.

In its present form it is one of the two or three principal sources of all modern Western church calendars. There may have been, and probably was, some unintelligent commemoration, day by day, of the names marked in it at the celebration of the mass in certain Gallican, English, Irish, Flemish, and German monasteries, even in some Italian churches. But it is the corruption of a book that was similarly in liturgical use in Rome itself in the time of Gregory the Great. Corrupt as it is, it is one of the principal authorities to light us to the discovery of early festivals in various parts of the world. If a fresh and ancient martyrology be discovered, the first with which it should be compared is the Hieronymian, and the comparison is almost sure to be fruitful of interesting results. It contains many notices of ancient martyrdoms which would otherwise have been wholly lost to us. But, moreover, it is the extant representative of a work that resulted from an important movement in the church of the 4th century, and which forms the historic link between the heortologies of the ancient churches and the mediaeval monastic calendars.

It is much to be regretted that the compiler of the Martyrology thought only of honouring the martyrs and of profiting from their intercession, and did not attempt to edify the church by more copious extracts from their authentic and accessible acts.

C. The lesser Roman Martyrology was found at Ravenna by Ado, archbishop of Vienne, about A.D. 850, thought by him to be pretty old, reported to him to have been sent by a pope to an archbishop of Aquileia, transcribed by him and prefixed to his own Martyrology, as he tells us in the preface, omitted as superfluous by copyists, sought in vain by scholars, at last found at Cologne and edited by Rosweyde and claimed as the Martyrology mentioned by Gregory the Great, thrown into the shade by the discovery of the Hieronymian, supposed by Fiorentini a mere later epitome of Ado, maintained to be genuine but later than the Hieronymian by Sollier, proved genuine beyond doubt by De Rossi's discovery of another copy of Ado in the library of St. Gall (vol. 454) where this Martyrology follows the preface with the title, Incipit Martyrologium Romanum. This Martyrology is prefixed to Ado in Migne, t. cxxiii.

The whole tissue of this Martyrology, according to De Rossi, is that of a private historical essay, not of a public traditional calendar. The days assigned to the festivals in the old calendars are often exchanged for new dates, founded on histories that were in credit when the compilation was made, and most of the chief characters of Scripture have their set days, of which there is no trace in the ancient Fasti of any church whatsoever. The author has used Rufinus's version of Eusebius, and worked up the acts of the martyrs. The changes he has introduced in noting the festivals often coincide with the changes introduced into the pontifical book in the 8th century. The work seems to have been compiled in Rome, and notes some festivals there instituted at the end of the 7th and beginning of the 8th century. This does not prove it to have been publicly taken into use at the time. It is almost contemporary with Bede and with the last recension of Jerome. Its method of composition is similar to that claimed for Jerome, except that the Acts on which it is based are mostly religious fictions. See De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 125; ii. xxvii-xxxi, or De Smedt, Int. Generalis, pp. 134-137.

IV. Martyrologies that add some details of the martyrdoms.—The difference between the Hieronymian Martyrologies and the series headed by Bede may be thus expressed: the one is replete with fossil fragments of genuine antiquity, from which the skilled archaeologist can reconstruct and reclothe skeletons of ancient facts; the other present us with such miniature outlines of martyrs as were had in veneration by the church of the age of Charlemagne.

Bede, at the end of the 7th and beginning of the 8th century, was contemporary with the last recension of the Hieronymian Martyrology. He was acquainted probably with that form of it; but his work is chiefly drawn from the pontifical books and the Acts of the martyrs. It is the outcome of the same dissatisfaction with the chaos of the current books, as was felt by his anonymous contemporary who framed the Romanum parvum; but he struck more at the root of the evil. Instead of recasting the calendar to bring it into conformity with the supposed knowledge of the times, he has been content to confess ignorance. He was content to leave many days vacant rather than adorn them with a string of names without meaning. Describing his own work in the catalogue of his writings at the close of his Church History, he claims to have given all those martyrs of whom anything was known in the world in which he lived. Thus he heads the long series of martyrologies in which short histories were added to their names. People soon made up their minds that they knew something about some more. Bede's work was enlarged again and again. We only possess it in the enlarged edition.

These three Martyrologies, the Hieronymian, the Roman, Bede's, are the three original sources of almost all Western martyrologies and calendars. We must just distinguish the chief martyrologies of the 9th century, because it is only through Ado and Usuard that the lesser Roman work has become known.

Florus, subdeacon of Lyons, A.D. 830, first enlarged the work of Bede. The Bollandists, Henschen and Papebroch, published in the first volume of the Acta SS. for March a not very trustworthy, nor indeed feasible, attempt to purge the original Martyrology from the subsequent additions; but they remain indistinguishable, and we cannot even be sure that we have the work as it was left by Florus. This edition, Martyrologium Bedae in 8 antiquis MSS. acceptum cum Auctario Flori ex 3 codd. collatione distincto, is reprinted by Migne, Patr. xciv. 799.

Rabanus, archbishop of Mainz, further enlarged the Martyrology of Florus, and worked it up with the Hieronymian. His work is printed by Migne, Patr. cx. 1121.

Ado, archbishop of Vienne, was acquainted with Bede's work as enlarged by Florus, but not with Rabanus. His work was undertaken as an expansion of that of Florus, but was really modelled on the lesser Roman, and became rather a collection of brief lives of the saints than a martyrology. It answers more nearly to the menologies of the Greeks, except that it is not put forth authoritatively for ecclesiastical reading, but merely as a private manual. Yet the influence of his work through Usuard transformed ecclesiastical usage and recast the calendar.

Usuard, a monk of Paris, about A.D. 875, has faithfully epitomised Ado's work, which (according to Sollier) was known to him as 'The Commentary of Florus.' 'He does not seem to have been acquainted with the work of Rabanus. "Jerome," he says, "has studied brevity too much, Bede has left many days untouched." He endeavours to supply their deficiencies, and also to reconcile the discrepancies of various commemorations. He was the first really to popularise the works of Ado and the anonymous Roman, but his own book has assumed almost as many forms as those of Bede or Jerome, and has become the source of most existing Western calendars. The interpolations and variations are fully treated in the edition by Sollier, which forms the 6th volume for June of the Acta Sanctorum, and is reprinted in Migne, P. L. cxxiii.

Notker was a monk of St. Gall, who died in A.D. 912. He combined Ado and Rabanus. His work will be found in Migne, cxxxi. 1026.

Thus Bede was enlarged by Florus and Rabanus, from the first enlargement and the lesser Roman grew Ado's work, from the second and Ado's work grew Notker's, but Usuard's that grew out of Ado's alone became the most celebrated.

V. Metrical Martyrologies.—As the enlarged martyrologies that we have just been considering seem to be an imitation of the Greek menologies, so metrical martyrologies may have taken their rise from the Greek practice of reciting daily in the service iambic distichs, sometimes of much beauty, describing the triumph of each of the martyrs celebrated, followed, in the case of the chief of them alone, by an hexameter line fixing the day of the passion. A collection of such hexameter lines, which are always sad doggerel, would form a metrical martyrology. One such has been extracted from the Menacea by Godofredus Siberus (Ecclesiae Graecae Martyrologium Metricum, Leipzig, 1727), who has added the half rhythmic menology of Christopher of Mitylene.

The little poem ascribed to Bede (Patrol. Lat. xciv. 603) is hardly worth calling a martyrology, but seems to be genuine (De Smedt, p. 138; Binterim, v. i. 58). Wandalbert, a monk of the diocese of Treves, at the age of thirty-five, in or about A.D. 842, wrote a martyrology in hexameters, independent of Bede and the lesser Roman. It contains many things not to be found elsewhere, which he claims to have taken from authentic old books by the help of Florus of Lyons who possessed them, but critics are suspicious (Patrol. cxxi. 575).

The FEILIRE of Aengus the Culdee may be called a metrical martyrology. We have here only to add to the article on that head, that it exists in three vellum MSS., two in the Bodleian and one in the library of the Royal Irish Academy. There is a recent paper copy in the library of the university of Cambridge, and another of the 17th century made from an independent authority in the Burgundian library at Brussels. It differs from the Tamlaght or Tal-laght Martyrology of the same Aengus and Mac-bruain, published by the Rev. M. Kelly, D.D. (Dublin, 1857), which has been generally supposed the earlier work, in giving only a selection of Irish martyrs and including many valuable notices concerning those of various lands (Forbes, Scottish Calendars, pp. xiv-xvii).

Literature.—Our article is mainly drawn from De' Rossi (Roma Sotterranea, t. i. pp. 111-118, 122-128; t. ii. pp. iii-xxxii). The preface by Baronius to the Roman Martyrology, the dissertations and notes of Sollier (Usuardinum Martyrologium, apud Acta SS. Bolland. Jun. t. vi. in Migne, Patrol. cxxiii.), and of Fiorentini (Vetus-tius Occidentalis Ecclesiae Martyrologium, Lucae, 1667) are to be consulted. De Smedt (Introductio generalis ad Historiam ecclesiasticam critice tractandam, pp. 127-140, 193-197, Louvain, 1876) translates De' Rossi on the lesser Roman martyrology (p. 130 ff.), reprints Matagne on the actual Roman martyrology (p. 141 ff.), and the pontifical and martyrology of Philocalus in his appendix. He had intended to give a list of all extant calendars and martyrologies, but found the task too arduous. De Smedt states that four Jacobite calendars are edited by the Assemanis, Bibliothecae Vaticanae MSS. t. ii. codd. 37, 39, 68, and three orthodox Syrian calendars (ibid. pp. 18, 114, 151), one of which is taken from Miniscalco's Jerusalem Evangelistarum (Verona, 1861). Two more of the orthodox Syrian are given by Mai (Scriptores Veteres, t. ii. pt. ii. pp. 46, 169). Four Coptic calendars are published, two by Mai (ibid. pp. 14, 93), and two by Selden (de Synedriis). The second of Selden's is re-edited by Ludolf, and collated with a far more valuable Ethiopic calendar of about the 12th century (Commentarius ad Historiam Aethiopicam, pp. 389-436). No ancient and authentic Armenian calendars are known. De Buck has written a treatise, Des Calendriers Orientaux, in De Backer, Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus, t. iii. p. 383.

For Western Martyrologies we may refer to Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Kirche, Mainz, 1829, t. v. pt. i. pp. 42-73). A number of monastic martyrologies and calendars are given by Martene (Collectio Amplissima, t. vi.), and by Migne—namely, a Gallican calendar, Patrol. lxxii. 607; one by Protadius of Besançon, A.D. 615, lxxx. 411; an English calendar, xciv. 1147; a calendar of Modena, cvi. 821; of Mantua, cxxxvii. 1257; of Brescia, 1285; two of Val-lombrosa, 1279; of Lucca, 1291; one ascribed to Bede, 1293; of Fleury, 1185; of Stavelo, near Liège, 1194; of Werthen, near Cologne, 1203; of Auxerre, 1209.

The Gothic calendar will be found in Mai (Vet. Script. Coll. v. i. 66), a mural martyrology, CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

from the church of St. Silvester at Rome (ib. p. 56), another marble tablet with a complete calendar of the 9th century discovered at Naples (ib. p. 58), and the martyrology of Philocalus (ib. p. 54). The Naples marble has been discussed in three volumes 4to by Mazzochi and in twelve volumes 4to by Sabbatini. It is the most authentic example of an early Greek calendar.

The article on "Martyrologie" in the Dictionnaire des Persécutions in Migne's Theological Encyclopedia is merely a translation of Ruinart's answer to Dodwell's Dissertatio Cyprianica de Paucitate Martyrum. [E. B. B.]

MARY. [MARIA.]

MARY THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.

In the Eastern Orthodox Church there are three classes of Festivals, the Great Festivals, the Middle Festivals, the Little Festivals. Among the Great Festivals are reckoned:—1. The Hypapante, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th; 3. The Sleep of the Theotokos, Aug. 15th; 4. The Nativity of the Theotokos, Sept. 8th; 5. The Presentation of the Theotokos, Nov. 21st. Among the Middle Festivals is reckoned, in the Russian Church, the Protection of the Theotokos, Oct. 1st; and in the calendar of Constantinople there are the Depositing of the honourable Vestment of the Theotokos in Blachernae, July 2nd; the Depositing of the honourable Girdle of the Theotokos, Aug. 31; the Conception of Anne the Mother of the Theotokos, Dec. 9th; the Synaxis of the Theotokos and of Joseph her spouse, Dec. 26th. In the Russian calendar there are also fourteen commemorations of miraculous icons of the Theotokos.

In the Armenian calendar there occur:—1. The Purification, Feb. 14th; 2. The Assumption, on the Sunday following Aug. 15th; 3. The Invention of the Girdle, about Aug. 31st; 4. The Nativity, Sept. 8th; 5. The Presentation, Nov. 21st; 6. The Conception, Dec. 9th.

In the Ethiopic calendar there is a monthly festival of St. Mary, as there is of our Lord's nativity, of St. Michael, and of the three patriarchs; and the following specific festivals:—1. The Death of St. Mary, Jan. 16th; 2. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 3. The Conception of Christ, March 25th; 4. The Nativity, April 26th; 5. The Purification of Anna, July 14th; 6. The Burial of St. Mary, Aug. 8th; 7. The Assumption, Aug. 9th; 8. The Nativity, Sept. 7th; 9. The Presentation, Nov. 29th; 10. The Conception, Dec. 12th

In the Roman calendar there are some festivals of St. Mary which are observed universally throughout Roman Christendom, some that are observed only locally; but these local festivals have for their sanction the full authority of the Roman see, and the offices to be used on them are published in the Breviary. The festivals of universal obligation are:—1. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th; 3. The Festival of the Seven Sorrows, on the Friday preceding Good Friday; 4. The Visitation, July 2nd; 5. The Feast of St. Mary of Mount Carmel, July 16th; 6. The Feast of the Dedication of St. Mary at Snows, Aug. 5th; 7. The Assumption, Aug. 15th; 8. The Nativity, Sept. 8th; 9. The Feast of the Most Holy Name of Mary, Sept. 15th; 10. The Festival of the Seven Sorrows (a second time), the third Sunday in September; 11. The Festival of Blessed Mary de Mercede, Sept. 24th; 12. The Feast of the Most Holy Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the first Sunday in October; 13. The Presentation, Nov. 21st; 14. The Conception, Dec. 8th. Every Saturday in the year and the whole of the month of May are also dedicated to her honour. The local, but yet authorised, festivals relating to her are:—1. The Espousals of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Jan. 23rd; 2. The Feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Aid of Christians, May 24th; 3. The Most Pure Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the next Sunday but one after the Assumption, that is, about the end of August; 4. The Maternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the second Sunday in October; 5. The Purity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the third Sunday in October; 6. The Protection of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the fourth Sunday in October or a Sunday in November; 7. The Translation of the Holy House of Loretto, Dec. 10th; 8. The Expectation of the Blessed Virgin Mary's delivery of a child, Dec. 18th. The Feast of the Dedication of St. Mary at Martyrs, May 13th, has been allowed to drop from the calendar.

The Anglican calendar contains two classes of festivals. Among the red-letter or first-class festivals are reckoned:—1. The Purification, Feb. 2nd; 2. The Annunciation, March 25th. Among the black-letter or second-class festivals occur:—1. The Visitation, July 2nd; 2. The Nativity, Sept. 28th; 3. The Conception, Dec. 8th.

It will be seen from the above that the Festivals of the Purification, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Conception, are common to the existing calendars of all churches that have calendars; that the Greek and Latin churches agree in celebrating the Assumption and the Presentation; that the Byzantine and Armenian churches agree in observing the Festival of the Girdle; that the Byzantine church stands alone in observing the Festival of the Vestment; the Russian in observing the Festival of the Protection (a different commemoration from that of the Latin church which bears a similar name), and the feasts of some icons; the Ethiopic in observing the days of St. Mary's death and burial as distinct from the Assumption, besides a monthly-recurring festival in her honour; the Roman church in observing the Seven Sorrows (twice), St. Mary of Mount Carmel, St. Mary at Snows, the Most Holy Name, the Protection, Blessed Mary de Mercede, the Rosary, the Espousals, the Help of Christians, the Most Pure Heart, the Maternity, the Purity, the Holy House of Loretto, the Expected Delivery, besides all Saturdays and, of late, the whole of the month of May.

We notice these festivals in the chronological order in which they were instituted.

1. THE PURIFICATION (Ἑπαγνή, Ἑπαγνή, Occursus, Obvatio, Præsentatio, Festum SS. Simeonis et Annæ, Purificatio, Candelaria, Candelmas). As first instituted, this was not a Festival of St. Mary, but of our Lord; and so it has always remained in the Eastern church. Its original name, still retained in the East, was Ἑπαγνή, sometimes written Ἑπαγνή, rendered into Latin by "Occursus" or "Obvatio," meaning the "meeting" of our Lord with Simeon and Anna in the Temple (Luke ii. 27–38). In the West it came to be called the Feast of the Purification, and, except in the Ambrosian church, to be regarded as one of the Festivals of St. Mary, because this meeting took place on the occasion of the Purification of St. Mary.

Its institution.—It is not altogether certain whether it was instituted by Justin, emperor of Constantinople, in the year of our Lord 526, or by his son Justinian, in the year 541 or 542. Cedrenus, an historian of the 11th century, assigns its institution to Justin (Historiarum Compendium, p. 366, Paris, 1647); the other Byzantine historians, to Justinian (see Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. lib. xvii. c. 28; Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 188, Paris, 1655; Historia Miscellanea, lib. xvi. apud Muratorium, tom. i. p. 108, Milan, 1723). It happens that the latter historians have made use of expressions which need not force us to conclude that the festival had no existence before the time of Justinian, but only that it was made by him of oecumenical observance, or of obligation in Constantinople, or of obligation on the 2nd of February.* Accordingly, Dr. Neale (Holy Eastern Church, Introd. vol. ii. p. 771, Lond. 1850) supposes it was only transferred by Justinian to Feb. 2nd from Feb. 14th, the day on which it is observed by the Armenians. But it is probable that Nicephorus and Theophanes meant to state that it was Justinian who originally instituted the festival. Siebertus (Chronicon, in ann. 542, apud Bibl. Patr., De la Bigne, tom. vii. p. 1388, Paris, 1589), Calvisius (Opus Chronologicum, in ann. 541, Frankfurt, 1650), Baronius (Martyrologium, Feb. 2, Rome, 1586), Basnage (Annales, tom. iii. p. 752, Rotterdam, 1706), Fleury (Hist. Eccles. liv. xxiii. 7, Paris, 1732), and the great majority of authorities consider Justinian to be its author; and there is little doubt that they are right, though the idea of establishing it may have sprung up in the last year of the reign of his predecessor, and some steps may have been taken towards realising it, which were for the time abortive. The Centuriators of Magdeburg assign its institution to pope Vigilius, Justinian's contemporary (Cent. vi. col. 673, Basle, 1562). Baronius conjectures that "a way was opened towards its celebration in the West," and that possibly it was instituted there by pope Gelasius about thirty years before Justinian, on the abrogation of the Lupercalia; but his conjecture rests on no ground of evidence. The Oratio de Symeone et Anna, seu, In Festum Occursus et Purificationis B. Mariæ, attributed to Methodius, bishop of Tyre, A.D. 290, which, if genuine, would imply that the festival was of a very early date, was probably written by a Methodius of Constantinople in the 9th century. Similar orations attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, and to Amphilochius, A.D. 370, and to Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 370, are spurious. So are a Sermo in Occursum Domini, attributed to St. Athanasius, A.D. 325, and a Sermo de Purificatione B. Mariæ, attributed to St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, and many more sermons alleged to have been delivered on the day by different early writers. Baronius "does not hesitate to declare that no Greek or Latin father before Justinian has left a sermon on the day of the Occursus" (Martyr. Feb. 2).

* Nicephorus's words are: Τάτρε δὲ καὶ τοῦ Σωτήρος Ἑπαγνήν ἀπὸ πρῶτος τῆς γῆς ἐορτάζεσθαι (lib. xvi. c. 28). Those of Theophanes are: καὶ τῷ αὐτῷ χρόνῳ ἡ Ἑπαγνή τοῦ Κυρίου ἐλάβεν ἀρχὴν ἐπιτελεῖσθαι ἐν τῷ Βυζαντίῳ τῇ δευτέρᾳ τοῦ Φεβρουαρίου μηνός (Chronicon, p. 188). Cedrenus says of the last year of Justin's reign: ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ ἐντυπώθῃ ἐορτάζειν ἡμᾶς καὶ τὴν ἐορτὴν τῆς Ἑπαγνής, τῆς μέχρι τότε μὴ ἐορταζομένης (Hist. Compend. p. 366).

Its date in the calendar.—The 2nd day of February is necessarily the date of the festival, because that is the fortieth day after Jan. 25th, which, since the time of St. Chrysostom, that is, a century and a half before the date of Justinian, had become accepted as the day of the Nativity of Christ in the East as well as in the West. It would consequently have been the day on which St. Mary, having borne a man-child, would have made the offering appointed by the law (Lev. xii. 4) for her (or their) (Luke ii. 22) purification. The Armenian church observes the festival on Feb. 14th, because it counts Jan. 6th to be the day of the Nativity, as the whole of the East once counted it.

The occasion of its institution is supposed to be the occurrence of earthquakes, plague, and famine, mentioned by the Byzantine historians as having taken place in Asia Minor and Constantinople in the reigns of Justin and Justinian.

It has been suggested that the purpose of its founders was to supply the place of the Amburbalia, Lupercalia, the Feast of Ceres, and other Roman festivities which had been abolished, and the loss of which was felt by the populace (Durandus, Rationale Divinorum Officiorum, lib. vii. c. 7, Venice, 1577; Beletius, Explicatio Divin. Offic. c. 81, ad calcem Durandi, Venice, 1577; Baronius, Martyrol. Feb. 2; Benedictus Papa XIV., de Festis, apud Migne, Theol. Cours. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 144, Paris, 1842). It is, however, more probable that the primary object with which it was instituted was simply to commemorate an event in the life of our Lord which was believed to call for a special commemoration. After its establishment there was no unwillingness to regard it as a hallowed substitute for an unholy orgy, a Christian Purification Festival in place of a Pagan Lustration Feast, held as before in the early part of the month of February. (See Rabanus Maurus, de Institut. Clericorum, lib. ii. c. 33, apud Magn. Bibl. Patrum, tom. x. p. 602.)

with them in the hands (whence the names Candelaria, Candlemas) probably arose from "a desire to put Christians in remembrance of Christ, the spiritual light, of whom Symeon did prophesy, as is read in the church that day" (L'Estrange, Alliance of Divine Offices, c. v. Oxf. 1846); in other words, to illustrate the 32nd verse of Luke ii. "a light to lighten the Gentiles." But after a time the idea was readily welcomed that it had been introduced with the view of assimilating the Christian festival to the heathen feast; so readily, indeed, that pope Benedict XIV. regards any other as almost heretical. Baronius attributes the introduction of the procession to Sta. Maria Maggiore to Sergius I., who lived in the 7th century, but he believes that the use of the candles originated before that time, as they are mentioned by Eligius (Hom. ii., Op. apud Migne, Patrol. tom. lxxxvii. p. 597), who lived A.D. 665. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres at the beginning of the 11th century, explains the symbolism which by that time it was believed might be found in the virgin wax of which the candles were made (Sermo, apud Magn. Bibl. Patrum, tom. iii. p. 502). The fifth council of Milan, A.D. 1579, enlarges on the manifold use and benefits of the candles (Hard. Concil. tom. x. p. 971). The procession came to be regarded as representing the walk of St. Mary and Joseph to the Temple on the day of the Purification.

2. THE ANNUNCIATION (Εὐαγγελισμός, Annunciatio).

Its institution.—There is no historical account of the institution of this festival, as there is of the Purification. It is found existing in the 7th century, but the occasion of its establishment is not known. An attempt was made to claim a very high antiquity for it by appealing to three Addresses, delivered on the Festival, which were assigned by Vossius to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and may yet be found bound up with the latter's genuine writings in some editions of his works (Sermones III. in Annunc. S. M. Virginis apud Op. Greg. Thaum. p. 9, Paris, 1622). Their spuriousness is undoubted (see Bellarmine, de Script. Eccles. Op. tom. vii. p. 39, Col. Agrip. 1617; Tyler, Worship of the Virgin, Appendix A, Lond. 1851). The same is to be said of an Address attributed to Athanasius, called Sermo in Annunciationem Sanctæ Dominae Nostræ Deiparae, and printed with St. Athanasius' works (Op. tom. ii. p. 393, ed. Bened. Paris, 1698), which was not written till after the Monothelite controversy (see Baronius, apud Opp. S. Athanasii, p. 391; Cave, Historia Literaria, s. v. Athanasius). And the same must be said of many more sermons alleged to have been delivered on the occasion of the festival by fathers and early writers. The sermons attributed to Peter Chrysologus, A.D. 440 (apud Migne, Patrolog. tom. lii. p. 575, Paris, 1845), may possibly have been composed by archbishop Felix, one of his successors in the see of Ravenna, A.D. 708, or more probably by his namesake, Peter Damiani, in the 11th century (see Tillemont, Histoire Ecclésiastique, tom. xv. note vi. p. 866, Paris, 1711). Two homilies In Annunciationem Beatæ Mariæ, attributed to Anastasius of Sinai, A.D. 560, would appear to be the production of one Anastasius Abbas, who lived in the 8th century. The first trustworthy evidence of the existence of the festival is found in the first chapter of the Acts of the tenth council of Toledo, which was held A.D. 656. The council declares that, whereas the Feast of the Holy Virgin was kept at different times in different places in Spain, and could not be kept in Lent without transgressing traditional rule, it should be observed on the octave before Christmas day. The rule to which reference is here made is the 51st canon of the council of Laodicea, held in the 4th century, which forbids the observance of the Nativities of Martyrs (a phrase which at that time was equivalent to Holy days) in Lent.^b The second reference to the festival is found in the acts of the council in Trullo, held A.D. 692, which permitted the observance of this holy day in Lent, while it continued the Laodicean prohibition of all others.^c The date of the institution of the festival may therefore be fixed as being at the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century. The council of Metz makes no mention of it among the festivals ordered by it to be observed in the year of our Lord 813 (can. xxxvi.); nor does it appear in company with the Purification in the list of festivals given in the Capitularies of Charles the Great or Ludvig (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 158; ii. § 33).

The date in the calendar is March 25th, as being nine months before the nativity of Christ. St. Augustine speaks of March 25th as being the day on which it was believed that the conception of our Lord took place, inasmuch as Dec. 25th was regarded as the day of his birth (De Trin. lib. iv. c. v., Op. tom. viii. p. 894, ed. Migne). The Armenian church, which observes Jan. 6th as the Nativity as well as the Epiphany of Christ, has not the Festival of the Annunciation in its calendar.

Like the Feast of the Purification, this festival was instituted in honour of our Lord, and in commemoration of his conception; but it probably passed more readily and quickly than the sister festival from the list of the Dominican to that of the Marian Festivals, as the original idea is not preserved in its title (as it is in the Hypapante), except in the Ethiopian calendar, where it is not called the Annunciation but the Conception of Christ.

The purpose, therefore, of the festival is to commemorate (1) the announcement made by the angel Gabriel to St. Mary that she should conceive and bring forth the promised Messiah, and (2) the conception of our Lord which followed that announcement (Luke i. 26-38). The place where this announcement was made was the house in Nazareth in which St. Mary lived. The legend of Loretto has transferred this house to Italy; the exact spot where it took place is nevertheless pointed out both by Greeks and Latins, a different spot by each, as still existing in Palestine.

3. THE ASSUMPTION (Κοίμησις, Μετάστασις, Dormitio, Pausatio, Transitus, Depositio, Migratio, Assumptio).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted, according to the statement of Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. lib. xvii. c. 28), by the emperor Maurice, who lived at the close of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th century. In the time of Charles the Great, two centuries later, its observance was not yet universal in the West (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 158, apud Migne, Patrolog. tom. xcvi. p. 533, Paris, 1851).^d But it appears to have been received after deliberation by Charles, and it is recognised by his son Ludvig in the year 818 or 819 (ibid. lib. ii. c. 35, p. 547). An octave was added to the festival by pope Leo IV., A.D. 847.

Its date in the calendar is August 15th.

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the assumption of St. Mary into heaven in body and soul. The origin of the belief that she was so assumed, and the steps by which it grew are as follows:—

In the 3rd or 4th century there was composed a book, embodying the Gnostic and Collyridian traditions as to the death of St. Mary, called De Transitu Virginis Mariæ Liber. The book exists still, and may be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 212). The legend contained in it relates how St. Mary, after her Son's death, went and lived at Bethlehem for twenty-one years, after which time an angel appeared to her, and told her that her soul should be taken from her body. So she was wafted on a cloud to Jerusalem, and the apostles, who had been miraculously gathered together, carried her to Gethsemane, and there her soul was taken up into Paradise by Gabriel. Then the apostles bore her body to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and laid it in a new tomb; and suddenly by the side of the tomb appeared her son Christ, who raised up her body lest it should see corruption, and reuniting it with her soul, which Michael brought back from Paradise, had her conveyed by angels to heaven.

It will be seen that the Liber de Transitu Mariæ contains already the whole of the story of the Assumption. But down to the end of the 5th century this story was regarded by the church as a Gnostic or Collyridian fable, and the Liber de Transitu was condemned as heretical by the Decretum de Libris Canonici Ecclesiasticis et Apocryphis, attributed to pope Gelasius A.D. 494. How then did it pass across the borders and establish itself within the church, so as to have a festival appointed to commemorate it? In the following manner:—

In the sixth century a great change passed over the sentiments and the theology of the church in reference to the θεοτόκος—an unintended but very noticeable result of the Nestorian controversies, which in maintaining the true doctrine of the Incarnation incidentally gave a strong impulse to what became the Worship of St. Mary. In consequence of this change of sentiment, during the 6th and 7th centuries (or later), (1) the Liber de Transitu, though classed by Gelasius with the known productions

^c The words are: Παρεκτός σαββάτου καὶ κυριακῆς καὶ τῆς ἁγίας τοῦ εὐαγγελισμοῦ ἡμέρας (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1681).

^d Charles the Great's Capitulare, after recounting the festivals, says: "De Assumptione Sanctæ Mariæ interrogandum relinquimus." The treatise De Assumptione B. M. Virginis, attributed to St. Augustine and bound up with his works (tom. vi. p. 1142, ed. Migne) has been thought to have been a reply by one of Charles's bishops to his inquiry on the subject, as it begins, "Ad interrogata de Virginis et Matris Domini resolutione temporalis et assumptione perenni quid intelligam responsurus."

of heretics came to be attributed by one ("otiosus quispiam," says Baronius) to Melito, an orthodox bishop of Sardis, in the 2nd century, and by another to St. John the Apostle; (2) a letter suggesting the possibility of the Assumption was written and attributed to St. Jerome (ad Paulum et Eustochium de Assumptione B. Virginis, Op. tom. v. p. 82, Paris, 1706); (3) a treatise to prove it not impossible was composed and attributed to St. Augustine (Op. tom. vi. p. 1142, ed. Migne); (4) two sermons supporting the belief were written and attributed to St. Athanasius (Op. tom. ii. pp. 393, 416, ed. Ben. Paris, 1698); (5) an insertion was made in Eusebius's Chronicle that "in the year 48 Mary the Virgin was taken up into heaven, as some wrote that they had had it revealed to them." Thus the authority of the names of St. John, of Melito, of Athanasius, of Eusebius, of Augustine, of Jerome, was obtained for the belief by a series of forgeries readily accepted because in accordance with the sentiment of the day, and the Gnostic legend was attributed to orthodox writers who did not entertain it. But this was not all, for there is the clearest evidence (1) that no one within the church taught it for six centuries, and (2) that those who did first teach it within the church borrowed it directly from the book condemned by pope Gelasius as heretical. For the first person within the church who held and taught it was Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem (if a homily attributed to John Damascene containing a quotation from "the Euthymiac history" (Op. tom. ii. p. 880, Venice, 1748) be for the moment considered genuine), who (according to this statement) on Marcian and Pulcheria's sending to him for information as to St. Mary's sepulchre, replied to them by narrating a shortened version of the De Transitu legend as "a most ancient and true tradition." The second person within the church who taught it (or the first, if the homily attributed to John Damascene relating the above tale of Juvenal be spurious, as it almost certainly is) was Gregory of Tours, A.D. 590, who in his De Glorâ Martyrum (lib. i. c. 4) writes as follows: "When Blessed Mary had finished the course of this life, and was now called away from the world, all the apostles were gathered together at her house from all parts of the world; and when they heard that she was to be taken away they watched with her, and behold! the Lord Jesus came with his angels, and taking her soul, gave it to Michael the Archangel, and went away. In the morning the apostles took up her body with the bed, and placed it in a monument, and watched it, waiting for the coming of the Lord. And behold! a second time the Lord appeared, and commanded her to be taken up and carried in a cloud to Paradise, where now, having resumed her soul, she enjoys the never-ending blessings of eternity, rejoicing with her elect." The Abbé Migne points out in a note that "what Gregory here relates of the death of the Blessed Virgin and its attendant circumstances he undoubtedly drew (procul dubio hausit) from the Pseudo-Melito's Liber de Transitu B. Mariæ, which is classed among apocryphal books by pope Gelasius." He adds that this account, with the circumstances related by Gregory, were soon after introduced into the Gallican Liturgy. It is very seldom that we are able to trace a tale from its birth onwards so clearly and unmistakably as this. It is demonstrable that the Gnostic legend passed into the church through Gregory or Juvenal, and so became an accepted tradition within it. The next writers on the subject are Andrew of Crete, who is supposed to have lived about A.D. 635; Hildephonsus of Toledo, A.D. 657; and John of Damascus, who lived about A.D. 730, if writings attributed to any of them are genuine, which is quite doubtful. Pope Benedict XIV. says naively that "the most ancient Fathers of the Primitive Church are silent as to the bodily assumption of the Blessed Virgin, but the fathers of the middle and latest ages, both Greeks and Latins, relate it in the distinctest terms" (De Fest. Assumpt. apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 144, Paris, 1842). It was under the shadow of the names of Gregory of Tours and of these "fathers of the middle and latest ages, Greek and Latin," that the De Transitu legend became accepted as a catholic tradition (see Alban Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 15).

The history, therefore, of the belief which this festival was instituted to commemorate is as follows:—It was first taught in the 3rd or 4th century as part of the Gnostic legend of St. Mary's death, and it was regarded by the church as a Gnostic and Collyridian fable down to the end of the 5th century. It was brought into the church in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, partly by a series of successful forgeries, partly by the adoption of the Gnostic legend on the part of accredited teachers, writers, and liturgists. And a festival in commemoration of the event, thus come to be believed, was instituted in the East at the beginning of the 7th, in the West at the beginning of the 9th century.

4. THE NATIVITY (Γενέθλιον τῆς θεοτόκου, Nativitas).

Its institution.—This festival is said to have been established by pope Sergius I. in the year 695, on the representation of a monk (religiosus quidam) that he had for several years following heard the angels singing on the night of Sept. 8, and that it had been revealed to him that the reason for which they sang was that St. Mary had been born on that night. The pope, says Durandus, established the festival in order that we and the angels might commemorate the event at the same time (Divin. Offic. lib. vii. c. 28). Beletius confirms Durandus' statement (Explic. Divin. Offic. c. 149). Baronius has thrown out a suggestion, as he has done with regard to the date of the "Ave Maria," that it might have been instituted soon after the Council of Ephesus, "because from that time the worship of the most Blessed Virgin grew and increased more and more every day throughout the world;" he does not however presume to say that it was established then, but, on the contrary, acknowledges that "it was unknown in the Gallican church in the time of Charles the Great and Ludvig the Pious" (Martyrol. in Sept. 8); as indeed may be seen by its absence from their lists of the festivals (Capit. ab Ansegiso collecta, lib. i. § 153; ii. § 33). In a calendar of Milan, supposed by Muratori (tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 1021, Milan, 1723) to be of the date A.D. 1000, the Nativity is noted as being specially observed at Foligno, as though it were not yet general even in Italy. A sermon attributed to St. Augustine, and quoted by the Breviary as delivered on the Feast of the Nativity of St. Mary, is, of course, spurious (Serm. xciv. alias De Sanctis, xviii. tom. v. p. 2104, ed. Migne).

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the birth of St. Mary as it is recounted in the apocryphal gospels, the Protevangelion, and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary. Nothing whatever is known of St. Mary's birth. We do not know the names of her parents, or anything at all about her early life. When we have stated that she was of the tribe of Judah and descended from David, that she had a sister named, like herself, Mary, and that she was connected by marriage with Elizabeth, we have said all that can be known with respect to her previous to her betrothal to Joseph. But as early as the 2nd or 3rd century there were composed and disseminated among the Gnostics, the Protevangelion, and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, which are an application and adaptation of the history of our Lord's birth and childhood to St. Mary. The legend, as contained in these apocryphal gospels, narrates that Joachim and Anna, of the race of David, lived piously together as husband and wife for twenty years at Nazareth; that at the end of this time Joachim was roughly rebuked by the high priest, and Anna bitterly jeered at by her maid, because they had no child; that Joachim went into the wilderness and fasted for forty days, and Anna went into her garden and prayed that she might have a child as Sarai had; and two angels appeared to Anna, and promised her a child; and Joachim returned, and the child was born, and her name was called Mary (Giles, Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, pp. 33, 47, Lond. 1847). These legends of St. Mary's birth were repudiated by the early church, and regarded by it as belonging to a body external and hostile to itself. Like the legends of her death, they crept into the church in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Pope Benedict XIV. allows that "there is nothing about her nativity in Holy Scripture, and all that is said about it is drawn from turbid fountains," which he explains to mean the Protevangelion and the other legends (De Fest. Nativ. B. Virginis, apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Complet. p. 611).

5. THE PRESENTATION (Τὰ εἰσόδια τῆς θεοτόκου. Præsentatio Beatae Mariæ Virginis).

Its institution.—The Festival of the Presentation of St. Mary at the Temple is supposed by some to have been established at Constantinople about A.D. 730. There is certain evidence of its existence there in A.D. 1150. But it did not pass into the West till A.D. 1375. (See Launois, Regii Navarrae Gymnasii Parisiensis Historia, pt. i. c. 10, p. 77, Paris, 1677.) It was withdrawn from the Roman calendar by Pius V., but restored by Sixtus V. on the prayer of Turrianus.

Its purpose is to commemorate the presentation of St. Mary as narrated in the Gnostic legend which is embodied in the Protevangelion and the Gospel of the Birth of Mary. The legend states that when St. Mary was three years old her parents brought her to the Temple to dedicate her to the Lord; and that she walked up the fifteen steps leading into the Temple by herself, and the high priest placed her on the third step of the altar; and she danced with her feet: and all the house of Israel loved her. She is said to have remained at the Temple till she was twelve or fourteen years old, food being brought to her by the angels. This legend, like that of her nativity and her assumption, crept into the church during the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries.

6. THE DEPOSITING OF THE HONOURABLE VESTMENT OF THE THEOTOKOS IN BLACHERNAE (Κατάθεσις ἐσθήτος τιμίας τῆς θεοτόκου).

This festival claims to have been instituted at the date of the events commemorated by it, in the 5th century, but it would appear to have been first observed in the 9th century. Its date in the calendar of the Byzantine church is July 2nd. Its purpose is to commemorate the laying up or depositing in the church of Blachernae in Constantinople of (1) the grave-clothes of St. Mary (τὰ ἐντάφια), supposed to have been sent (according to Nicephorus Callistus' statement) by Juvenal of Jerusalem from Palestine to Marcian and Pulcheria, and (2) her vestment (τιμία ἐσθής) said to have been stolen from Galilee by Calvius and Candidus in the time of Leo Magnus, successor to Marcian (Menacon for July 2, Constantinople, 1843).

7. THE DISCOVERY AND DEPOSITING OF THE HONOURABLE GIRDLE OF THE THEOTOKOS (Κατάθεσις τῆς τιμίας ζώνης τῆς θεοτόκου).

This festival, like the last, claims to have been instituted at the date of the event commemorated by it, but there is no evidence of its observance before the 9th century. Its date in the calendars of the Byzantine and Armenian churches is August 31. Its purpose is to commemorate (1) the discovery of the supposed girdle of St. Mary in the time (according to the Menacon) of Arcadius, (2) its translation to Constantinople in the time of Justinian, and (3) a miraculous cure supposed to have been wrought by it on Zoe the wife of Leo the Philosopher, A.D. 886. (Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccles. lib. xiv. 2; xv. 14, 24. Du Fresne, Notae in Annuae Commemoriae Alexiadem, p. 329, ad calcem Joannis Cinnami Historiae, Paris, 1670; Menacon for August, p. 189, Constantinople, 1843.)

8. THE SYNAXIS OF THE THEOTOKOS AND OF JOSEPH HER SPOUSE.—This festival was probably instituted, at Constantinople, at about the same date as the two previously named festivals, though, like them, it claims a much earlier date, appeal being made to a spurious sermon of Epiphanius, supposed to have been delivered on the day. The date in the calendar and the purpose of its institution are closely connected. It is observed on Dec. 26, as being a continuation of the Christmas festival, the mind being turned on the first day to the Son, and on the second day to the mother. The word 'Synaxis,' derived from συνάγειν, means in the first place an assembly of worshippers, and thence (in the present connexion) a commemoration festival held by those so assembled.

9. THE PROTECTION OF THE MOST HOLY MOTHER OF GOD.—This festival was instituted at the beginning of the 10th century. The day in the calendar of the Russian church on which it is observed is Oct. 1. Its purpose is to commemorate a vision which St. Andrew, surnamed "the Foolish," or "the Idiot," said that he had in the church of Blachernae, Constantinople, in which he supposed himself to have seen St. Mary, with prophets, apostles, and angels, praying for the world and spreading her ἀμοιβή (ecclesiastical vestment) over Christians. The Russian church accounts for the festival not being found in the Byzantine calendar by the great troubles which in the 10th century were encompassing and pervading Constantinople. (Russian calendar, Oct. 1.)

10. THE CONCEPTION (Σύλληψις τῆς ἁγίας Ἀννης, Conceptio Beate Mariæ Virginis).

Its institution.—Legend relates that this festival was instituted A.D. 1067 by abbat Helsinus, who had been sent by William I. of England to Denmark, and being caught in a storm on his return, and addressing prayers for help to St. Mary had a vision of a grave ecclesiastic upon the waves, who promised him safety on condition of his establishing the Festival of the Conception of St. Mary on Dec. 8. This legend is assigned to St. Anselm as its author in the Legenda Aurea, and the synod of London held under archbishop Mepeham, A.D. 1328, appears to have believed it to rest on his authority (Const. 2). It may be found in Migne's Patrologia (tom. clix. p. 325), relegated to the appendix of St. Anselm's works. Another form of the same legend puts St. Anselm himself in the place of Helsinus as the hero of the story, and represents the scene to have occurred as he was returning from England to Bec (Petr. de Natalibus, Catal. Sanct. lib. i. c. xiii.). Passing from legend to history we find that the festival originated in the 12th century. It was at once condemned by St. Bernard as (1) novel, (2) heterodox, (3) unauthorised (see Epist. clxiv., Op. tom. i. p. 169, ed. Ben. Paris, 1690). This was in the year A.D. 1140. St. Bernard's contemporary Pothe also condemned it as (1) novel, (2) absurd (De Statu domus Dei, lib. iii. apud Magn. Bibl. Patr. tom. ix. p. 587, Paris, 1644), and in the following century Durandus (De Divin. Offic., lib. vii. c. 7) and Beletus (Exp. Divin. Offic. c. 146) repudiated it as heterodox. "Some," says Beletus, "have kept the Feast of the Conception, and perhaps even still keep it, but it is not authorised or approved; nay, it ought rather to be prohibited, for she was conceived in sin." In the 14th century it was made obligatory in England by the following constitution of Simon Mepeham, archbishop of Canterbury, which was accepted by a Provincial synod held in London in the year 1328. "That the memory of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our Lord, may be oftener and more solemnly celebrated, in proportion to the greater favour which she among all the saints hath found with God, who ordained her conception to be the predestinated temporal origin of His only begotten Son and the salvation of all men; that by this means the remote dawns of our salvation, which raise spiritual joys in pious minds, might increase the devotion and salvation of all; following the steps of our venerable predecessor Anselm, who after other more ancient solemnities of hers thought fit to add that of her conception, we ordain and firmly command that the Feast of the Conception aforesaid be solemnly celebrated for the future in all the churches of the province" (Const. ii., Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. iii. p. 499, Lond. 1865).

The purpose of the festival was originally, as Bellarmine acknowledges, and the above quoted constitution of archbishop Mepeham plainly states, not to celebrate an immaculate or even a holy conception, but simply to commemorate the fact of the conception of St. Mary, the mother of Christ, in imitation of the Festival of the Annunciation, which commemorates the conception of her Son. But, as St. Bernard clearly saw, its tendency from the beginning was to induce a belief in the supernatural character of the conception of St. Mary, and so to lead on to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. For this reason he sharply reproved the canons of Lyons for having admitted it. "It has been vouchsafed," he writes, "to a very few of the sons of men to be born holy, but to none to be conceived holy; that the prerogative of a holy conception might be kept for One only who should sanctify all and make a cleansing of sins, being himself the only One who comes without sin. It is the Lord Jesus Christ alone that was conceived by the Holy Ghost, for He alone was holy before His conception. Excepting Him, the humble and true confession of one who says, 'I was shapen in iniquity and in sin did my mother conceive me,' applies to every one else of Adam's children. Then what can be the meaning of a festival of her conception? How can a conception be said to be holy which is not of the Holy Spirit, not to say, which is of sin? or how can it be regarded as a matter for festivity when it is not holy? The glorious woman will be ready enough to go without an honour which seems either to honour sin or to attribute a holiness which did not exist" (Epist. clxiv.). The dogma which St. Bernard opposed was that of a holy conception of St. Mary. The idea of her immaculate conception had not arisen in his time. This was first proposed as a possibility by J. Duns Scotus at the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century, and six centuries later, on Dec. 8, 1854, it was pronounced a dogma necessary for all adherents of the papacy to believe if they desire salvation.

The original purpose of the festival was simply to commemorate the first beginning of the life of her who was the mother of our Lord, but since A.D. 1854 the immaculateness of her conception, that is, her exemption from original sin, has been regarded the chief subject commemorated by it. The steps by which the belief grew which culminated in the dogma now supposed to be commemorated by the festival are briefly as follows:—From apostolic times to the end of the 5th century it was taught and believed that St. Mary was born in original sin, that she was liable to actual sin, and that she fell into sins of infirmity. We may take as witnesses for the 2nd century, Tertullian (de Carn. Christi, vii. 315, and Adv. Marcion. iv. 19, Op. p. 433, Paris, 1695); for the 3rd century, Origen (Hom. in Luc. xvii., Op. tom. iii. p. 952, Paris, 1733); for the 4th century, St. Basil (Ep. 260, Op. tom. iii. p. 400, Paris, 1721) and St. Hilary (in Ps. cxix., Op. p. 262, Paris, 1693); for the 5th century, St. Chrysostom (Op. tom. vii. p. 467, Paris, 1718) and St. Cyril of Alexandria (Op. tom. iv. p. 1064; tom. vi. p. 391, Paris, 1638). From the 6th to the 12th century it was taught and believed that St. Mary was born in original sin, but was saved from falling into actual sin. In the 13th century it was taught and believed that she was conceived in sin, and so subjected to original sin, but, like John the Baptist, sanctified before her birth. From the 14th to the 18th century teaching and belief in the Latin church wavered between a maculate and an immaculate conception according as the Dominicans or Franciscans were most powerful at Rome. In the 19th century it was formally declared by pope Pius IX. that St. Mary, having been conceived immaculately, was absolutely exempt from original and from actual sin. This belief of the Latin church is regarded by the Greek church (see Conference between the Abp. of Syros and the Bp. of Winchester, Lond. 1871), and by the Anglican church (see Bp. Wilberforce, Rome, her new Dogma and our Duties, Oxf. 1855), not only as untrue in fact, but as heretical in its tendencies.

The day in the calendar fixed for this festival is Dec. 8, as being nine months before Sept. 8, which was regarded in the 12th century as the Nativity of St. Mary. The Eastern churches observe it on Dec. 9.

11. ST. MARY AT SNOWS (Festum Dedicationis S. Mariæ ad Nives).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted as a local anniversary, and observed in the basilica of Sta. Maria Maggiore as early, it would seem, as the 12th century. Its observance was extended throughout Rome in the 14th century, and made obligatory on all Roman Christendom by Pius V. in the 16th century.

Its purpose is to celebrate the legendary foundation of the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome. The legend says that in the 4th century one John and his wife, having no children, were anxious to devote their substance to St. Mary, but did not know how to do so acceptably to her, until they each had a dream telling them that they would find snow on the ground marking out the spot whereon they were to build a cathedral. They went to Liberius, the pope of Rome, and found that he had had the same dream; and behold, the snow was lying (on the 5th of August) on the Esquiline in the shape of a cathedral. So they built Sta. Maria Maggiore. The Breviary (Aug. 5) contains the legend. It probably arose from an attempt to explain the name ad Nives, which may itself be the corruption of some lost word—possibly of ad Liv. or ad Liviae—as the church was built juxta macellum Liviae; or of Liberi., as it was known by the title Liberiana; or of in Esq., as it was built on the Esquiline Hill. The story rests on the authority of manuscripts belonging to the cathedral body, which might easily have become difficult to decipher in the lapse of centuries, and of Peter de Natalibus, a collector of worthless legends, who lived in the 15th century. The miracle is first mentioned by Nicholas IV. in the year A.D. 1287, that is, 927 years after it was said to have taken place. Gregory XI., A.D. 1371, and Pius II. A.D. 1453, have given the sanction of their authority to it. The original legend stated that the earth opened of its own accord for the foundations, on Liberius beginning to dig them. But this part of the miracle was expunged from the Breviary by Pius V., while he left the part relating to the snow. The date in the calendar is Aug. 5.

There was a sister festival, called ST. MARY AT MARTYRS, held on May 13, to commemorate the dedication of the Pantheon, or Rotunda, to St. Mary and the Holy Martyrs, by Boniface IV. at the beginning of the 7th century. This festival has been allowed to become obsolete, perhaps because there was not so powerful a body as the chapter of Sta. Maria Maggiore whose interest it was to maintain it.

12. THE VISITATION (Visitatio Beatae Mariæ Virginis).

Its institution.—This festival was instituted by Urban VI. during the schism in the papacy and promulgated by a constitution of his successor Boniface IX., A.D. 1389 (Bulla Bonifacii ix. apud Bollandi Acta Sanctorum, July 2). About half a century later, A.D. 1441, it was again established by the council of Basle, no reference being made to its previous institution, because Boniface's authority was not acknowledged by all the members of the council. The whole of session 43 is occupied with the matter (Conc. Basil. apud Harduin, Concil. tom. viii. p. 1292).

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate the visit paid by St. Mary to Elizabeth before the birth of John the Baptist at Juttah or, it may be, Hebron. Joachim Hildebrand says, that "it was instituted at the council of Basle to supplicate Mary to trample down the Turks, the enemies of the Christians, as she trod upon the mountains of Judaea on her way to her cousin" (De Priscæ et Primitivæ Ecclesiæ sacris publicis templis ac diebus festis, Helmsstadt, 1652). As it is a scriptural fact commemorated by it, the festival is retained in the Anglican calendar in spite of its late date. The date in the calendar is July 2.

13. THE ESPOUSALS (Desponsatio Beatae Virginis Mariæ cum S. Josepho).

Its institution and purpose.—A canon of the cathedral of Chartres, in the 14th century, charged the chapter in his will to institute a commemoration of St. Joseph, with the view of pleasing Mary. Gerson, chancellor of the university of Paris, proposed to the chapter to carry out this object by using an Officium Desponsationis Beatae Virginis cum S. Josepho composed by himself. In the 16th century Paul III. desired an office to be prepared for the day, and he gave his approbation to it after it had been drawn up. The observance of the festival was extended by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1725. It is of obligation in Spain, Italy, England, and in all congregations of the Jesuits. The ring used at the espousals is said by Benedict XIV. to be still preserved at Perugia (In Fest. Desponsationis apud Migne, Theol. Curs. Compl. tom. xxvi. p. 531, Paris, 1842). The date in the calendar is Jan. 23.

14. THE NAME OF MARY (Festum SS. Nominis Beatae Mariæ).

This festival was instituted in Spain at the beginning of the 16th century. It was removed from the calendar by Pius V., and restored by Sixtus V., on the prayer of cardinal Deza. It was made of universal obligation by Innocent XI., A.D. 1685, in gratitude for the defeat of the Turks before Vienna. Its purpose is to encourage putting confidence in the name of Mary. Its date in the calendar is the Sunday following the Feast of the Nativity, that is, about Sept. 15.

15. THE SEVEN SORROWS (Festum Septem Dolorum Beatae Mariæ Virginis).

This festival is conjectured by Benedict XIV.

to have been instituted by Theodoric, bishop of Cologne, at a provincial synod, A.D. 1413, to make up for the insults offered by Hussites to sacred images of our Lord and St. Mary. He has no grounds for his conjecture. George Haller, dean of the Benedictine monastery of Kiebach in Bavaria, assured Bruschius that he instituted it in the district committed to his pastoral charge in the year of our Lord 1545. (See Bruschius, Chron. Monasteriorum Germaniae, p. 658, Sulzbach, 1682.) It was made of universal obligation throughout Roman Christendom by a decree of Benedict XIII., A.D. 1727.

The purpose of the festival is to commemorate St. Mary in her character of Mater Dolorosa.

This is the only festival in the Roman calendar which is observed twice in the course of the year. The second commemoration is of very late institution. Its dates are the Friday preceding Good Friday, and the third Sunday in September.

16. THE ROSARY (Festum SS. Rosarii Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival was first instituted on the occasion of the defeat of the Turks at Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1571. As a memorial of this event Pius V. ordered that a commemoration of St. Mary of Victory should be held every year. Gregory XIII. changed the title to that of the Rosary of St. Mary, because the companies of the most Holy Rosary had been walking in procession and saying the Rosary or Psalter of St. Mary on the day of battle. Clement X. made its observance obligatory throughout Spain, A.D. 1575. Innocent XII. was requested by the emperor Leopold to make it of universal obligation, but he died before the emperor's desire could be complied with. It was made of universal obligation by Clement XI., on the occasion of the defeat of the Turks by Prince Eugene, A.D. 1716.

Its date in the calendar is the first Sunday in October.

Its purpose is to recommend the devotion of the Rosary or Psalter of the Virgin, which consists of the recitation of 150 Ave Marius together with 15 Pater Nosters. This devotion is supposed, but without sufficient evidence, to have been instituted by St. Dominic, A.D. 1210, who is stated by St. Alfonso de' Liguori to have proved its efficacy in the following manner: "When St. Dominic was preaching at Carcassone, in France, an Albigensian heretic, who for having publicly ridiculed the devotion of the Rosary was possessed by devils, was brought to him. The saint obliged the evil spirits to declare whether the things which he said about the most Holy Rosary were true. Howling, they replied: 'Listen, Christians; all that this enemy of ours has said of Mary and of the most Holy Rosary is true.' They moreover added that they had no power over the servants of Mary, and that many by invoking her name at death were saved contrary to their deserts. They concluded, saying, 'We are forced to declare that no one is lost who perseveres in devotion to Mary and in that of the most Holy Rosary; for Mary obtains for those who are sinners true repentance before they die.' St. Dominic then made the people recite the Rosary; and, O prodigy! at every Hail Mary, evil spirits left the body of the possessed man under the form of red-hot coals, so that when the Rosary was finished, he was entirely freed" (Glories of Mary, Lond. 1852). [HAIL MARY.]

17. BLESSED MARY OF MOUNT CARMEL (Beatae Mariae Virginis de Monte Carmelo).

This festival was instituted or approved for the Carmelites by Sixtus V., A.D. 1587; and it was made of universal obligation in Roman Christendom by Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the 18th century.

Its purpose is to commemorate an alleged appearance of St. Mary to Simon Stock, an Englishman, the general of the Carmelites, A.D. 1251. St. Alfonso de' Liguori, the latest Doctor of the Roman church, states that St. Mary gave the general a scapular for the use of the Carmelites, saying:—"Receive, my beloved son, the scapular of thy order, a badge of my confraternity, a privilege granted to thee and to all Carmelites: whoever dies clothed with it shall not suffer eternal flames" (Glories of Mary, p. 485, Lond. 1852). Fifty years afterwards "she appeared to pope John XXII. and ordered him to make known to all that on the Saturday after their death she would deliver from purgatory all who wore the Carmelite scapular. This, as Father Crasset relates, was proclaimed by the same pontiff in a bull which was afterwards confirmed by Alexander V., Clement VII., Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Paul V." (ibid. p. 196).

The date in the calendar is July 16.

18. THE EXPECTED DELIVERY OF ST. MARY (Expectatio Partus Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival grew up in Spain at the end of the 16th century. Its observance was extended to Venetia, A.D. 1695, and to other parts of Italy, by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1725.

Its purpose is indicated by its name.

Its date in the calendar is December 18.

19. THE TRANSLATION OF THE HOUSE OF LORETTO (Translatio clarae domus Lauretanae).

This festival was instituted and approved for the province of Picenum, A.D. 1669. Its observance was extended by Benedict XIII., A.D. 1719, and 1729 to Italy and the Spanish dominions.

Its purpose is to commemorate the alleged fact that the house in which St. Mary lived in Nazareth, in which the Annunciation took place, was carried through the air, A.D. 1294, first to Dalmatia, and then to three different sites in Italy. This legend is still vouched for by historians such as Rohrbacher (Hist. Univ. de l'Eglise Catholique, vol. xix. p. 321, Paris, 1851). All that can be said for or against it is compressed into an article by the Rev. E. S. Ffoulkes in the Christian Remembrancer (April, 1854, Lond.).

Its date in the calendar is December 10.

20. THE PROTECTION OF ST. MARY (Patrocinium Beatae Mariae Virginis).

This festival, which has nothing to do with the Russian festival of similar name, was instituted A.D. 1679, and confirmed by Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the 18th century.

Its purpose is to encourage prayer to St. Mary and confidence in her protection.

Its date in the calendar.—It is appointed to be observed in Spain on a Sunday in November, in England on the fourth Sunday in October.

21. BLESSED MARY DE MERCEDE (Beatae Mariae de Mercede).

This festival was instituted in the 17th century, first for the order de Mercede, then for Spain, and then for France. Its observance was extended to all Roman Christendom by Innocent XII.

Its purpose is to commemorate an alleged appearance of St. Mary, which is said to have caused the institution of the order de Mercede. The members of the order, besides taking the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, bound themselves to redeem captives by delivering themselves into slavery.

The date in the calendar is Sept. 24.

The remaining festivals, the HELP OF CHRISTIANS, the MOST PURE HEART, the MATERNITY, the PURITY, have special masses, sanctioned by popes, and appointed to be said in England and in the Jesuit congregations, but they have hardly yet become recognised festivals.

The Saturday began to be appropriated to St. Mary's honour by an appointment of Urban II., A.D. 1096. This was made of universal obligation by Pius V., A.D. 1568.

It will be seen from the above that the two festivals of the Purification and the Annunciation were instituted as early as the 6th century, and that they were originally festivals of our Lord rather than of St. Mary. The Assumption, the Nativity, and the Presentation, which illustrate the early Gnostic legends of St. Mary's birth and death, belong to the 7th and the beginning of the 8th century. The Vestment, the Girdle, and the Synaxis belong to the 9th century; the (Russian) Protection to the 10th; the Conception and the Dedication of St. Mary at Snows to the 12th; the Visitation, the Espousals, and the Name of Mary to the 14th; the Seven Sorrows, the Rosary, Mount Carmel, the Delivery, to the 16th; the House of Loretto, the (Latin) Protection, the de Mercede, to the 17th; the Aid of Christians, the Most Pure Heart, the Maturity, the Purity, and the Immaculate Conception, to the 18th and the 19th centuries.

MARY, ST., THE VIRGIN (IN ART). The history of the Virgin Mary in Art corresponds to that of our Blessed Lord in the complete absence, in the early ages of the church, of any representations of her person having the smallest claim to authenticity. The words of St. Augustine (de Trinitate, lib. viii. c. 5) are express on this point: "Neque novimus faciem Virginis Mariæ:" while what he says of the different ideas formed by different persons of her lineaments, all probably widely at variance with the truth, indicates not only the absence of any recognised type of portrait, but also that pictures of her were of extreme rarity, if indeed they existed at all.

When found the Virgin Mary appears in all the earliest representations as a member of an historical group depicting a scriptural subject, such as the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ among the Doctors. By far the most frequent is the Adoration of the Magi, which recurs in countless examples of all the various forms of Christian art—carved on sarcophagi, sculptured on ivories, or depicted in the mosaics of the basilicas, and the frescoes of the catacombs, thus evidencing the hold that subject had gained on the mind of the early Christian church. [MAGI, ADORATION OF THE.] The Nativity without the Magi is of very rare occurrence, being only found on minor works of art, such as coins, gems, ivories, or sarcophagi [NATIVITY]. The Annunciation also appears very seldom. It is represented in one of the compartments of the vast mosaic composition that clothes the western face of the arch of Triumph in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome (c. A.D. 433). In this the Virgin, richly robed, but without a nimbus, is seated in a chair, behind which two nimbed angels stand; the archangel Gabriel stands in front, while the Holy Dove hovers above in the air, together with a second Gabriel. This mosaic also includes two other subjects, in addition to the Adoration of the Magi (see woodcut ANGELS, Vol. I. p. 84), in which the Virgin appears, viz., the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ among the Doctors. In all these subjects the Virgin has her head uncovered, is without the nimbus, and is very richly clad in a gold robe, and is decorated with earrings, necklace, and head jewels. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. p. 207, tav. li.; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvi. no. 4. S. Kens. Museum, no. 7445.) The Annunciation is also found on the north wall of the apse of the Cathedral of Parenzo, in Istria, with the Visitation opposite to it. The Virgin is here seated, with her head encircled by a nimbus, at the door of a small gabled cottage, and the angel stands before her. A later example is seen in the mosaics of St. Nereus and St. Achilleus at Rome, A.D. 796. The catacomb of St. Priscilla contains a fresco, which may very probably be identified with this same subject. In this, the drawing of which is excellent (see woodcut No. 1), we have a young man fully clothed, without wings or any of the later angelic attributes, with extended right hand, addressing a seated female, who with downcast eyes and uplifted left hand seems to be receiving the speaker's message with devout submission. The earlier illustrators of the catacombs were far from expressing the certainty now exhibited as to the subject of this picture. Bosio says that it is impossible to determine what story it represents. Bottari (p. 141) expresses his opinion with hesitation, that this may be intended for the Annunciation, which is considered probable by Mr. Wharton Marriott (Test. of Catacombs, p. 24), and is positively affirmed by Garrucci. (See Bosio, 541; Bottari, tav. 176; Garrucci, tav. 75, no. 1; Parker's Photogr. no. 541.) In the same catacomb there is another fresco, the subject of which, though its reference to the Virgin is unquestionable, it is very difficult to determine; nor is its date accurately fixed. It forms "a very small portion of a piece of decorative work which," according to Mr. Wharton Marriott (u. s. p. 26), "with the single exception of this group, might have been found in the tomb of the Nasos, or any other purely pagan building." The beauty of the composition, and the dignity and grace of the figures, together with the freedom of their action, so unlike the poverty and stiffness which characterise the later frescoes, point to an early date. De' Rossi assigns it to the reign of Trajan or Hadrian, or at the latest to the time of the Antonines, i. e. the close of the 2nd or beginning of the 3rd century, while Mr. J. H. Parker, with less probability, brings it down as late as A.D. 523.

No. 2. Virgin and Child and male figure. From the Cemetery of St. Priscilla. Northcote, 'Roma Sott.' pl. 10.

The fresco in question (see woodcut No. 2) consists of a seated figure of the Virgin, veiled, clothed in a tunic with a pallium over, un-nimbed, clasping her Infant, also destitute of the nimbus, to her naked bosom. Before her stands a young man, with a pallium over his naked body, holding a roll in his left hand, and with the index finger of his outstretched right hand pointing towards the Virgin, and a star (discovered by De' Rossi) in the sky above. This is very reasonably interpreted by Mr. Wharton Marriott (u. s.) of the Holy Family, the conventional representation of Joseph as an old man, with which we are so familiar, being of later date. De' Rossi however, less probably, identifies the young man with one of the prophets of the old covenant, perhaps Isaiah, pointing to the Star of Bethlehem and to the Virgin and the Infant Saviour as the great subject of prophetic testimony. (De' Rossi, Imagines Selectae Virginis Deiparae; Garrucci, Arti cristiane primitive, tav. 81; Northcote, Roma Sott. p. 258, pl. x. fig. 1.) The Visitation given by Bosio (p. 579), from the catacomb of pope Julius, or St. Valentinus on the Flaminian Way, is evidently of late date (Aringhi, i. 181; Munter, Sinnbilder, ii. p. 26). We may also mention a group of three figures given by Bosio (p. 279), and Bottari (tab. 82), from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Callistus, which is not unreasonably identified by Garrucci (Macarius, Hagioglypta, p. 242), De' Rossi, and Martigny (Dict. des Ant. chrét. p. 266) with the Holy Family. It presents a bearded man clothed in a tunic and pallium in the centre, a veiled female to the left, and a child of about eight years old, with his hands extended in prayer, to the right. It should, however, be mentioned that the earlier school of antiquaries, Bosio, Bottari, and Aringhi, considered that these figures were representations of the persons buried in the tomb below. De' Rossi gives an analogous picture from a mutilated fresco in the cemetery of Priscilla (Imag. Select. Virg. Deiparae, tab. iv.), and refers to a sarcophagus in the museum at Arles (No. 26), where a child is conducted by the hand by a male figure towards a female, which he considers represents the same sacred group. Martigny (Famille Sainte).

Symbolical representations of the Blessed Virgin are of the greatest rarity in Early Christian art. Among the innumerable paintings which decorate the walls and ceilings of the cubicles of the catacombs, the subjects of nearly all of which can be at once identified without the slightest question, there are very few which are even claimed as representations of the Virgin. De' Rossi, who has devoted a special treatise to this subject, has done his best to demonstrate the early date and the frequent occurrence of pictures of the Virgin Mary, either alone or with her Divine Son, as an object of religious reverence (Imagines Selectae Virginis Deiparae); but the evidence he produces is both so meagre and so questionable as rather to prove the extreme rarity of such representations, before the rise of the Nestorian heresy had elevated the Θεοτόκος into the outward and visible expression of the orthodox faith.

The symbolical pictures of the Virgin, as distinguished from the historical, may be divided into two classes, (a) those in which she appears with her Divine Son, and (b) those in which she is represented alone, standing as an "orante," with arms outstretched and hands upraised in attitude of prayer. The most famous of the pictures of the first class is the fresco on the plaiond of an arcosolium in the cemetery of St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana (woodcut No. 3). It is thoroughly Byzantine in character, its stiff religious symmetry contrasting most strongly with the freedom and grace of those just described, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla. It can hardly be placed earlier than the first years of the 5th century, though De' Rossi assigns it to the time of Constantine. It represents quarter-length figures of a mother and child, the latter standing in front, clothed in a blue tunic up to the neck. The mother stands behind, vested in a green tunic, and a pallium falling over her arms, with her head covered with a veil and circlet of beads round her neck, and extends her arms in the attitude of prayer. Neither have the nimbus. The sacred monogram ✠ on either side is turned towards the group. This picture is generally recognised as that of the Virgin Mary and the infant Christ, but the identification cannot be considered beyond question. Bottari, following Bosio, considered it merely a memorial of the persons buried in the sepulchral recess. This idea is strengthened by the frequent occurrence of portraits in the same position in other arcosolia which are unquestionably of that character (cf. Bosio, pp. 473, 499). Its identification with the Virgin and her Divine Son is asserted by Garrucci (Arti cristiane primitive, vol. ii. tav. 66, no. 1), by Marchi (p. 157), (who has some excellent remarks on the infinite distance between the Mother and the Son, indicated by the fact that she alone is represented as in the act of prayer), and De' Rossi (Imag. Select. pl. vi.), and is accepted by the judicious Munter (Sinnbilder, tom. ii. p. 128) and Wharton Marriott (u. s. pp. 28, 29). (See Bosio, p. 471; Bottari, cliii.) There is also a seated female figure with unveiled head giving suck to a naked infant, given by Bosio (p. 549), and Bottari (tav. 180), from the cemetery of St. Priscilla, which may be reasonably identified with the Virgin and Holy Child. It deserves remark that this group occupies a subordinate position in the right-hand corner of the lunette, a tall and stately matron, as an orante, identified by Bosio with Priscilla herself, being the central object. But the whole subject of this lunette is obscure. Among the few undoubted pictures of the Virgin, furnished by the catacombs, there are two of late date given by Perret. In both she is accompanied by her Son. Neither can be placed earlier than the 9th century. That from the baptistery of Valerian under the church of St. Urban alla Caffarella, a rude and ignorant work, represents the Virgin in a blue veil over a red tunic, holding Christ on her knees in the act of benediction. $\overline{\text{MP}} \overline{\text{OV}}$ is inscribed above the group

The second class of representations, viz. those in which the Virgin appears alone, without her Divine Son, while it supplies a very large number of possible examples, furnishes very few that can be certainly identified with the Mother of our Lord. No object is of more frequent occurrence in every form of early Christian art, on sarcophagi and monumental slabs, on gilded glasses, in mosaics, and especially in the catacomb frescoes, than the so-called "oranti," i.e. standing figures, with the arms extended in what was of old the ordinary attitude of prayer. These figures are of both sexes, but the females largely predominate, and are represented either alone, which is the more usual practice, or supported by a male figure on either hand. These "oranti" were generally unhesitatingly regarded by Bosio, Aringhi, Boldetti, and the earlier investigators, as memorial pictures of the individuals interred below. Others consider the female "oranti" to be symbolical representations of the Church. This view is stated by Martigny (Eglise, p. 226, §2) as well as by Garrucci (Vetri, tav. xxxix. n. 3) and is far from improbable. One or two are considered by Bosio to be pictures of the Virgin, though it is difficult to see on what principle he distinguishes them from the others. De' Rossi, on the other hand, and his translators, Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, have adopted the opposite rule of interpretation, and have thus enlarged the list of supposed catacomb-frescoes of the Virgin to an almost indefinite extent, and certainly far beyond what the facts admit. Dr. Northcote allows that the female oranti may possibly in some instances have "denoted some martyr or person of distinction buried in the principal tomb of the cubiculum where the painting is found" (R. S. p. 255). But in forgetfulness of the fact that male oranti and children are often found in precisely the same positions and with the same surroundings, and that the names of the individuals are not unfrequently given, he speaks of this as only a "conjecture" which "may possibly be sometimes correct," but which he "feels certain is inadmissible in the great majority of cases" (u. s.). The combination of the figure of a female orante in the same system of decoration with that of the Good Shepherd, which is deemed by Dr. Northcote as evidence that the former was intended for that of the Virgin, may be rather regarded as a conventional rule of ornamentation, on which nothing can be safely built. The example selected by Dr. Northcote as one of his illustrations (Roma Sotterranea, pl. viii.), in which a female orante is placed side by side with the Good Shepherd, so as to form one picture, was previously identified by Bosio (p. 387) with the Virgin. There is, however, nothing whatsoever to distinguish this female figure from the countless similar examples given in his work, while the erroneous nature of the identification here is proved by the occurrence of a scourge loaded with lead or iron (plumbata) painted by the side of the orante, indicating her unmistakably as a Christian martyr. This attribute of martyrdom has been unfortunately omitted by Dr. Northcote's draughtsman in his plate, and thus the meaning of the drawing has been unintentionally misrepresented. The dove which we find as an adjunct to some oranti—e. g. one from St. Agnes (Bosio, p. 461)—might be supposed to indicate the Virgin did we not find it in precisely the same combination on the closing slab of ordinary loculi, with the name of the person represented annexed, e. g. Bosio, p. 508, "Constantius Deciae conjugi quae vixit mecum annos xxxiii." Neither are the supporting male figures to the right and left of the orante—usually, and with great probability, identified with St. Peter and St. Paul, whose names are often, especially on the gilded glasses, inscribed above them—altogether infallible marks. One from the catacomb of St. Cyriaca, on the Via Tiburtina, presenting a group of two bearded men with extended arms supporting those of a matron, though almost identical with others referred unquestioningly to the Virgin, did not receive this interpretation from Bosio, who simply describes it as "qualche sagra vergine o matrona" (some holy virgin or matron) (p. 405). We have other analogous examples in Bosio (p. 381), where the supporting figures are young men, running up to a matron, and (p. 389). In fine the result of a careful investigation of the supposed representations of the Virgin as an orante is that so far from "the majority of instances," as stated by Dr. Northcote, bearing an unquestionable reference to the Mother of our Lord, the number where there is no room for doubt as to the subject is exceedingly small.^a

There is no department of early Christian art in which the representations of the Blessed Virgin are more abundant and more unquestionable than the gilded glasses from the catacombs, which it is hardly possible to place later than the first quarter of the 5th century. [GLASS.] But even here the difficulty of accurately distinguishing the ordinary orante from the Blessed Virgin is candidly acknowledged by De' Rossi (Imagines Selectae). While desiring to make the number as large as possible he confesses that it is never possible to assert that the Virgin is the person represented, except when the name "Maria" occurs, or when she is accompanied by St. Peter and St. Paul. Even this last test is not deemed a true one by Garrucci, who remarks (Vetri Ornati, pp. 26, 27) that other perfectly similar examples of a female figure bearing a different name, Peregrina, Agnes, etc., standing between two apostles (particularly a sarcophagus at Saragossa, where "Floria" is the central name) suggest the doubt whether when "Maria" occurs it necessarily indicates the Blessed Virgin. This doubt seems hardly well grounded. The frequency with which the name Agnes occurs on these gilded glasses—Garrucci gives no fewer than fourteen (u. s. tav. xxi. xxii.)—points to the conclusion that it was not any ordinary female bearing that name, but the holy maiden St. Agnes, who was intended. The same argument holds good with still greater cogency for the name Maria, although the entire absence of any conventional attributes forbids absolute certainty on the point. We give two examples from Garrucci (tav. ix. fig. 6, 7) of these gilded glasses. On both we have the Virgin, depicted as an orante supported by the two chief apostles. No. 4 was discovered in the cemetery of St. Agnes. The rolls on either side of the Virgin's head are symbols of the Holy Scriptures. In No. 5, from the Borgian Museum at the Propaganda, it will be observed that the relative positions of St. Peter and St. Paul are reversed. Another gilded glass (Garrucci, tav. ix. fig. 10; Perret, iv. pl. xx.; Aringhi, ii. p. 689) in the Vatican Library, gives a female figure with the name "Maria" above her head, standing alone between two trees with birds resting on pillars by her side. Another (Garrucci, ib. fig. 11) gives the name "Mara" above the female figure. It is doubtful whether this is a mistake for "Maria" or is a distinct name. "Mara" is found in epitaphs given by Boldetti, 482, 547. Some of the glasses present St. Agnes and the Blessed Virgin standing side by side as examples of holy virginity. These glasses supply one example of the

To pass from glasses to monumental slabs. A very curious example, which can hardly be placed later than the 4th century, is found in the crypt of St. Mary Magdalene at St. Maximin in Provence (Martigny, art. Vierge, p. 660; Macarius, Hagioglypta, 36; Le Blant, Inscr. Chrét. de la Gaule, ii. 277; Faillon, Monuments inédits sur l'Apostolat de St. M. Magd. i. p. 775). Here the Virgin is represented alone, unimbed, in the attitude of prayer, with long hair flowing down upon her breast. The inscription, rudely incised on the slab, runs thus, "Maria Virgo Minister de Tempulo Gerosale." There is an evident reference here to the legend recorded in the apocryphal gospels of the Virgin having spent her early years in holy ministrations in the Temple. (Protevangel. Jacobi, § 7, 8; Evang. Pseudo-Matth. § 4-6; Evang. Nativ. Mariæ, § 6, 7.)

The earliest instance of a single figure of the Virgin in mosaic is that in the vault of the tribune of the chapel of St. Venantius at St. John Lateran. This is the work of Byzantine artists under the Greek popes John IV. and Theodore, 640-649. The upper portion of the mosaic gives a medallion bust of Christ supported by two angels, immediately below stands the Virgin with her arms outstretched and the palms expanded, as the central figure, with six of the apostles on either side of her. Both she and they have the same nimbus with Christ and the angels. She is dressed in a dark blue tunic and white veil, with a small cross on her bosom. (Ciampini, ii. p. 107, tab. xxxi.; D'Agincourt, Peintures, xvii. 1.) Similar but rather later mosaic pictures of the Virgin as an orante exist above the altar of the archiepiscopal chapel at Ravenna, saved from the wreck of the former cathedral, and in the Capella Ricca, in the church of St. Mark, Florence, brought from the old church of St Peter, at Rome, dated A.D. 703. There is also at Ravenna, in the church of Sta. Maria in Porto, a bas-relief of the Virgin as an orante (woodcut No. 6), of Greek workmanship, probably of the 6th or 7th century.

Her features are very regular and beautiful, quite of the Greek type. Crosses are embroidered on the wrists, shoulders, and knees of her tunic, and on the borders of the mantle. Her head is veiled and surrounded by a nimbus. The contracted forms of Μήτηρ Θεοῦ are inscribed above on either side.

The condemnation of the Nestorian heresy by the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, gave a powerful impulse to the production of pictures of "the Mother of God," which was never subsequently lost. From this period the Virgin and Infant Christ became the symbol of the orthodox faith, which was represented in every possible way, in paintings and mosaics, in sculpture, and even on garments, personal ornaments, and furniture. There was no attempt to produce a portrait, but simply to portray the ideal Θεοτόκος as a theological symbol. The type adopted was probably not a new one. It has been observed by Mrs. Jameson (Legends of the Madonna) that St. Cyril of Alexandria, who played so important a part in this controversy, and had so much to do in fixing the dogma, must in his episcopal city have become familiar with the Egyptian group of Isis nursing the infant Horus, which may have suggested the analogous Christian subject, even as at an earlier date the Good Shepherd was derived from a classical type. It is just after the council of Ephesus that we meet with the first professedly authentic portrait of the Virgin—an interesting instance of the new demand creating a supply. This is the famous Hodegetria (Ὁδηγήτρια), which was for so many centuries regarded with the deepest reverence by the Greeks, as an imperial palladium, and borne in a superb car or litter to the battle-field when the emperor led the army in person. It had been originally sent from Jerusalem in 438 by the young empress Eudocia as a present to her sister-in-law Pulcheria, and was placed by the latter in the church of the Hodegi, Ὁδηγοί, erected by her. (Niceph. Callist. xiv. 2, xv. 14.) The picture was on panel, ἐνί σανίδι, and was asserted to have been painted from the life by St. Luke. This picture held the first rank among the so-called portraits of the Virgin, and was repeatedly copied as an authentic portrait. The true type is given by D'Agincourt (Peinture, pl. 87), by Garrucci (Arti cristiane primitive, tav. 107, fig. 3, 4), and by Grimouard de Saint-Laurent (Art chrétien, vol. iii. pl. iv. no. 1). It is characterised by the true Byzantine rigidity and flatness. The Virgin is standing, and holds our Lord seated on her left arm, carrying a roll in His left hand and blessing with His right. His nimbus is cruciform; hers a plain circle. The figures are superscribed

MP ΘΥ ΗΟΔΗΓΗΨΙΑ: IC XC. A very diffuse account of this sacred treasure, the veneration paid to it, and its variously reported fortunes, is given by Ducange (Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iv. c. 24, p. 88).^b Another almost equally celebrated portrait of the Virgin belonging to the same epoch is that known as Blachernitissa, from its being preserved in the church built by Pulcheria in the suburb of Constantinople, known as Blachernae. The type, according to Garrucci (u. s. vol. iii. p. 13 ff.), is given on coins of Constantine XII., Monomachus (Sabatier, xlix. 12), and Leo IV. (ib. xlv. 11). She appears with extended arms as an orante. A third famous early Byzantine Virgin is the Θεοτόκος τῆς Πηγῆς, Vergine della Fonte (Garrucci, u. s. No. 2), so called from the miraculous spring Leo the Thracian caused to be included within the church erected by him outside the walls of Constantinople, in honour of the Mother of God, in which it was treasured. (Niceph. Callist. xv. 26; Ducange, Const. Christ. lib. iv. p. 183.) In this she is also represented as an orante, but the Holy Babe is in her lap. The type, according to Garrucci, is given by Garampi (de Numm. Arg. Benedict III. p. 50), and Oderici (Dissert. Acad. Corton. vol. ix. p. 282).

All these pictures and the coins of the Eastern empire exhibit the same hieratic type which established itself in Byzantine art. "This type," writes Dean Milman (Hist. of Christianity, iii. p. 394), "gradually degenerates with the darkness of the age and the decline of art. The countenance sweetly smiling on the child becomes sad and severe. The head is bowed with a gloomy and almost sinister expression, and the countenance gradually darkens till it assumes a black colour. At length even the sentiment of maternal affection is effaced, both the mother and child become stiff and lifeless, the child is swathed in stiff bands, and has an expression of pain rather than of gentleness, or placid infancy."

According to De' Rossi (Imag. Selectae, p. 14) there was no fixed rule for the representation of the Virgin on the coins of the Byzantine emperors, on some of which she is represented with the Holy Babe, sometimes alone, as an orante. On a coin of Leo VI. Philosophus, A.D. 886-911, she stands veiled and draped, with outstretched arms. Her head is noble in character, and is not nimbed. On a coin of Romanus II., A.D. 959-963, she is nimbed and crowns the emperor, an office she is represented as performing almost constantly on the imperial coins of the two next centuries. The earliest coin on which the Virgin and Child appear together is one of John Zimisceus, A.D. 969-976. She holds against her bosom a circular nimbus, within which is the bust of the Infant Christ.^c [MONEY.]

A very characteristic Byzantine picture, placed by Garrucci (u. s. iii. 15, tav. 107) in the first half of the 5th century, is preserved in the church of S. a. Maria Maggiore at Rome. It presents the usual type. The Virgin stands en face, veiled, with the customary cross on the veil. She holds the Infant on her left arm. He has the usual book in His left hand, and blesses with His right. Both have a simple nimbus. For a plate of this celebrated picture see Grimouard de Saint-Laurent (Art chrétien, vol. iii. frontispiece, and Perret, vol. i. frontispiece). See also Milochau, La Vierge de St. Luc à Sainte-Marie-Majeure, Paris, 1862). In the early picture preserved at the church of Ara Coeli, Rome, the child is absent. The Virgin raises her right hand in benediction.

From the obliteration or destruction of Christian mosaics by the picture-hating Mussulmans, mosaic representations of the Virgin are of the extremest rarity in the East. We can, however, refer to one in St. Sophia, of which we give a cut (No. 7) from Salzenberg's great work (Altchristliche Baudenkmale von Constantinopel), taken during the temporary removal of the whitewash from the interior of the mosque. According to a very usual Byzantine type (cf. the fresco from St. Agnes, No. 3) the Holy Child is represented standing in front of His mother, not seated on her lap. The Virgin's face is youthful and characterised by calm beauty. She

^b It is not certain whether there were one or two of these sacred pictures of the Virgin ascribed to St. Luke preserved at Constantinople. Garrucci distinguishes the Virgo Hodegetria from the Virgo Nicopoeia, regarding the latter, which he asserts was revered from the time of Justinian, as the national palladium captured by the Venetians in A.D. 1204, and according to him still preserved at St. Mark's. Ducange (p. 89) refers to the difficulty without pretending to settle it. If, he says, it is true that the Hodegetria was preserved at Constantinople till the final fall of the city in 1453 it is evident that the picture taken by Dandolo must have been a different one; unless indeed, it may be added, by a pious fraud a copy was substituted for the original to satisfy the demands of devotees. A further uncertainty arises as to the place where the holy picture, whichever it was, that was captured, was deposited. A letter of Baldwin shews that it was promised by him to the monks of Cîteaux. "If," writes Gibbon (ch. lx.), "the banner of the Virgin shewn at Venice as a trophy and relic is genuine, the pious doge must have cheated the monks of Cîteaux." (Cf. Grimouard de Saint-Laurent, Art chrétien, vi. 377.)

is supported by St. Paul and St. John the Baptist on either hand. This beautiful mosaic may be safely ascribed to the original erection of the church by Justinian in the 6th century. The cupola of the church of St. Sophia, at Salonica (Thessalonica), ascribed by M. Texier to the same date as its namesake at Constantinople, i.e. the middle of the 6th century, contains a mosaic of the Ascension, the Blessed Virgin and the Apostles being ranged round the base of the hemisphere. She alone is nimbed, and wears the conventional veil and purple dress.^d In the semidome of the apse she is also represented, holding the infant Saviour (Texier, Églises byzantines, pp. 142–144, pl. xl.). A medallion portrait of the Virgin in a blue veil and robe, with her hands outstretched in prayer to the enthroned figure of Christ, which occurs over the royal door in the narthex of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, belongs to the time of Constantine Pogonatus, 668–685. This mosaic is very inferior to the former both in design and execution.

The earliest mosaic picture of the Virgin in the West is, as we have said, that in the chapel of St. Venantius at the Lateran, which may be placed about A.D. 642. She is entirely absent from the early mosaics of St. Maria Maggiore (c. A.D. 433), except in the historical scenes of the Annunciation, Presentation in the Temple, Adoration of the Magi and Christ among the Doctors, as well as from those which decorated the basilica of St. Paul's-without-the-Walls before its destruction by fire; she is not anywhere represented in the mosaics of the 5th century at Ravenna, except as a member of the Magi group; nor does she appear in those of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, c. A.D. 530, or St. Lawrence, c. A.D. 578, in Rome. Indeed the absence of representations of the Virgin in the earlier Roman churches is remarkable. The earliest example in which we find her occupying the position of chief dignity, formerly reserved for our Blessed Lord, in the centre of the conch of the apse, and exchanging her primitive attitude of prayer and adoration for that of a throned queen, is the mosaic of the apse of the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria, the work of bishop Euphrasius, A.D. 535–543. She is throned and nimbed, and supported by angels, holding her Son in her lap, rather as a diminutive man than as an infant (Neale, Notes on Dalmatia, frontispiece, pp. 79, 80; Eitelberger, Kunstdenkmale des österreichischen Kaiserstaates, Heft 4, 5; Lohde, Der Dom von Parenzo). The church of St. Maria de Navicella, or in Domnica, built by Paschal I., c. A.D. 820, is the first in Rome, in which this new type is found. The vault of the apse is here occupied by a colossal figure of the Virgin in a blue robe sprinkled with crosses, seated on a golden and jewelled throne, surrounded by a throng of angels and archangels in attitudes of adoring praise. Christ is seated on His Mother's lap in a golden robe, as at Parenzo, rather as a dwarfed man than as an infant, and blesses with His right hand. The builder, pope Paschal, distinguished by the square nimbus as being alive at the time of the execution of the work, kneeling humbly holds the Virgin's right foot to kiss it. The whole composition is coarse and tasteless without shadow, or any attempt at grouping, but the general effect is imposing. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 140 sq., pl. xlv.; D'Agincourt, Peintures, pl. xvii. fig. 15; Vitet, Histoire de l'Art, vol. i. p. 255.) In the mosaics of the church of St. Cecilia, the work of the same pope, we see another significant advance in the cultus of the Virgin. The face of the Arch of Triumph is here richly decorated with mosaics, recalling the design of several of the earlier works. Below are ranged the four-and-twenty elders in their white robes, offering their crowns in adoration. Above, ten crowned virgins between palm-trees advance with their offerings; an angel stands on either side of the central compartment. But that compartment is not occupied, as in earlier times, by Christ, or by the Holy Lamb, but by a crowned and throned figure of the Virgin bearing the Child Jesus on her knees. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 153, cxxvii. tab. 50; D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xvii. no. 14; Wharton Marriott, Testimony of the Catacombs, p. 49.) We have a similar representation of the Virgin crowned and enthroned as Queen of Heaven in the vault of the apse of St. Francesca Romana (originally St. Maria Antiqua), rebuilt by pope Leo IV., and decorated with mosaics by pope Nicholas I., A.D. 858–868 (Ciampini, ii. p. 162, c. xxviii. tab. 53), and in the cathedral of Capua, constructed by bishop Ugo at the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century, of which we give a woodcut (Ciampini, ii. p. 165, c. xxix. tab. liv.). It took three centuries more to reach the climax we see in the mosaics of the church of Sta. Maria in Trastevere, where we find the Virgin seated on the same throne with her Son, and on His right side. He lays His right hand on His Mother's shoulder, and in His left is a book inscribed with the words "Veni electa Mea, et ponam in te thronum Meum." But the date of this is far beyond our limits, A.D. 1130-1143, and with this our notices of the pictorial representations of the Blessed Virgin Mary must conclude.

MASS. [MISSA.]

MASSA CANDIDA. In the persecutions under Valerius it is said that 300 Christians in the district of Carthage who refused to sacrifice to the emperor were compelled to leap into a burning lime-kiln, where they were suffocated. This body of Christians was called Massa Candida, the White, or Bright, Mass (Prudentius, Peristeph. v. 87; Sidonius, Epit. vi. i.). Augustine (Sermo 311 [al. 115]) calls it the White Mass of Ulica, because (according to Baronius) these martyrs were specially commemorated at that place, and (Sermo 306 [al. 112], c. 2) refers the epithet "candida" to the brightness of the cause for which the martyrs suffered. Compare Enarr. in Ps. 49, c. 9; Ps. 144, c. 16. The Carthaginian calendar places their commemoration in August, and most later martyrologies Aug. 24. The Mart. Rom. Vet. has on that day simply "Massae Candidae Carthagini." Usuard and Ado give the number as 300, and the latter adds some particulars. The Hieronymian Martyrology has this festival on Aug. 18. [C.]

MATHANA. [MARTHA, (6).]

MATHEMATICUS, an astrologer. The name was assumed and popularly conceded from the first century downwards, as masters of legerdemain are now sometimes called "professors." It is employed by Juvenal (vi. 562; xiv. 248, Nota mathematicis genesis tua), by Tacitus (Hist. i. 22), both about 100, and by their contemporary Suetonius (Tiber. 14). The last named uses "mathematica" of the art itself: "Circa deos et religiones negligentior, quippe addictus mathematicae" (ibid. 69). Similarly Sextus Empiricus, about 220: "De astrologia aut mathematica" (Adv. Mathem. 21). Aulus Gellius, probably about 160, after explaining the true meaning of the word, viz. one devoted to the study of the arts and sciences, proceeds to say, "But the vulgar call those mathematici whom they ought to call by a name of nation Chaldeans" (Noct. Att. i. 9). Elsewhere he speaks of those who "call themselves Chaldeans and genethliaci [see ASTROLOGERS; GENETHLIACI], and profess themselves able to declare the future from the motion of the stars" (xiv. 1). But though Gellius and several others say expressly that the name was given to astrologers by the vulgar, it is evident from others that they affected it themselves. Thus Sextus Empiricus (u. s.): "Genealogia, which the Chaldeans decorating with magnificent names call themselves mathematici and astrologers." Firmicus (about 360), who wrote on judicial astrology under the name of Mathesis (comp. Tertullian, de Idol. 91; Prudentius, c. Synmachum, ii. p. 296, ed. 1596; etc.), claims the title for his fraternity. See Mathes. i. praef. and c. 2.

Among Christian writers, St. Augustine speaks of those "who were called genethliaci, because of their observation of days of birth, but are now commonly (vulgo) called mathematici" (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 21, § 32). "The ancients," he says, with Gellius, "did not call those men mathematici who are now so termed" (De Divers. Quaest. xlv. 2). Yet he used the word freely in the later sense, probably because it was better understood than astrologi, etc. See De Gen. ad Litt. ii. 17, § 36; De Civ. Dei. v. 1, etc.). This popular use of the term is also insisted on by St. Jerome: "Among the Chaldeans I think that they are called γενεθλιαλόγοι, whom the vulgar call mathematici" (Comment. in Dan. ii. 2). Again: "The Astrologers of the sky (Sept. Isai. xlvii. 13), who are commonly called Mathematici, and believe the affairs of men to be controlled by the course and falling of the stars" (Comm. in Isai. u. s. lib. xiii.). Quite in accordance with these authorities, Ammianus, probably a heathen, about 380, says of Heliodorus, whom he had described (Hist. xxix. 1) as "fatorum per genituras interpretem," that he was "mathematicus ut memorat vulgus" (ibid. 2).

The council of Laodicea, however, about 365, appears to distinguish between astrologi and mathematici, when it forbids persons in orders to be "magi or enchanters, or mathematici or astrologers" (can. 36). Balsamon explains here that "the mathematici are those who think that the heavenly bodies have dominion over the universe, and that all our affairs are regulated by their motion;" while "astrologers are persons who with the aid of demons divine by the stars and believe them" (Comm. in can.). Of the four μαθηματα, Arithmetic, Music, Geometry, Astronomy, he therefore thought the last only to be forbidden; but Zonaras (Comm. in can.) was of opinion that the canon only forbids excessive addiction to any of them. From their comments we may infer that the bad conventional sense of the word was better known to the Latins than to the Greeks.

Mathematici are condemned by name without explanation in laws of Constantius of the years 357, 358 (Codec. Theodos. ix. 16; de Malef. 4, 6), of Valens, 370 (ibid. 8), and of Honorius, 409 (ibid. 12). The last consigned them to perpetual banishment, unless they burned their books before the bishop and made a profession of Christianity. Comp. Ammianus (Hist. xxix. 1, 2), who relates the burning of numberless books under Valens, 371, on the pretence that they were "illiciti," and of whole libraries burnt by their owners in the panic caused by the persecution.

From the opinion that astrologers were in league with demons there arose at a later period the belief that the "mathematici," identified with them, practised the black art in every form. Thus, in a very ancient penitential preserved at Fleury: "If any one has been a mathematicus, i. e. has invoked a demon, and taken away the minds of men or driven them mad, let him suffer penance five years," etc. (c. 33; Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. i. vi. vii. 5); in another: "If any one be a mathematicus, i. e. has taken away the mind of a person through invocation of demons, let him," etc. (Poenitentiale Rom. in Morin, de Poenit. App. 566. See also Cigheri, Eccl. Dogm. x. 223, 7.) [W. E. S.]

MATINS (Matutina oratio, solemnitas; Matutinum officium; Matutinae Laudes), the office anciently said at dawn of day, before sunrise; the nocturnal office being so arranged that the lauds, which formed part of it, should be said at this time. There is an interesting indication of the nature of this office in Gregory of Tours' account of the death of St. Gall: "At ille psalmo quinquagesimo et benedictione decantata et alleluatico cum capitulo expleto consummavit officium totum temporis matutini." That is, he said, the 50th (51st A.V.) Psalm, the Benedicite (often known as Benedictio), the 148th with the two following (alleluatic) Psalms, and the Capitulum. MATISCONE NSIA CONCILIA. [Mâcon, COUNCILS OF.]

MATRICULA. A catalogue or index. In ecclesiastical writers the word means:

1. The roll of the clergy belonging to any church. The fourth council of Carthage (Codec. Afric. c. 86) speaks of the roll (matricula et archivus) of the African church, containing the dates of the ordinations of the bishops, by which their precedence was determined, copies of which were to be kept by the primate and in the metropolis. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 2), orders that contumacious clergy on repentance shall have their names replaced on the "matricula," and so be restored to their grades and offices. The fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541 (c. 13), claims certain privileges as belonging to all the clergy whose names are inserted in the "matricula."

2. The poor who received stipends from the revenues of the church. The widows who received allowances were sometimes called "matriculae." Gregory the Great (Ep. ii. 45) speaks of a widow "de matriculis" who had been severely beaten for some fault. [MATRICULARII.] Hence Matricula came to mean the fund from which the stipends were paid; as when it is said that vows must be paid either directly to the poor or to the Matricula (Conc. Autissiod. Auxerre, c. 3).

3. The house in which the poor were lodged, often built at the door of the church, and with revenues attached to it. St. Remigius of Rheims in his will (Flodoard, Hist. Rem. i. 18) leaves certain funds for the maintenance of twelve poor persons, living in the "matricula" and waiting at the church doors for their allowance ("ante fores expectantes stipem"); and, in another part of the same will, mentions the guest-houses and "all the matriculae." Ducange (Gloss.), quoting from a tabulary of the church of Autun, speaks of a "matricula" built at the door of the church of St. Nazarius. Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. ii. 37) speaks of feeding the poor belonging to the "matricula" of a certain church, and (Hist. Franc. c. 11) of the poor belonging to a matricula close in front of a church. Adrevaldus (de Mirac. S. Benedicti, i. 20) speaks of a matricula as among the property of the church of Orleans. King Dagobert I. is said to have founded a matricula and xenodochium for the poor of either sex, especially for those who, having been thought worthy to be restored to health by the grace of the saints, wished to remain there in the service of the church (Gesta Dagoberti, c. 29; Migne, Patrol. tom. xcvi. 195).

4. For Matricula in another sense see MOTHER CHURCH.

MATRICULARII. The poor who were borne on the matricula or roll of the church. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vii. 29) speaks of the matricularii and other poor. Aldhelm (de Laud. Virgin. c. 51) relates that certain women gave their necklaces and other ornaments to the maimed and the matricularii. Hincmar of Rheims (Capitul. de Reb. Mag. c. 17) enjoins that matricularii should be fittingly selected, not swineherds nor herdsmen, but from among the sick and poor; and, according to Flodoard (Hist. Rem. vii. 26), complained that the matricularii had been driven away from the matricula which he had founded, and the house itself sold for the price of an ass. Again (Capit. dot. in Synod. Rem. c. 2), he forbade presbyters to exact any kind of service at harvest or any other time from the matricularii in return for their place in the matricula, and orders that they should receive as their stipend the allotted portion of the tithes which believers paid as fine or weregeld for their crimes. In the Gesta Dagoberti (c. 34) a mediety of certain revenues is left to the matricularii and those who served the church, and (c. 42) certain sums of money are left to the matricularii belonging to the church of the Blessed Martyrs. Isidorus Mercator, in his note on the eleventh canon of the Council of Laodicea (Bruns, Canones, i. 74) says that the women whom the Greeks called presbyterae were among the Latins called matriculariae, as maintained by the church. Certain definite rules appear in later years to have been made for their direction, probably differing in different churches. Chrodegang (Regula Metensis, last chapter) says that in the church of Metz the matricularii were made to come to church twice a month in the early morning, and remain there till the bell sounded for the third hour, when the bishop, if at leisure, was to come to them, and cause them to read edifying books. If the bishop did not attend, then the presbyter who was "custos" of the church of St. Stephen was to teach them, and to hear their confessions twice a year. On these conditions they were to receive a certain allowance of food. Those who refused to comply with these regulations were ejected from the matricula. Each matricula was to have a primicerius, whose duty was to exercise a general supervision over the inhabitants, and to whom, or to the archdeacon, was entrusted the distribution of the food. In later years distinct duties appear to have been allotted to them. A History of the Church of Autun (in Labbe's Nova Bibliotheca MS. Librorum, vol. i. p. 487), says that it was the duty of the sacerist to provide one matricularius in holy orders, and others who should be able to ring the bells and perform other duties connected with the church. The bishop was also to institute three matricularii, one of whom was to be in holy orders and serve the altar of the Holy Cross in the church. To that office was assigned as a stipend half the revenues of that altar for ever and a hundred pieces of gold. The two others were to be laymen, and had also certain revenues allotted to them. MATTHEW, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of the history and labours of St. Matthew, as of so many of the apostles, but little is known beyond the brief notices of him in the New Testament. The question as to his identity with Levi falls within the province of the Bible Dictionary, and we shall therefore not dwell on it here; and for the history and special characteristics of his gospel, and for the question as to its original language, reference may be made to the article in that Dictionary.

We may here, however, allude briefly to some points of tradition respecting him. As regards the scene of his labours, Eusebius tells us that he first preached to his Hebrew fellow-countrymen and then went to other nations (Hist. Eccles. iii. 24). Eusebius merely gives the locality generally as ἐφ' ἑτέροις. The region, however, is by Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i. 19) styled Ethiopia, whatever that term may be supposed to mean. Some light may be thrown upon it by noticing that the Ethiopia of St. Matthias was in western Asia, in the neighbourhood of Colchis, with which agree generally the notices of martyrologies mentioned below, which place the apostle's death in Persia (cf. also Ambrose, Enarr. in Psal. xlv. 10; Patrol. xiv. 1198). The Mart. Hieronymi gives in its prologue, "in Ethiopia, civitate Thartium," and on September 21, "in Persida (sic), civitate Tarrium." Paulinus of Nola speaks of Parthia as the scene of St. Matthew's labours (Poema xix. 81, where see Muratori's note; Patrol. lxi. 514), and Venantius Fortunatus (Poemata, lib. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270) specifies the name of the town, "Matthaeum eximium Naddaver alta virum." This place is mentioned by the Pseudo-Abdias (Vita S. Matth.) as in Ethiopia, probably used in a very vague way. On the other hand, Isidore (de ortu et obitu Patrum, c. 76; Patrol. lxxxiii. 153) says that St. Matthew, after preaching in Judaea, went into Macedonia, and at last died "in montibus Parthorum."

It cannot be definitely said whether St. Matthew suffered a martyr's death. Clement of Alexandria, quoting Heracleon the Gnostic, seems to acquiesce in the statement that he died a natural death (Strom. vi. 9). Later writers generally take the other view, in accordance with the natural tendency to amplify. Not to allude at present to the martyrologies, we find Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. ii. 41) describing the work, sufferings, and death of St. Matthew in Myrmene, the city of the Anthropophagi. We meet with this also in the Apocryphal Acts, to which we shall again refer. One other tradition about St. Matthew may be mentioned here, which we are told by Clement of Alexandria (Paedog. ii. 1), that the apostle abstained altogether from flesh, and lived on berries, fruits, and herbs.

We need not do more than allude in the most passing way to the story of the translation of the body of St. Matthew to Brittany (where it was conveyed from Ethiopia in the 9th century!), and thence, at the expense of a startling anachronism, to Lucania by the emperor Valentinian. In or about the year A.D. 954, it was removed to Salerno (Leo Ostiensis, in Acta Sanctorum, infra), where May 6 is observed as the commemoration of the translation. Strangely enough, a second finding at Salerno is recorded in the time of Gregory VII. about A.D. 1080.

When a festival of St. Matthew first arose, distinct from the collective festival of all the apostles, it is impossible to say definitely, but it is certainly late. It is absent from many forms of Western liturgies, which we shall mention below, and it would appear that there are scarcely any sermons or homilies found for this day, even in writers of the 9th and 10th centuries, among the few being one by Nicetas Paphlago (Combefis, Auctarium, p. 401). The day specially associated with St. Matthew in the Western church is September 21. This festival, however, is wanting in the Leonine, Gelasian, and Gallican liturgies, and in the Orationale Gothicum. It is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary in the edition of Menard (col. 130), but is obelised as doubtful in that of Pamelius, and omitted in that of Muratori. Menard's edition also gives a mass for the vigil, but it cannot be doubted that both masses are a later addition. Menard himself remarks (not. in loc.) that both masses, especially that for the vigil, are wanting in some of the best MSS. On the other hand, the festival is recognised in the Ambrosian Liturgy, as we now have it (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 423), and in the Mozarabic Liturgy and Breviary (Patrol. lxxxv. 861, lxxxvi. 1205). We also find it in the Latin martyrologies generally, as in the Mart. Hieronymi, Romanum, Bede, Ado, Usuard, and Notker. The notice in the metrical mar-tyrology of Bede is, "Undecimas capit at Matthaeus doctor amoenus" (Patrol. xciv. 605); that of Wandalbert (Patrol. cxxi. 611):—

"Deseruit Christo mundi qui lucra vocante Undecimum Matthaeus evangelico ore sacravit."

Besides, however, the commemoration on September 21, the Mart. Hieronymi, as edited by D'Achery (Spicilegium, vol. iv. pp. 617 sqq.), gives the name of St. Matthew several times. Thus we have on May 1, "Nat. Matthaei et Jacobi;" on May 6, "In Persida, nat. S. Matthaei apostoli et evangelistae;" on May 21,^a "S. Matthaei apostoli;" on September 21 (supra); and on October 7, "Nat. S. Matthaei evangelistae." What these multiplied commemorations mean, it is very hard to say; possibly they point to the conclusion that we have here a collection of various partial and local commemorations. It may be noted here that the Cdd. Hagenoyensis and Vaticanus, cited by Soller among the various auctaria to Usuard's Martyrology, associate May 6 with the traditional translation of the apostle's body to Salerno (Patrol. cxxiv. 29). With this statement, however, though found in Baronius's Mart. Rom., we need not concern ourselves, for the alleged date of this translation is, as we have seen, very late.

The calendars of the Greek and Russian Churches commemorate St. Matthew on November 16 (Neale, Eastern Church; Int. p. 784). The notice for this day in the Greek metrical calendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. liii.) is, ἀκάματον μαρθαῖον πῦρ δεκάτη κτάνεν ἑκτη. The Ethiopic and Egyptian calendars published by Ludolf put the festival of St. Matthew on October 9 (Comm. ad Hist. Aeth. p. 394). The same is also the case in the Egyptian calendars published by Selden (de Synedriis veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 212, 222, ed. Amsterdam, 1679), one of which also gives another commemoration on August 30 (ib. p. 210). Ludolf's Egyptian calendar has also a commemoration of St. Matthew on November 16 (p. 394); and in the list of commemorations of saints in the Armenian Church this last day is associated with St. Matthew (Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 648).

As regards the pseudonymous literature attributed to St. Matthew, we may mention (1) the apocryphal Latin gospel of Matthew, on the birth of the Virgin and the infancy of the Saviour, edited in part by Thilo, and fully by Tischendorf (Evangelia Apocrypha, pp. xxv, 50). A majority of the MSS. of this gospel prefix two letters, according to which it is a translation by Jerome from the Hebrew. It is on the authority of this preface that the gospel is referred to St. Matthew. It is impossible to say whether we are to connect this with the reference made by Innocent I. (Epist. vi. ad Exuperium Tolosanum, c. 7; Patrol. xx. 502) to sundry apocryphal writings professing to be due to some of the apostles, among them perhaps being Matthew. The reading, however, varies between Matthew and Matthias,^b the latter being apparently to be preferred. (2) The acts of Andrew and Matthew [Greek] in the city of the Anthropophagi, first published separately by Thilo and since by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. xlvii, 132). Here, as in the previous case, it is very doubtful whether we are to read Matthew or Matthias. Tischendorf, following his oldest Greek MS., gives Matthias; but the other Greek MSS. and the Latin give Matthew; so also do the Syriac acts, published by Dr. Wright [MATTHIAS]. (3) We have also another book of the acts and martyrdom of St. Matthew, first published by Tischendorf (op. cit. pp. lx, 167); the passage we have already cited from Nicephorus gives an account closely resembling that of these acts. (4) There is extant a Syro-Jacobite liturgy, bearing the name of Matthew, a Latin translation of which is given by Fabricius (Codex Pseudepigr. N. T. iii. 211 sqq.) and Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. Collectio, ii. 346, ed. 1847). By a curious carelessness, some have spoken of this liturgy as associated with the name of the apostle, the professed name of the author being really "Matthew the Shepherd," and the date of its composition being probably the end of the 11th century (Neale, op. cit. p. 330).^c (5) Lastly, with the name of Matthew is associated the regulation for the ecclesiastical order of readers, given in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 22). [R. S.]

^a This only occurs in some MSS.; the Cdd. Corbeiensis, Epternacensis (Acta Sanctorum, September, vol. vi. p. 194).

^b This statement as to the various reading is given on the authority of Tischendorf (op. cit. p. xxvi.).

MATTHIAS, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of this apostle the New Testament tells us nothing beyond the fact of his election to fill the place of the traitor Judas, and that previously he had been a follower of our Lord throughout the whole of his ministry. Nor is there any great amount of trustworthy tradition concerning him. It is indeed asserted that he was one of the seventy disciples, and this is by no means improbable. (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 12; Sophronius, in the Appendix to Jerome de Viris Illust. [vol. ii. 958, ed. Vallarsi]; Epiphanius, i. 20; Dorotheus, Synopsis [in Magn. Bibl. Patr. iii. 148, ed. 1618]; Rabanus Maurus, infra.)

According to Isidore (de Vita et Obitu Patrum, c. 79; Patrol. lxxiii. 153), Judaea was the scene of St. Matthias's labours. The same statement also is generally found in the Latin martyrologies (see e.g. those of Bede [Patrol. xciv. 848], Rabanus Maurus [ib. cx. 1133], Usuard [ib. cxxiii. 791], and Notker [ib. cxxxi. 1048]). The general tenour of the language of the above would seem to imply that the apostle died a natural death.

Other witnesses, again, speak of St. Matthias as labouring in Ethiopia (Sophronius, l. c.; Dorotheus, l. c.; Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. ii. 40; see also the Martyrology of Sirletus in Canisius, Thesaurus, iii. 456). We must assume, however, that we have here an exceptional use of the word Ethiopia, for the locality is further defined (see e.g. Sophronius, l. c.; Dorotheus, l. c.) as being by the mouth of the Apsarus (which flows into the Euxine), and the haven of Hyssus, which would identify the country with Cappadocia. Here he died and was buried (ἕως τῆς σήμερον, Sophronius), the more minute statement being given by Dorotheus that he died in Sebastopolis, and was buried there near the temple of the sun. It may be noted here that the Ethiopia is differently named by the above writers; Sophronius speaks of ἡ δευτέρα Αἰθιοπία, Nicephorus of ἡ πρώτη Αἰθ., and the Menaea of ἡ ἕξω Αἰθ.

It is uncertain when a festival of St. Matthias first came to be celebrated. It does not occur in the Gelasian Sacramentary, or in the Comes Hieronymi, but is found in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary (col. 29, ed. Menard), under the heading Natalis S. Matthiae Apostoli, and is doubtlessly to be viewed as one of the later additions to this sacramentary.^a The Hispano-Gothic calendar does not give the festival, but we find it in the Mozarabic Missal and Breviary. The day associated with St. Matthias in the Western church is February 24, and his festival on that day is recognised in most Western martyrologies and calendars (see e.g. in addition to those specified above, the Mart. Hieronymi [Patrol. xxx. 445], the Mart. Rom. Vet., and the St. Gall MS. of the Mart. Gellonense [D'Achery, Spicilegium, xiii. 422]). Henschenius, however (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. iii. 436), mentions an ancient MS. Mart. Hieronymi, which omits the festival altogether.

In consequence of February 24 having been chosen as the day for the festival, it followed that in leap-years it would fall on February 25.^b The reason of this is, that a day was intercalated in such years, so that the "vi. Kal. Mart." came twice over, whence the name bissextile. Thus in a leap-year, the real "vi. Kal. Mart." would be February 25, the preceding day being viewed as the supernumerary one.^c

It may be noted that in one MS. of the Mart. Hieronymi (the Cod. Lucensis), May 21 is marked "alibi Matthiae apostoli." As all other MSS., however, read Matthaeci, this must be viewed as evidently a mistake (Patrol. cxxiii. 791).

In the calendar of the Greek Church, the festival of St. Matthias falls on August 9.^d The notice for this day in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxxix.), is ἡρῶν ἀμφ' ἐνάρτῃ ξύλας ἰούθεος Μαρθίας. The epistle and gospel in the Greek Church are Acts i. 12-17, 21-26, and Luke x. 16-21. The Ethiopic calen-

^a Some writers have appealed to the calendar of Athelstan's Psalter as proving that the festival of St. Matthias existed in England by A.D. 703. It has been shewn, however, by Heurtley (Harmonia Symbolica, pp. 74 sqq.) that this calendar is, in all probability, to be referred to the period A.D. 901-1003.

^b A curious instance is mentioned by Southey (The Doctor, c. 90), in which the emperor Maximilian failed in an enterprise against Bruges through forgetfulness of this fact. Southey himself, however, would seem not to have been aware of the true explanation.

^c In the English Prayer Books of 1549, 1552, 1559, it is ruled that on Feb. 25, which in leap-years counts as two days, the same Psalms and Lessons shall serve for the two days. The Calendar of 1561, followed by the Prayer-Book of 1604, reverts to the old plan, and so the Psalms and Lessons of the 23rd are read again the following day, except this latter be Sunday. In 1662, the intercalated day was taken as the 29th, according to the present plan.

^d In the Menology of Cardinal Sirletus, already referred to, the name of St. Matthias occurs at the end of the entry for Aug. 8, which is doubtless due to a mere error of the transcriber, who should have put it at the head of the following day.

^e Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1, 637) mentions a MS. of this Liturgy in the Vatican, at the end of which it is styled the "Liturgy of Matthew the Shepherd, who is called Hermas, one of the Seventy."

dar published by Ludolf (Comm. ad Hist. Aeth. p. 410) fixes the festival on March 4 [Magabit 8].

A certain amount of pseudonymous literature is associated with the name of this apostle. An apocryphal gospel under the name of Matthias is mentioned by Origen (Hom. i. in Luc. vol. v. 87, ed. Lommatzsch) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25); and in the acts of a council held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius (A.D. 494), we find "Evangelium (al. Evangelia) nomine Matthiae apocryphum" (Petrol. lix. 162, 175). This may, perhaps, be the same as the παράδοσεις of St. Matthias referred to several times by Clement of Alexandria. From him it would appear that the work was written in the interests of some Gnostic sect, for he speaks of the followers of Valentinus, Marcion, and Basilides, boasting that they quoted the opinion of Matthias (Strom. vii. 17). Clement several times quotes this book (Strom. ii. 9, iii. 4, vii. 13).^e Besides this, there are apocryphal acts of Andrew and Matthias, published by Thilo in a separate form, and also by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. xlvii, 132). Thilo refers the origin to Leucius, and speaks of the book as used specially by the Gnostics and Manichaeans. It should be added, however, that it seems very doubtful whether we should read the name Matthias or Matthew. Tischendorf, following the oldest Greek MS., gives Matthias, but the other Greek MSS. and the Latin give Matthew. So also do the Syriac acts recently published by Dr. Wright. We may add here that Innocent I. (Epist. ad Exuperium Tolosanum; Labbe, ii. 1256) condemns sundry writings ascribed to Matthias and other apostles, but referred by him to Leucius. Besides these, we have Acts of St. Matthias extant in Latin, professing to be translated from the Hebrew by a monk of Treves, it would seem in the 12th century (Acta Sanct. supra, p. 447). Finally, the name of St. Matthias^f is connected in the Apostolic Constitutions with the regulations as to the blessing of oil and wine, and firstfruits and tithes (Apost. Const. viii. 28 sqq.). MAUNDY THURSDAY (Dies Mandati), the Thursday in Holy Week, the day of the institution of the Last Supper and of our Lord's betrayal, so called with reference to the antiphon "Mandatum novum do vobis, ut diligatis invicem" (Joh. xiii. 34) appropriated to it. The name, which is not a very early one, probably contains also an allusion to the other command of our Lord in the same chapter (Joh. xiii. 14-16), as well as to the τοῦτο ποιεῖτε of Luke xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 24. The collect at the giving of the Kiss of Peace in the Gothic missal (Muratori, Liturg. Roman. Vetus, ii. 578) speaks of "commands" in the plural "inter praecepta mandatorum tuorum Patribus nostris Apostolis reliquisti." In later times "Mandatum" by itself stood for the "Footwashing," which had been instituted on this day, and even for the apartment in a monastery appropriated to it (Ducange, sub voc.). Other names for this day are ἡ μεγάλη πέμπτη, ἡ ἁγία πέντας, feria quinta paschae; also, as the day of the institution of the Eucharist, Coena Domini, dies coenae Domini, feria quinta in coena Domini, dies natalis Eucharistiae, natalis calicis, dies panis, lucis, mysteriorum; also, with reference to the other ceremonials belonging to the day, dies competitionis, dies indulgentiae, dies pediluvii. The more recent title, dies viridum, to which the German name Gründonnerstag corresponds, is of uncertain origin. The references to a supposed introit (Ps. xxiii. 2), and to our Lord's words (Luke xxiii. 31), are purely conjectural (Herzog, Real-Encycl. xviii. 223; Augusti, Christ. Archäol. i. 549).

The ceremonials specially belonging to Maundy Thursday which call for notice are those relating to the candidates for Baptism, the Reconciliation of Penitents, the Consecration of the Chrism, and the Administration of the Eucharist.

(a) Catechumens.—In some churches the reditio symboli took place this day; i.e. the catechumens were required to repeat the creed which had been given them by the bishop and presbyters to learn by heart (reditio symboli). We find this ceremony fixed for Maundy Thursday in the canons of Laodicea (can. 46; Labbe, i. 1504), and in the "capitula" of Martin, bishop of Braga (cap. 49; ib. v. 911), and in the canons of the Quinisext or Trullan council (can. 78; ib. vi. 1175). The more usual time for this repetition was Easter-even (Martene, de Rit. Ant. Eccl. i. 116, lib. i. c. i. art. 13, § 2). The pediluvium or washing of the feet of the catechumens, of which some traces appear in the ritual of the early church, was in some cases performed on this day, the washing of the head, capitiluvium, having taken place on Palm Sunday. There is a reference to this ceremony in two letters of Augustine to Januarius (Epist. cxviii. cxix. c. 18); but in the former he speaks of the custom of the catechumens bathing the whole body and not only of washing the feet on this day, and that merely for purposes of cleanliness "quia baptizandorum corpora per observationem quadragesimae sordidata cum offensione sensus ad fontem tractarentur, nisi aliquo die lavarentur. Istum autem diem potius ad hoc electum quo coena Domini anniversarie celebratur," and adds that this liberty being granted to the catechumens, many others claimed it also, and bathed with them on this day—a luxury forbidden during Lent. In the second letter he makes particcular mention of washing the feet of the catechumens on the day when our Lord gave this lesson of humility "quo ipsa commendatio religiosius inhaereret," but adds that lest it should appear to be in any way essential to the sacrament many churches had never admitted the custom at all; others had discontinued it, while some had postponed it till a later day. Although this custom was never received by the church of Rome (Ambros. de Sacram. iii. 1), it prevailed for a time widely among other churches, as those of Gaul, Milan, and Spain, but it soon fell out of favour, and was expressly prohibited by the canons of the council of Elvira, A.D. 306 (can. 48; Labbe, i. 976), which prohibition passed into the "Corpus Juris canonici" (c. civ. causa i. q. 1, lib. i. c. i. art. 13, § 1; Bingham, bk. xii. c. iv. § 10; Herzog, vol. iv. p. 630; Martene, tom. i. pp. 116, 141). BAPTISM, vol. i. p. 164.

(b) Reconciliation of Penitents.—At a very early time Maundy Thursday was appointed as the day for the public absolution of penitents. The letter of Innocent I. to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium (c. 7) (if indeed it is rightly given to him and is not to be assigned to a later period) states that the custom of the Church of Rome was to grant absolution either of venial or mortal sins only, "quinta feria ante Pascha," unless the penitent was attacked by severe sickness (Labbe, ii. 1247). St. Ambrose, writing to his sister Marcellina, names this day as the usual one for the relaxation of penance, "erat dies quo Dominus sese pro nobis tradidit, quo in ecclesia poenitentialia relaxantur" (Epist. 33 ad Marcellin. cf. Hexameron, lib. v. c. 25), and St. Jerome speaks of Fabiola as standing in public penance on this day, "quis hoc crederet . . . ut tota urbe spectante Romana ante diem paschae staret in ordine poenitentium?" (Hieron. Epist. 30, Epitaph. Fabiol.). The same custom is evidenced by the various homilies, "ad reconciliandos poenitentes," delivered "in Coena Domini," referred to by Martene (Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. cap. vi. art. 5, § 10, tom. ii. p. 31; tom. i. p. 284). A letter of Gilbert "Lunicensis Episcopus," contained in Ussher's Epistolae Hibernicae (Ep. 30, p. 86), states the custom of the Irish church to be that venial sins were absolved "in capite jejunii," mortal sins "in Coena Domini." The penitents first assembled outside the church doors, where they heard a sermon from the bishop; they were then admitted into the church and heard the "missa pro reconciliatione poenitentium," absolution being granted them before the offertory. In the "Ordo agentibus publicam poenitentiam," assigned in the Sacramentary of Gelasius to this day, the deacon pleads the cause of the penitents, which, after certain collects, is followed by the "ordo ad reconciliandum poenitentem," and the "oratio post reconciliationem" when the penitent has communicated (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 548-551).

(c) Consecration of Chrism.—The sacred oil being needed in large quantities for the anointing of the newly-baptized at Easter, it naturally became the custom to consecrate it shortly before that festival. Gradually the consecration was limited to one day, and by the 5th century it had become the rule that the whole of the chrism that was required for the use of the year should be consecrated on Maundy Thursday. In the Comes Hieronymi we find under this day "Chrisma conficetur," and in the sacramentary of Gregory (Pamel. ii. 251) is the rubric "in ipso die item conficetur chrisma," followed by the proper collects and exorcism, and the "benedictio chris-matis principalis." The Gelasian Sacramentary supplies a "missa chrisimalis" for Maundy Thursday, containing the "benedictio olei," and the "olei exorcizati confectio," corresponding very closely with those in the Gregorian rite (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 554 sq.). A similar form appears in the Missa Ambrosiana given by Pamelius (Liturgicon, i. 340). The fullest directions for the ritual relating to the consecration of the Chrisma on Maundy Thursday are to be found in the Ordo Romanus i. (Muratori, Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 991 sq.). [CHRISM.]

(d) Eucharist.—Maundy Thursday was the only day in the year when, throughout the whole Christian world, the Eucharist was celebrated in the evening and partaken of after a meal, and that, as far as we know, only in the African church. The 29th canon of the third council of Carthage, A.D. 397, specially excepts this day from the rule that the sacrament of the altar should be celebrated fasting, "ut sacramenta altaris nonnisi a jejunis hominibus celebrarentur excepto uno die anniversario quo coena Domini celebratur" (Labbe, ii. 1171). St. Augustine also, while insisting on fasting communion generally, mentions that some, to make the commemoration more striking, were accustomed to offer and receive the Body of the Lord after meat on the day when the Lord Himself gave His supper. We learn from him also that in some places there was on this day a double celebration, "in the morning for the sake of those who dine, and in the evening for the sake of those who fast" (Augustine, Epist. cxviii. ad Januar. c. 7). The practice of an evening celebration on this day was regarded with increasing disfavour, and was distinctly prohibited by the Quinisext or Trullan Council (can. 29), A.D. 692, with express reference to the above-mentioned canon of the council of Carthage (Labbe, vi. 1155). At the ordinary celebration on Maundy Thursday a portion of the consecrated bread was reserved for the communions on Good Friday and Easter Eve, Missa Praesantificationum. "Pontifex servat de Sancta usque in crastinum" (Ordo Romanus, i. Muratori, ii. 993).

(e) Other Observances.—The bells of the churches were silent from midnight on Wednesday till matins on Easter Day (Ordo Roman. i. u.s.). The altars were stripped after vespers (ibid.). There was no chanting, and the salutation "Dominus vobiscum," etc., was intermitted, as well as the Kyrie Eleison, and Et ne nos inducas, etc., after matins (Muratori, u. s. i. 548, ii. 992). At 3 P.M. a light was struck outside the church, and a candle lighted from it, which was borne on a reed in procession through the congregation to the sacristy, where a lamp was kindled and kept burning till the Saturday morning, when the Paschal taper was lighted from it (Ordo Roman. u. s.; cf. Zacaria, Epist. xii. ad Bonifacium, Labbe, vi. 1525). There are canons of several councils forbidding the Jews to appear in public, or to mix with Christians from this day till Easter Monday: e.g. the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538 (can. 30, Labbe, v. 303), and the first council of Mâcon, A.D. 581 (can. 14, ibid. 969). MAYENCE, COUNCIL OF (Maquintum Concilium), A.D. 753, at which Lullus was substituted for St. Boniface, who was going back to Friesland, in the see of Mayence. [E. S. Ff.]

MEALS (IN ART). The arrangements of a Christian table do not seem to have been very different from the current habits of the time, except in greater care for moderation, sobriety, and gravity of conversation. The guests sat at table; so at least they are represented in all the representations of agapae, or other meals, which are found in the catacombs. The classic example of an apparently secular or ordinary meal is the well-known fresco from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (Bottari, tav. cxxvii.), given in Martigny, p. 579. Raoul Rochette (Discours sur l'Origine et le Caractère des Types imitatifs qui constituent l'Art du Christianisme) selects this, with two others, as representative examples. They are found in Bottari, tav. cviii. and cxxvii., and at vol. iii. p. 218; and Rochette has no doubt of their relation to pictures in Herculaneum and Pompeii. Nor can this be wondered at, if we consider the at times inconvenient and awkward connexion between the Christian love-feast and the heathen funeral banquet. It is acknowledged on all hands that the former reminded untaught or recent converts too strongly of the ancient hearth-worship, and of past banquets to the lares of their families. It is a sign, not yet fully appreciated, of the great vitality of the faith, that it was able to withdraw the population of Italy (even so far as it did) from Etrurian or Greco-Etrurian habits of sepulchral worship, and teach them to commemorate the death of One only. See Fergusson's History of Architecture (bk. iv. c. i. p. 281, and c. ii. p. 293, ed. 1874) and Coulange's La Cité Antique (Introd. and chapters i. ii.). On this subject the student should compare Bottari (tav. cviii. cxxvii.) with the Pittura d'Ercole (i. tav. xiv.); R. Museo Borbonico (t. i. tav. xxiii.). The chief difference is that in the Christian picture, of which the Gentile one is a type (Bott. tav. cviii.), a round bowl is substituted for the horn or rhyton (drunk from at the small end). It seems quite clear, that except for inferior painting, and the decent dress of persons represented, Christian pictures of the same subject greatly resemble these. In the S. Marcellinus' example (known also as that of the Via Labicana, and of the catacomb Inter duas Lauros), men and women sit at meat together. The provisions and wine appear to have been handed by servants, and are not placed on the table; and the requests of two of the guests are strangely painted above their heads, "Irene da cal(i)da(m)" "Agape, misce mi." (Compare Juv. Sat. v. 63.) The names, as Rochette observes, are probably significant. The semicircular table was called signa from the C form of that letter. The sigma may have been considered an improvement on the ordinary triclinium. Within a semicircle there is a smaller three-legged table with a large amphora. There are two or three knives, a large goblet, two little loaves, apparently, and a small animal, resembling a squirrel, is being carved. Athenaeus (iv.) describes a table of this kind, and Varro (iv. 25) calls it sibilla; others mensa escaria. A young man, apparently the carver or structor dapis, stands by in a long tunic with purple stripes. The two seated female figures at the ends of the semicircle are directing him, and may be the servants named by the guests; they would act as carptores, or prægustatrices. (Seneca, Epist. xlvii.) MEDIATORS (PRIESTS). The Greek writers, when they speak of Christian priests, frequently call them μεσῖται, i.e. mediators between God and man. St. John Baptist is styled mediator by Gregory of Nazianzum, 'Ο παλαιὸς καὶ νέος μεσίτης, as coming between the Old and New Testaments (Orat. xxxiv. p. 633). Others repeat the same idea.

The author of the Apostolical Constitutions applies this title to the priesthood (lib. ii. c. 25), as does also Origen, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, and others of the Greek fathers. But by this they seem to have intended, not that the priest was properly a mediator independently and by his own inherent authority, but merely and by a figure of speech as an internunciatus or medium of communication. In this sense St. Basil (de Spiritu Sancto, c. 14) and Theodoret, commenting on Gal. iii. 19, 20 (where the word μεσίτης is repeatedly employed), teach that Moses was a mediator between God and the people of Israel. The true mediator is, of course, the Lord Jesus. The article μεσίτης in Suicer's Thesaurus may be consulted with great advantage. He has collected a large mass of quotations from the Greek fathers, shewing that they constantly and uniformly applied the term μεσίτης, in all its varieties of meaning, to Jesus Christ.

The Latin fathers avoid the use of mediator in this sense (as applied to the priesthood). St. Cyprian uses it "discurrant ad iudices, blandiantur mediatoribus" (de Cardinal. Operib. Christi Prolog.—the authorship is uncertain), but not of priests. St. Augustine strongly protests against it in his treatise against Parmenian, a Donatist bishop, who had said that the bishop was a mediator between God and the people, "Si Johannes diceret . . . mediatorem me habetis apud Patrem, et ego exoro pro peccatis vestris (sicut Parmenianus quodam loco posuit episcopum mediatorem inter populum et Deum) quis eum ferret bonorum atque fidelium Christianorum" (contra Parmen. lib. ii. c. 8).

MELOTES (μῆλωτῇ from μῆλον, a sheep). The μῆλωται of Heb. xi. 37 are probably indications of distress rather than of asceticism; but when monasticism arose, a sheepskin garment, hanging down on one side, came to be the usual dress of monks in Egypt and elsewhere. Thus Eucherius says: "Melote, in Regum libro, pellis simplex qua monachi Aegyptii etiam nunc utuntur, ex uno latere dependens." This word also denotes an upper garment of goatskin; thus Cassian says (Instit. i. 8) that the outer garb of monks is a goatskin, which is called melotes; and Aelfric, "Hircinus vel fractus roccus;" or, indeed, of any kind of skin (Maeri Hierolex.). Gregorius Monachus makes the melotes to have been a hood or cowl of sheepskin. (Ducange, Glossary.) [S. J. E.]

variable parts of the offices for fixed festivals. Thus they contain, together with other less prominent matter, the Stichera and other similar hymns, the Lections, and the other variable parts of vespers; the Canons, with all that depends on them, of Lauds, the Synaxaria, or Lections from the Lives of the Saints, the rubrical directions from the Typicum; and on a few great festivals, such as the Epiphany, the Antiphons of the Liturgy, and the order of the three lesser hours (the 3rd, 6th, and 9th), called on these days αἱ μεγάλαι ὥραι. The Menaia are usually bound in twelve volumes, each containing the Menaemum for a month, and they correspond approximately to the Proprium Sanctorum of a Western breviary. The word is met with both in the singular and the plural, with the same signification. The office books however use the singular to denote the compilation for a single month, and the plural (τὰ μνηαῖα) to denote the entire series of those for the several months. [H. J. H.]

His natalis, on Nov. 11, commemorated in Gregory's Sacramentary, and his name mentioned in the Collect (Greg. Mag. Lib. Sacr. 140). His commemoration was on Nov. 10 according to Surius (*De Probat. MENDICANCY. The frequent almsgiving inculcated upon Christians not unnaturally led the idle and the worthless to depend upon charity rather than upon their own labour. That the poor should congregate round the doors of the churches to solicit alms was regarded as a laudable custom from early times. Several passages in Chrysostom contain strong exhortations to the people to bestow money in charity before entering church. As the Christian in his day had water standing before the door that the worshippers might first wash their hands, so their forefathers placed the poor there that the power of charity might purify the soul (Chrys. Hom. xxvi. de Verb. Apost.; Hom. i. in 2 Tim.; Hom. iii. de Poenit.). With such indiscriminate almsgiving it was impossible that charity should not be abused. Ambrose found it necessary to admonish (de Offic. iv. 16) the bishops and priests, who had the treasures of the church to dispense, to be careful that they are not wasted upon importunate beggars. Many come to ask for alms out of mere idleness; they are well able to take care of themselves, and if they are indulged they will soon exhaust the provision of the poor and helpless. Moreover, they are not content with a little, they dress themselves as gentlemen, and pretend to be of good birth, and on this ground obtain a greater share. Care and moderation must, therefore, be exercised in the distribution, that those who are really in want may not be sent away empty, and that designing beggars may not make a spoil of the maintenance of the poor. Idleness has never been regarded in quite the same light in the south and east of Europe as among the more industrious nations of the north; and among the northern tribes after their conversion the conditions of life were such that habitual mendicancy must have been rare. Hence disciplinary canons against begging are not found in the Councils or Penitentials. There are, however, certain forms of the evil corrected in the Theodosian code. A law of Valentinian II. (Cod. Theod. XIV., xviii. 1, de mendicantibus non invalidis) directed the cases of all able-bodied beggars who fled from their masters to Rome in order to live on charity to be investigated, and those who were found able to work were either to be returned to their original masters or become the possession of the informer who discovered them. This law was re-enacted by Justinian (Cod. Justin. II. xxv. 1).

With regard to the clergy themselves the church was careful that they did not abuse the liberality of the people and sink into a life of idleness supported by charity. The term βακάντιβοι, or vacantiv, applied (Synesius, Ep. 67) to clergy who deserted their posts and wandered from place to place, was a stigma affixed to idleness. And it was probably with a view to check clerical mendicancy, as well as for the sake of ecclesiastical regularity, that the council of Agde, A.D. 506, decreed (c. 52) that clergy moving about from one diocese to another without commendatory letters were denied communion. The council of Epaon, A.D. 517 (c. 6), has a similar decree against clerical vagrants. And the same rule is laid down in the Spanish council of Valencia, A.D. 524 (c. 5). The tendency to idleness, inseparable from the monastic life, found no support from the early church writers. Cassian (de Coen. Institut. x. 23) quotes a saying of the Egyptian fathers, that a working monk was tempted with one devil—an idle one with a legion. Of Anthony the celebrated ascetic of the Thebaid, it is related (Vita,

c. 4) that he laboured with his own hands, and gave away all he could spare. The Coenobites, or ascetics, living in communities, and of whom there were not less than 50,000 in Egypt in the 4th century, supported themselves by their own industry (Cassian, de Coen. Institut. x. 22). They employed themselves in agriculture, and in making baskets, ropes and sandals, their produce being sent down the Nile for sale in Alexandria, and what was not required for their own maintenance was given to the poor. In general it may be said that industrial occupation was the rule among the monks in the East (see Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 6; Monasticism). Augustine wrote a special treatise (De Opere Monachorum) directed against monks being exempted from labour. In some instances, however, manual labour was regarded with less favour. Martin, who introduced monasticism into Gaul, discouraged labour in the monasteries which he established about Poitiers and Tours. The younger brethren were allowed to transcribe books, but this was the only manual work permitted (Sulpicius Severus, Vita Martini, 10). In the great monastic system established in the West by Benedict in the first half of the 6th century manual labour was one of the distinguishing rules of the order. Seven hours daily was the time allotted to work (Regula, c. 48). The manner in which the injunction to work has been carried out by the Benedictines, both in the service of civilization and literature, is a matter of history. In the great monastery of Bangor, disciples from which contributed so much to the evangelization of the north-west of Europe, Bede states (Hist. ii. 2) that the monks supported themselves by the labour of their own hands. The exaltation of poverty into a virtue and the rise of the mendicant friars lie outside our period. [G. M.]

MENOLOGIUM (μηνολόγιον). This book corresponds with the Martyrology of the Roman church, and, like it, contains the lives and acts of the saints and martyrs. The practice of reading publicly the acts of the saints dates from very early times, and was confirmed by the 47th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage (A.D. 397), which after directing that nothing be read in the churches, "sub nomine divinarum scripturarum," except the canonical scriptures, adds, "Licet etiam legi passiones martyrum cum anniversarii dies eorum celebrantur."

Among early ecclesiastical biographers may be mentioned Eusebius (†A.D. 338), who made one of the earliest collections of the acts of the saints, also Palladius Bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia (cir. A.D. 401), a friend of St. Chrysostom, who wrote lives of Saints and the Hermits of the Desert, the reading of which in the church was prescribed during Lent.

Many changes were made in the Menology, and great variations naturally exist in different copies. The emperor Basil the Macedonian (A.D. 867-886) caused one to be compiled: and Constantine Porphyrogenitus (A.D. 911) directed Simeon Metaphrastes,* the Logothete or Chancellor of the empire, to compile the lives of the saints and acts of the martyrs, arranged in order according to the months of the year. Selections from the menologium, under the name of Synaxaria (συναξάρια) are inserted in the Menaea, and read in the course of the office after the sixth ode of the canon for the day. In modern usage the term menologium is often confounded with, and used for menaeum. Thus Goar (not. 29 in Laud. Off.), "Volumen singulorum mensium officia complectens μηναῖον est, et vulgo Menologium dicunt," and (not. 33) he uses Synaxarion in the sense of Menologium, "Sanctorum vitas volumen brevibus verbis complectens, συναξάριον est: et Martyrologio correspondet, fitque in Laudibus ex eo lectio, etc. . . ."

* Card. Bellarmine charges this author with giving too much play to his imagination.

Correctly, μηνολόγιον is the entire book, and συναξάριον the extract from it. [H. J. H.]

MERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Emeritense concilium), held A.D. 666, at Merida in Estremadura. Twelve bishops, including Proficulus bishop of that see, their metropolitan, subscribed to its twenty-three canons or chapters. In the first of these the creed of Constantinople, with the "Filioque" clause, is rehearsed, and followed by heavy denunciations against all who recede from, or will not assent to it. By the second, the invitatory, or "Venite" (sonus), is directed to be sung at vespers in the place assigned to it in other churches. By the third, the sacrifice is directed to be offered daily for the king and his army when engaged in war. By the ninth, fees are forbidden to be taken either for giving the chrism or for administering baptism. By the tenth, every bishop of the province is directed to have an archpresbyter, an archdeacon, and a chief-clerk (primicerium) in his cathedral church. By the sixteenth, the third part of the revenues of parish churches, anciently due to the bishop, is to be spent on repairs (Mansi, xi. 75 sq.). [E. S. Ff.]

MESSENGER. Polycarp is desired in the Ignatian epistle to him (c. 7) to choose some one who may be worthy to bear the name of θεόδωρος, to carry to Syria the tidings of his (Polycarp's) love of Christ. The word θεοπρεσβύτης is used in a precisely similar sense in the Ignatian epistle to the Smyrnaeans (c. 11); and similarly Polycarp (ad Philipp. 13) speaks of sending one to be an ambassador (πρεσβεύοντα). These emissaries were probably in most cases deacons of the church. Baronius (Ann. A.D. 58, c. 108) wrongly supposes these θεόδωροι to be CURSORES (p. 521) for the summoning of assemblies. METATOR. An officer sent before the sovereign when on a journey to take care that proper preparations were made for his reception. [See METATUS.] Cyprian (Ep. 81, al. 6, § 4) applies the word to Rogatian, the first martyr sent to prison in the Decian persecution, who, he says, went before the rest as a harbinger (metator) to prepare their place in the dungeon. See also Optatus, de Schism. Donat. iii. 4, § 61. [P. O.]

METATORIUM (μετατώριον, μετατόριον, μεσατόριον) one of the subordinate buildings of an oriental church, usually regarded as identical with the diaconicum [DIACONICUM]. Thus, in the Euchologia we read of the patriarch going down "into the metatorium or diaconicum," and passing from it to the altar from the right-hand side. Cedrenus records that when the emperor Leo the Philosopher was forbidden by the patriarch Nicolas to enter the church, on account of his having contracted a fourth marriage, he performed his devotions in the metatorium, on the right side of the altar (Cedren. Histor. p. 483, ed. Par. p. 602). The metatorium erected by Justinian at the church of St. Sophia, was used by him and his successors as a place of retirement and repose, in which the emperors also sometimes partook of a meal (cf. Theodor. Lect. Eclog. ii. p. 165, and the other references to Byzantine historians given by Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iii. No. 84). Goar is of opinion that the metatorium was also used by the ministers of the church for rest and refreshment, and that they there partook of a slight repast. He regards the word, as does Suicer (sub voc.) as a corruption of μυστατήριον, derived from μύστος, fericulum, or from mensa, "a table." But Ducange is probably right in regarding it as a Graecized form of the low-Latin "metatum" frequent in Gregory of Tours, Gregory the Great, and contemporaneous writers, in the sense of "a dwelling." The Greek form μίστατον, or μετάτον, is of not unfrequent occurrence: ε. γ. νομίζοντες καὶ ἐν τῷ μίστατῳ αὐτοῦ ἐν ᾧ πάλα κατέκεινεν εὐρίσκεσθαι αὐτὸν ἐξητήσαμεν (Concil. Constantinop. sub Menna, act. ii. Labbe, v. 57;) ἐπεζήτησε μίστατον (aliter κελλίον) μεῖζον ὁ Χριστιανὸς (Athanas. de Imag. Beryt.). Augusti, with far less probability, considers it another form of "mutatorium," in the sense of "a vestry," camera paramenti, where the ministers of the church changed their habits (Augusti, Handbuch der Christ. Archäol. i. 390; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeit, vol. iv. i. p. 140).

METATUS. The duty of providing food and lodging for the sovereign and his retinue when on a journey, or for the judges and others travelling on public business. Under the Roman law the clergy were exempted from this obligation Cod. Theodos. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8). According to Gothofred (Com. in Cod. Theodos. vii. tit. 8; de Onere Metatus) this exemption was given to the clergy, to senators, to Jewish synagogues, and all places of worship. The capitularies of the Frank kings, on the other hand, appear to lay the burden chiefly on the clergy. One reason of this undoubtedly was to be found in the frequent bestowal of fiefs upon the church, to be held by this and other feudal tenures. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 48, § 3) says that under the Roman law the obligation was considered to be a badge of servitude, but among the Franks such exercise of hospitality was esteemed an honour and a token of the alliance between church and state.

Bishops especially appear to have been expected to receive the sovereign. Thomassin (ib. iii. 1, c. 39, § 1, 2) gives instances of farms bestowed by Charles the Great on bishops who had received him with such hospitality as was in their power, and of punishments inflicted by him on certain bishops and abbats who had neglected to receive some ambassadors from Persia on their way to his court. This custom appears to have brought with it certain inconveniences. A curious canon of the Council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 26), reminds the reigning monarch, Charles the Bald, that women were strictly forbidden to enter the houses of any of the clergy, and that especially the dwelling of bishops should be free from their presence, and implores them not to compel bishops to turn their palaces into lodging houses for women during a royal progress. The right was also claimed for those who were travelling on public business. A capitulary of Louis the Pious (ii. tit. 16, ed. Baluz) sets forth that certain places had been appointed by himself and his father for the special exercise of hospitality, and ordains that officers should be appointed to these places to see that this duty was carefully discharged. Special mention is made of the reception of embassies, and those who neglect to provide with fitting entertainment and provision for the way (paravereda) are threatened with deprivation of any offices that they may hold. The second council of Rheims, A.D. 813 (c. 42), entreates the emperor to enforce by statute that no one should dare to deny lodging (mansionem) to those travelling on his service, or on any duty enforced on them by law (quibus incumbit necessitas).

It appears that this right was often abused. Sometimes by the sovereign using it more than was equitable. Thus Hincmar of Rheims, in his Instruction to Louis the Stammerer (Opp. ii. p. 182), exhorts him not to harass the church by continual progresses ("cirçadas") and other exactions which were not customary in the time of his predecessors. Sometimes by bishops making it a pretext for illegal claims upon the presbyters of their dioceses. A form of instruction delivered by the metropolitan to the French bishops on their institution (Sirmond, Gall. Conc. ii. p. 660), especially forbids them to demand rights of lodging from their presbyters for their friends or attendants, or to extort under the name of free gifts ("accipiat, id est rapiat") any supplies of horses or carriages on pretence of making provision for the sovereign or his embassies. Sometimes this was claimed by those who had no title to it, or from persons who were exempt. An edict of Charles the Great (Sirmond, Gall. Conc. ii. 242) prohibits a practice which had sprung up among the officers of the empire, of demanding lodging and conveyance ("mansionaticos et paravereda"), not only from free men, but from monasteries, convents, guest-houses, and other ecclesiastical corporations. Exemptions appear to have often been given to monasteries. An edict of Charles the Bald, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 39, § 12), forbids his judges to claim any rights of lodging or provision for the way from certain monasteries. Flodoard (Hist. Rem. ii. 11) says that Rigobert, archbishop of Rheims, asserted that all church property in his diocese was free from the rights of entertainment claimed by the judges on the ground of exemptions granted by the Frank kings. This exemption was sometimes extended to the rights of the bishops themselves. A charter given by pope Marinus, A.D. 885, to the monastery of Solognac (Sirmond, Conc. Gall. iii. 521) provides that no bishop or count should claim from the monks any right of lodging or provision for the way, but that they should be left free to exercise the duty of hospitality to all Christians at their own will. For the duties expected from monastic institutions in the way of receiving travellers, as distinct from the law of 'metatus,' see HOSPITALITY; HOSPITIUM.

METROPOLITAN (Μητροπολίτης, Metropolitani). Bishop Beveridge (Cod. Can. lib. ii. c. 5) considers that metropolitans are either of apostolical institution, or that at least the Apostles founded the church on such a system as to put matters inevitably in train for the erection of metropolitan sees, and must therefore be supposed to have contemplated the result to which their acts naturally, if not necessarily, led. In support of this view stress is laid on the fact that the apostles in going into any province of the empire chose out the civil metropolis of that province in which to fix their headquarters, and to found a church. Thus, for example, Antioch was the metropolis of Syria, Corinth of Achaia, Ephesus of Asia, Thessalonica of Macedonia; and when from thence, as from a centre, other churches had been formed, they are collectively spoken of, and grouped together, in reference to the Roman province, and therefore to its metropolis. Thus we hear in the New Testament of the churches of Judea, the churches of Macedonia, the churches of Asia. An inference, therefore, is drawn that a certain ecclesiastical connexion between the church of the chief city and the churches throughout the province, which had derived their origin from it, was to be expected, and was intended. And this, it is urged, is precisely what is found to prevail at an early period. It is further contended that Titus and Timothy in fact acted as metropolitans in Crete and Ephesus, for which Chrysostom is cited (Hom. i. in Tit.), who says, ἐὶ μὴ γὰρ ἦν δόκιμος, οὐκ ἂν αὐτῷ τὴν νῆσον ὁλόκληρον ἐπέτρψεν . . . οὐκ ἂν τοσοῦτον ἐπι- σκόπων κρῖνεν ἐπέτρεψεν. (Comp. Eus. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 4, lib. v. c. 23, lib. iv. c. 23, which passages however, it may perhaps be said, do not seem necessarily to mean more than that the whole was one bishopric.) Barrow, however, while admitting as a fact that the chief cities were usually selected as the first seats of churches, yet considers that "all ecclesiastical presidencies and subordinations, or dependencies of some bishops on others in administration of spiritual affairs, were introduced merely by human ordinance, and established by law or custom, upon prudential accounts, according to the exigency of things." "At first," he says, "every bishop, as a prince in his own church, did act freely according to his will and discretion, with the advice of his ecclesiastical senate, and with the consent of his people (the which he did use to consult), without being controllable by any other, or accountable to any, further than his obligation to uphold the verity of Christian profession, and to maintain fraternal communion in charity and peace with neighbouring churches did require." But "because little, disjointed, and incoherent bodies were like dust, apt to be dissipated by every wind of external assault or intestine faction: and peaceable union could hardly be retained without some ligature of discipline: and churches could not mutually support and defend each other without some method of intercourse and rule of confederacy engaging them: therefore, for many good purposes (for upholding and advancing the common interests of Christianity, for protection and support of each church from inbred disorders and dissensions, for preserving the integrity of the faith, for securing the concord of divers churches, for providing fit pastors to each church, and correcting such as were scandalously bad or unfaithful) it was soon found needful that divers churches should be combined and linked together in some regular form of discipline; that if any church did want a bishop, the neighbour bishops might step in to approve and ordain a fit one: that if any bishop did notoriously swerve from the Christian rule, the others might interpose to correct or void him: that if any error or schism did peep up in any church, the joint concurrence of divers bishops might avail to stop its progress, and to quench it, by convenient means of instruction, reprehension, and censure; that if any church were oppressed by persecution, by indigency, by faction, the others might be engaged to afford effectual succour and relief; for such ends it was needful that bishops in certain precincts should convene, with intent to deliberate and resolve about the best expedients to compass them, and that the manner of such proceeding (to avoid uncertain distraction, confusion, arbitrariness, dissatisfaction, and mutinous opposition) should be settled in an ordinary course, according to rules known and allowed by all."

He then goes on to shew that as in each political province, there was a metropolis or head city, to which great resort was had for the dispensation of justice and other important affairs, and which usually possessed a Christian church which excelled the rest in opulency and in ability to promote the common interest; and as also in all meetings some one person must preside, this duty would naturally devolve in meetings of bishops upon the prelate of the metropolis, "as being at home in his own seat of residence and receiving the rest under his wing," as well as on account of his "surpassing the rest in all advantages answerable to the secular advantages of his city." Accordingly the metropolitan bishop became the president of the episcopal meetings, which soon developed into provincial synods. "Thus," he concludes, "I conceive the metropolitan governance was introduced, by human considerations of public necessity or utility.^a There are, indeed, some who think it was instituted by the apostles, but their arguments do not seem convincing; and such a constitution doth not (as I take it) well suit to the state of their times and the course they took in founding churches" (Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, Suppos. v.).

Dr. Cave, quoted by Bingham, and apparently Bingham himself, appear to take substantially the same view as Barrow.

Thomassin lays stress on the fact that the principal towns being first evangelized by the apostles, Christianity would radiate thence, and daughter-churches spring up around the original church in the mother city, owing it a filial obedience as sprung from it.^b

Such obedience, however, if taken in a strict sense, though well established in later days, was at first of somewhat gradual growth. Soon after the middle of the 2nd century, synods were rendered peculiarly necessary by the diversities of opinion which then sprang up. And, as Barrow states, these would naturally be held in the chief city and under the presidency of its bishop.^c

The more frequently such synods were held, the better defined would the dignity of the metropolitan become, especially as it would be his duty to convene them. When they came to be convened at regular intervals, it would assume an established character as an integral part of a permanent institution.

Nor is it difficult to suppose that in the intervals between synods the president would probably be referred to, when the decrees needed either explanation or enforcement. What at first was only the influence due to his superior position would thus by degrees become acknowledged as an actual authority. Other occasions on which ^a Accordingly we find that the civil metropolis was also the ecclesiastical metropolis, even when it might have been expected to be otherwise. Thus Caesarea, not Jerusalem, was the seat of the metropolitan in Palestine. Compare canons 12 and 17 of Chalcedon.

^b "Ex quibus colligitur, si civiles metropoles in metropoles etiam ecclesiasticas evasere, id eo maxime factum esse, quod metropoles ecclesiasticas ceteras quoque pepererint fundarintque provinciae ecclesiasticas; eo prorsus modo, quo urbis cujusque cathedralis, ceteris vicinorum oppidorum ecclesiis ortum dedit, atque adeo matrem in eas dominationem jure est consecuta" (Part. i. l. 1, c. 3).

^c Such at least was the general, though not at first perhaps the invariable rule. For Eusebius (H. E. v. c. 23) speaks of a synod of the bishops of Pontus at which the senior bishop appears to have presided. In Africa the rule as to metropolitans was peculiar. With the exception of Carthage, which seems to have been the standing metropolis for the province of Africa properly so called, the senior bishop for the time being of the province was metropolitan, whatever his see. Such was the custom in Numidia and Mauretania. It is to be observed, however, that Carthage seems to have had a kind of primacy over them. See Gieseler, 1st period, § 66.

the Christian inhabitants of a Roman province might unite together, such as a solemn thanksgiving for the cessation of persecution, would conduce to the same result. The bishop of the chief city, at which such assemblies would probably take place, would direct the solemnities, and perhaps conduct them. (See Bickell, Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, part 2, p. 176, who refers to Ignat. ad Philad. c. 10, ad Smyrn. c. 11, ad Polyc. c. 7).

Again, the custom that when a bishop died, the neighbouring bishops should assemble for the consecration of his successor, would afford another case of solemn action in which some one must take the lead. And it would naturally devolve on the metropolitan who had taken such lead to certify the churches in other parts of the world as to the validity of the election and consecration, and as to the person whom they were to regard and deal with as the true and regular bishop, in case any other claimants appeared. This would easily pass into a right to ratify what was done in the matter, and to authorize the consecration, so that without such authorization it would not be regular.^d

It will now be proper to give some authorities in order to afford the means of judging how far the above sketch is warranted by the facts of the case.^e

On the one hand, as to the stress laid in early times on the inherent equality of all bishops, we have the statement of Cyprian:—"Neque enim quisquam nostrum episcopum se esse episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit, quando habeat omnis episcopos pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suae arbitrium proprium, tanquam iudicari ab alio non possit, cum nec ipse possit alterum iudicare. Sed expectemus universi iudicium Domini nostri Jesu Christi; qui unus et solus habet potestatem et praeferendi nos in ecclesiae suae gubernatione, et de actu nostro iudicandi" (Allocutio in Conc. Carthag. A.D. 256). And again:—"Manente concordiae vinculo et perseverante catholicae ecclesiae individuo sacramento, actum suum disponit et dirigit unusquisque episcopus, rationem propositi sui Domino redditurus." Ep. 55, ad Antonianum (Ep. 52, ed. Pam.). So, again, he speaks of it as a rule, "ut singulis pastoribus portio gregis sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus" (Ep. 55, ad Cornelium).

It may indeed be said that Cyprian was himself in some sense a metropolitan, but Bickell remarks that passages like these shew that his office was rather that of presiding and taking the lead than such as implied any actual subordination of the other bishops to him (Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, part 2, 181).

On the other hand we read in the apostolic canons (can. 33), τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἐκάστω ἐθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, καὶ ἡγεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὡς κεφαλὴν, καὶ μηδὲν πράττειν περὶ τὸν ἀνευ τῆς ἐκείνου γνώμης, which seems to indicate something more than mere precedence.

Whether or not this can be relied on as a more ancient authority than those we are about to cite will of course depend on the date and origin assigned to this collection of canons. [See APOSTOLIC CANONS.] Beveridge argues for their antiquity because the term metropolitan is not used. This title, it is admitted on all hands, did not come into recognised use until the 4th century. Bickell and others, however, consider that the stress thus laid on metropolitan authority (no matter by what title) proves of itself that the apostolic canons belong to the 4th century. One thing, at all events, is clear, namely, that the council of Nice speaks of the existence of metropolitans as no new thing at that period. In fact, it treats the still more extensive authority of the bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome as established by ancient custom.^f

The Nicene decrees also recognise it as perfectly clear (καθόλου δὲ πρόδηλον ἐκείνο), that no one is to be made a bishop without the metropolitan (χωρὶς γνώμης μητροπολίτου), and if otherwise, he is not to be held rightly a bishop (can. vi.; see also can. iv.).

The council of Antioch (can. ix.) has explicit decrees as to the precedence of the bishop of the metropolis, and as to the necessity for his presence when questions of a general nature are discussed, but with a strong reservation as to the powers of each bishop in matters affecting merely his own diocese.^g

The same council also insists that no one be made a bishop without a synod and the presence of the metropolitan of the province (can. xix.), and the council of Laodicea repeats the injunction (can. xii.).^h

^f τὰ ἀρχαῖα ἔθνη κρατεῖται, τὰ ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ καὶ Λιβύῃ καὶ Πενταπόλει, ὥστε τὸν ἐν Ἀλεξανδρίᾳ ἐπίσκοπον πάντων τούτων ἔχειν τὴν ἐξουσίαν· ἐπειδὴ καὶ τῶ ἐν τῇ Ῥώμῃ ἐπίσκοπῳ τοῦτο σύνθησός ἐστιν, ὁμοίως δὲ κατὰ τὴν Ἀντιόχειαν καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἄλλαις ἐπαρχίαις τὰ πρεσβεία ὥζεσθαι ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις (can. 6). Even at this time, however metropolitans were not universal in the West (Bickell, 2, 187).

^g τοὺς καθ' ἐκάστην ἐπαρχίαν ἐπισκόπους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει προεστῶτα ἐπίσκοπον, καὶ τὴν φροντίδα ἀναδέχεσθαι πάσης τῆς ἐπαρχίας· διὰ τὸ ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει πανταχόθεν συντρέχειν πάντας τοὺς τὰ πράγματα ἔχοντας. Ὅθεν ἐδόξε καὶ τῇ τιμῇ προηγεῖσθαι αὐτόν, μηδὲν τε πράττειν περὶ τὸν τοιοῦτον ἐπίσκοπον ἀνευ αὐτοῦ, κατὰ τὸν ἀρχαῖον κρατήσαντα τῶν πατέρων ἡμῶν κανὼνα ἣ ταῦτα μόνον ὅσα τῇ ἐκείνου ἐπιβάλλει παροικία καὶ ταῖς ὑπ' αὐτὴν χωρίαις. Ἐκαστον γὰρ ἐπίσκοπον ἐξουσίαν ἔχειν τῆς ἐαυτοῦ παροικίας διοικεῖν τε κατὰ τὴν ἐκάστην ἐπιβάλλονσαν εὐλαβεῖν, καὶ πρὸς τὴν ποιέειν πάσης τῆς χώρας τῆς ὑπὸ τὴν ἐαυτοῦ πόλιν ὡς καὶ χειροτονεῖν πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους, καὶ μετὰ κρίσεως ἕκαστα διαλαμβάνειν. περαιτέρω δὲ μηδὲν πράττειν ἐπιχειρεῖν δίχα τοῦ τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐπισκόπου, μηδὲ αὐτὸν ἀνευ τῆς τῶν λοιπῶν γνώμης (Concil. Antioch. can. ix.).

^h The words of the Antiochene canon are: ἐπίσκοπον μὴ χειροτονεῖσθαι δίχα συνόδου καὶ παρουσίας τοῦ ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει τῆς ἐπαρχίας. These words are deemed by Barrow to interpret the ambiguous phrase, χωρὶς γνώμης, in the Nicene canon, and to shew that "it doth not import a negative voice in him, but that the transaction should not pass in his absence, or without his knowledge, advice, and suffrage." (Barrow On Pope's Supremacy, Supposition vi.) Eventually, however, no doubt the

^d Such right, however, did not necessarily amount to an arbitrary negative. If there was a diversity of opinion in the synod the metropolitan was directed by the council of Arles to side with the majority, and there are other councils to the same effect. [BISHOP.]

^e These authorities are principally found in the East and in North Africa. In the West the development of metropolitan authority was apparently of later date. But indications of it in Gaul, in connexion with the council of Arles, and in Spain at the council of Elvira (can. 58) are given by Bickell (part 2, pp. 185, 186).

The right of personally deciding appeals was not vested in metropolitans till a late period.

The council of Sardica may be thought to have a trace of it, but the decrees of this council on the subject of appeals are perhaps open to question.¹

The council of Nice directed that synods should be held twice a year in each province, in order that when clergymen or laymen had been excommunicated by their own bishops the propriety of the sentence might be examined and confirmed, or mitigated. (See canon v.)

The council of Chalcedon (can. ix.) defined the course to be that when one clergyman complained against another, they should first go before their own bishop, or before judges selected by both parties with his sanction. But if a clergyman brought a complaint against a bishop, it was to be determined in the provincial synod.²

In like manner the council of Antioch (can. vi.) allowed a party excommunicated by his own bishop to appeal to the next ensuing synod.

In these synods the metropolitan would no doubt preside, and exercise great influence, but there is no proof as yet of his judging alone in matters of importance.

An intermediate stage seems observable in the laws of Justinian (Cod. i. tit. 4, leg. 29), in which an appeal is given to the metropolitan, with a further appeal from him to a synod, and a final appeal from the synod to the patriarch.³

power of confirmation came into the hands of the metropolitan personally. "Quoniam inter episcopos ordinatores, primus et praeses esset metropolitanus: neque semper omnibus compvincialibus episcopis commodum esset, ad singulas episcoporum ordinationes convenire, sensim ex quodam ut minus tacto ecclesiae consensu ad metropolitanum, integrum peno devolutum est jus electiones discutiendi, easque vel ut canonicas probandi, vel ut minus canonicas reprobandi." (Van Espen, part i. tit. xiv. c. 1.) For the profession of obedience made to metropolitans by the bishops of their province, see BISHOP, 1, 5.

Speaking in relation to the state of things in Gaul about the 6th and 7th centuries, Guizot says: "The civil metropolis was generally more wealthy, more populous than the other towns of the province; its bishop had more influence; people met around him on all important occasions; his residence became the chief place of the provincial council; he convoked it, and was the president of it; he was moreover charged with the confirmation and consecration of the newly-elected bishops of the province; with receiving accusations brought against bishops, and the appeals from their decisions, and with carrying them, after having made a first examination, to the provincial council, which alone had the right of judging them. The archbishops unceasingly attempted to usurp the right and make a personal power of it. They often succeeded; but, in truth, as to all important circumstances, it was to the provincial council that it appertained; the archbishops were only charged with superintending the execution of it." (Hist. of Civilisation in France, vol. ii. p. 46, Eng. trans.)

In Spain, in the 6th century, the council of Toledo (can. 20) says, "let the priests, whether parochial or diocesan, who shall be tormented by the bishop, carry their complaints to the metropolitan, and let the metropolitan delay not to repress such excesses." This seems to imply a direct personal power, but it may be observed that this canon refers to unseemly exactions on the part of individual bishops rather than to their judicial sentences.

From this time onward the authority and position of metropolitans in the West were subject to many fluctuations, and varied much in different countries. Some of the popes, who were jealous of all intermediate authority between themselves and the diocesan bishops, shewed a disposition to weaken the metropolitans. And the bishops themselves, with a somewhat short-sighted policy, preferred to have their superior at a distance in Italy instead of in their own country and province. Moreover as the superiority of the metropolitans was in a great degree dependent on the pre-eminence of the city in which their see was fixed and on its ancient character as a metropolis, the changes which took place in the relative importance of towns at periods of invasion and social change materially affected the position of the prelates.

It is not surprising, therefore, that in many places the metropolitan authority should decline, or that in the 8th century Pepin should have to consult pope Zachary as to the course to be adopted for procuring respect for metropoli-

^m In the course of the 6th century there were held in Gaul fifty-four councils of every description: in the 7th century only twenty, in the first half of the 8th century only seven, and five of these were held in Belgium or on the banks of the Rhine. (Guizot, Hist. of Civilisation in France, vol. ii. p. 49, Eng. trans.)

tans at the hands of the bishops and parochial clergy.

In France, indeed, a vigorous effort was made to restore the institution to something like vigour, and the legislation of Pepin and Charlemagne might have had this effect.^a But a fatal blow was at hand. The appearance of the forged decretals in the middle of the 9th century tended to elevate the papal power at the expense of that of the metropolitans, to an extent from which the latter never completely recovered, except in countries like England, where patriotic feeling and royal authority alike resented direct papal interference, and supported the national prelacy.^o The later history of the subject lies beyond the chronological limit of the present work.

It only remains to say a few words on certain details.

As to appointment.—When the position and dignity of metropolitans became established, it would appear that the canonical rule was that they should be elected by all the bishops of the province, with the consent of the clergy and laity.^p Obviously, however, the appointment of these superior prelates would be open to the same disturbing influences which affected the choice of ordinary bishops, only in a still greater degree, on account of their greater importance. (Comp. BISHOP I. i. a.)

When chosen, the metropolitan was confirmed, and consecrated in the East by the exarch or patriarch (see Thomassin, part ii. lib. 2, cap. 8 and cap. 19). In the West he was consecrated by the other bishops of the province (August. Brevic. Collat. 3 die, c. 16, and see Beveridge, Pandect. Can. vol. 2, Annot. p. 55). When Rome came to assert a patriarchal right over the whole West, the pope put forward a claim to sanction the appointment of metropolitans by sending them the pallium [PALLIUM]. As early as the 6th century, the pope appears to have sent a pallium to the bishop of Arles as perpetual vicar of the holy see in Gaul. And Gregory I. did the like to certain other metropolitans as well, but it was not then decided that they were bound to wait for this before exercising their functions. It was not until the synod of Frankfurt in 742 that Boniface, as legate of pope Zachary, obtained a decision that all metropolitans should request the pallium from the pope and obey his lawful commands.^q This was construed by the popes to mean a promise of obedience before receiving the pall. And this again was turned into a direct oath of fealty by subsequent popes.

Finally, it may be right to mention the class of honorary metropolitans. These had title and precedence, but not power. Thus Chalcedon and Nicaea each enjoyed the title of a metropolis, and their bishops had metropolitan rank, but Nicomedia remained the real metropolis (see council of Chalcedon, act 6 and 13, and compare Thomassin, part i. lib. i. cap. 39).

This article may not unfitly be concluded with two short summaries of the powers and duties of metropolitans by writers of learning.

Bishop Beveridge, in his Annotations on the Canons of the Council of Nice, enumerates their functions thus:

1. Penes metropolitanum est omnes episcoporum ordinationes et electiones in provinciâ suâ celebratas confirmare; adeo ut sine ejus consensu et confirmatione irrita sit episcopi cujusvis ordinatio.

2. Omnes provinciae suae episcopos ad synodum sub se habendum quotannis convocare.

3. In mores ac opiniones episcoporum sibi subsectorum inspicere, et immorigeros ac gravioribus criminibus convictos admonere, reprehendere, et aliorum episcoporum communione arcere.

4. Causas inter episcopos litigantes audire et determinare et omnia ecclesiastica negotia, quae majoris sunt momenti, in universâ suâ provinciâ administrare, adeo ut nihil magni momenti ab episcopis eo inconsulto fiat. Neque etiam trans mare peregrinare potest episcopus sine dimissoriâ aut formatâ metropolitani sui.^r

(Pandect. Can. vol. ii. Annot. p. 59.)

The other summary is that of Thomassin (Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disc. pt. i. lib. i. c. 40).

Si lubet jam brevi gyro paucisque verbis concludere jura metropolitanorum hic perpenda; adverte nihil officere, vel metropolitanorum potestati exarcharum amplitudinem, vel episcoporum dignitati metropolitanorum auctoritatem. Causae omnes aliquanti saltem ponderis in commune a metropolitano et episcopis provinciae pertractandae erant: praesertim in concilio provinciae: quod ille convocabat, qui praeerat. Concilio universali intererant ex officio metropolitani omnes. Episcoporum proceres, magistri, judices, audiebant. In subditis subditorum sibi episcoporum jurisdictionem deprimebant, vel cum ad ipsos erat provocatum, vel cum provinciam obambulabant. Sedes metropolitani instar habebat, et imaginem praeferbat sedis apostolicae. Observandorum canonum praefecti erant, et vindices; impune violatorum in ipsos culpa, in ipsos poena recidebat. Dabant literas formatas. Eorum assensione et dedicabantur ac dotabantur ecclesiae, et earum bona distrahebantur, ubi ex re erat: potestas ordinandorum episcoporum, paternam eis in illos conciliabat auctoritatem; et hinc fluebant reliqua in eosdem egregiae potestatis jura.

^a See the capitulary of Pepin in 755 (Baluze, vol. i. pp. 169, 170), and those of Charlemagne in 779 (ib. 195) and 789 (ib. 216). His Frankfort capit. 794 says, "Si non obederit aliqua persona episcopo suo de abbatibus, presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, monachis, et ceteris clericis, vel etiam aliis, in ejus parochia, veniant ad metropolitanum suum, et ille judicet causam cum suffraganeis suis. Comites quoque nostri veniant ad iudicium episcoporum. Et si aliquis est quod episcopus metropolitanus non possit corrigere vel pacificare, tunc tandem veniant accusatores cum accusato cum literis metropolitanis, ut sciamus veritatem rei" (Baluze, i. 264).

Thomassin seeks to defend the papacy from the charge of desiring to weaken the metropolitan power (part i. lib. 1, c. 48).

^p Thus Leo (Ep. 83): "Metropolitano defuncto, cum in locum ejus alius fuerit subrogandus, provinciales episcopi ad civitatem metropolitanam convenire debent, ut omnium clericorum atque omnium civium voluntate discussa ex presbyteris ejusdem ecclesiae, vel ex diaconis optimus eligatur."

^r This last head refers to the letters of commendation which in Africa (see canon 28 of the third council of Carthage) and other places (see Gregory the Great, Epist. viii. 8) were granted by the metropolitan to bishops going beyond sea.

MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL, AND ALL ANGELS, FESTIVAL OF. It is not our province here to enter into the general question of angelolatry. It may be well, however, to call attention to the fact that in the early Christian church a certain tendency to angel-worship manifested itself: thus, for example, it forms one of the points in the heresy which affected the Colossian church, against which St. Paul distinctly protests (Col. ii. 18; cf. also i. 16). The Essenic character of this heresy, whether or not there be historical connexion with the Essenes of Palestine, must not be lost sight of, inasmuch as angelology formed an important part of the esoteric creed of the latter, and, indeed, entered largely into the speculations of the Jews generally (Josephus, B. J., ii. 8.7; cf. Lightfoot, Colossians, in loc., where a number of illustrations are given of this point, in connection with Jews, Judaizing Christians and Gnostics. Those from the curious Ophite work, the Pistis Sophia, into which angelology enters very largely, may be especially noted). It is interesting to observe that long afterwards, in the 4th century, we find a council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 363) in the immediate neighbourhood, that is, of Colossae, holding it necessary to forbid the angel-worship then prevalent in the country (can. 35; Labbe, i. 1503). The canon is strongly worded, bidding men not to forsake the church of God, and invoke angels and hold commemorations (ἀγγέλους ὀνομαzeῖν καὶ συνάξεις ποιεῖν), because those who follow this secret idolatry are accursed, as having forsaken the Lord Jesus Christ. In the next century we find Theodore (in Col., l.c.) referring to this prohibition as necessitated by the spread of this worship through Phrygia and Pisidia, and he adds that oratories (ἐκκλήρια) of St. Michael were still existing in the neighbouring districts.* On another point of connexion between St. Michael and this region we shall subsequently dwell at length, his alleged appearance at Chonae, a town in the immediate neighbourhood of Colossae. It may be added here that the above-cited canon of the Laodicean council was, with the rest of its decrees, repeated centuries after by a synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 789), but with the reservation, "nec nominentur, nisi illorum quos habemus in auctoritate. Hi sunt Michael, Gabriel, Raphael" (Capit. Aquisgran. can. 16; Labbe, vii. 973).

Besides such conciliar decrees, strong expressions of opinion are continually met with among the fathers. It is perhaps hardly fair to cite Epiphanius as including the Angelici among his different classes of heretics, because though he mentions as a possible derivation the view that they were worshippers of angels, he confesses that he is really ignorant on the point^b (Haer. 60 [al. 40]; vol. i. 505, ed. Petavius). Augustine, however, says plainly enough, "we honour [the angels] through love, not through slavish fear, nor do we build to them temples; for they wish not so to be honoured by us, because they know that we ourselves, when we are worthy, are temples of God Most High" (de Vera Relig. 110; vol. i. 1266, ed. Gaume). Again, in his Confessions (x. 42, vol. i. 327), he says, "Whom could I find who should reconcile me to Thee? Should I have recourse (ambandum mihi fuit) to angels?" In his De Civitate Dei (see lib. x. cc. 19, 25; vol. vii. 410, 418) we find important passages on this subject, which shew very clearly the strong views of the great father on this question, wherein he opposes strongly all idea of worship or sacrifice offered to angels.^c

^b Reference may also be made to Augustine (de Haeres. c. 59; vol. viii. 57, ed. Gaume).

Thus, taking the church as a whole (though, as might have been expected, the remark is much more true for the West than the East), we find that festivals of angels enter but slightly into the calendar, thus forming a striking contrast with the ever-increasing list of Saints Days. Naturally, therefore, there is an almost total absence of recognition on the part of the church of the practice before us. The second Nicene Council (A.D. 787) ordains a τιμητική προσκύνησις of the figures of angels, as well as those of the Lord, the Virgin and holy men (Labbe, vii. 556), and we have also a commemoration of angels in some litanies (see e. g. Ménard, Greg. Sacr. 497; where there is special mention of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael), but with these exceptions the tenor of church teaching is unvarying enough.^d

Again, though we can now see in the festival of Michaelmas a recognition of the great truth of the joint service of angels and men as subjects of a common Lord, yet it has been justly pointed out that the festivals of angels, now mainly represented, so far as the Western church is concerned, by the festival of St. Michael and All Angels on Sept. 29, were not based on any such dogmatic idea, but were simply commemorations of [supposed] historic events, namely, manifestations of the archangel at some special time and place, or the dedication of a church in his honour.

We shall confine ourselves for the present to the Western church, and speak (1) of the manifestation in Monte Gargano. This has been variously referred to the episcopate of Gelasius, i.e. 492-6 A.D. (so e.g. in Anast. Biblioth., Gelasius [74] "Hujus temporibus inventa ecclesia sancti angeli in Monte Gargano"), to the period from A.D. 520-530 (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29, p. 57), to the episcopate of Felix IV. in A.D. 536, or even later. The day specially associated with this manifestation is May 8, and the legend is very briefly this. A bull having strayed from the herd, was found fixed in the entrance to a cave, and when it was shot at, the arrow returned and struck the archer. A panic thus arose, and the bishop of Sipontum, in whose diocese Mount Garganus was situated, enjoined, on being consulted, that three days should be given to fasting and prayer. At the end of that time it was vouchsafed to the bishop to see the archangel in a vision by night, who told him that the place was under his special care, thus indicating his wish that worship should there be offered to God in memory of St. Michael and All Angels. As to the germ of this legend, of which we have given a résumé from the Acta, it has been suggested that it is to be connected with the fact of a war between the people of Sipontum and of Naples, in order to aid in securing the victory to the former. It has also been maintained, and apparently on good grounds, that the shrine of St. Michael was the successor of some local heathen shrine. The belief of the archangel's appearance soon became widely current, and the modern town of Monte St. Angelo, near Manfredonia, owes its name thereto.

Most martyrologies do not contain this commemoration of May 8. We may cite a Corbey martyrology, not much later than A.D. 826, where the day is given as "inventio sancti Michaelis archangeli in Monte Gargano" (D'Achery, Spicilegium, x. 134). On the question of the connexion between this manifestation and the commemoration of September 29 we shall speak more fully below.

(2) The archangel is said to have appeared in Monte Tumba, in Normandy (apparently the Mont St. Michel, near Avranches), about the year A.D. 710, to Autbert, bishop of the district of Abrincatae, bidding him build a church in his honour on a place known as Tumba on account of its height, and also as periculum maris. The church was said to have been dedicated on October 16 (a Benedictine monastery being afterwards added), on which day it is mentioned in some of the additions to Usuard (Patrol., cxxiv. 582); and the festival of the dedication appears to have acquired considerable celebrity even beyond the bounds of France, for we find a council of Oxford (A.D. 1222) ordering that sundry feasts "a rectoribus ecclesiarum et capellanis in obsequio Divino et laude devotissime celebrentur," among which is the dedicatio sancti Michaelis in Monte Tumba (can. 8; Labbe, xi. 275). On the whole of this part of the subject, reference may be especially made to Mabillon (Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, vol. ii. p. 19), and also the Acta Sanctorum (Sept. 29, p. 74, where the Acta of this manifestation are given).

(3) We pass on now to consider, in the third place, the commemoration of September 29, the festival of Michaelmas par excellence. It does not appear at all certain what was the original special idea of the commemoration of this day. A large number of ancient martyrologies and calendars associate it with the manifestation on Mount Garganus, as being the anniversary of the dedication of the church there. In others again we find mention of the dedication of some church to St. Michael at Rome, so that on this latter view we should thus have a parallel to such cases as e.g. Christmas and the Ember seasons, where institutions of the local Roman church spread throughout the whole Western church, and indeed in the former of our two illustrations almost through the universal church. It is not at all easy to reconcile the conflicting details, which we shall proceed to state at length. We shall first cite from the martyrologies. The Mart. Hieronymi gives, according to the Cod. Epternacensis, "dedicatio basilicæ S. Michaelis" (Acta Sanctorum, ib. p. 4), but in the Cod. Corbeienis "dedicatio basilicæ archangeli Michaelis, in monte qui dicitur Garganus" (D'Achery, iv.

^c Cf. further Augustine (Coll. cum Maximino, vol. viii. 1016), "Nonne si templum alicui sancto angelo excellentissimo . . . faceremus, anathemaremur a veritate Christi et ab ecclesia Dei." Also Contra Faustum, xx. 21, vol. viii. 545.

^d It cannot be considered a real exception to this statement that the Coptic Euchologion contains some direct prayers to angels. (See Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. Collectio, p. 277, ed. 1847.)

^e This is Mabillon's date; Stilling (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29, p. 75 a) gives the date as A.D. 850-950.

675). The Mart. Gellonense shows a similar variation of MSS., the shorter forms being apparently those of the oldest (ib. xiii. 413, 426, 430). Bede, according to the text of the Bollandist edition, has merely "dedicatio ecclesiae sancti angeli Michaelis" (Patrol. xciv. 1057), but in some forms of this last the entry runs, "Romae, via Salaria miliario septimo, dedicatio basilicae sancti archangeli Michaelis, vel in monte. . . ." In the Mart. Lucense, as here, the Roman commemoration comes first, but there is no mention of the special locality; this is given in a vague way in a Mart. Corbeienae (Leslie, not. ad Liturg. Mozarab., in loc.), "Romae, miliario sexto (septimo?) . . ." The martyrologies of Rabanus Maurus (Patrol. cx. 1171), Ado (ib. cxiii. 368) and Usuard (ib. cxv. 518) make distinct mention of Mount Garganus. The metrical martyrology of Bede, "Michaelis ternas [sc. Kal. Oct.] templi dedicatio sacrat" (ib. xciv. 605) is quite general, and also that of Wandalbert (ib. cxxi. 612).

"Aetherea virtute potens, princepsque supernae Militiae Michael terno sibi templa sacrauit."

The Romanum Parvum combines two notices, "In Monte Gargano, venerabilis memoria archangeli Michaelis. Et Romae, dedicatio ecclesiae ejusdem archangeli, a B. Bonifacio papa constructae in circo, qui locus inter nubes dicitur" (ib. cxxiii. 170).

We next refer to the three Roman sacramentaries. The Leonine (under the date Sept. 30) gives no less than five masses, each with a special preface, with the heading Natale basilicae angeli in Salaria (sc. via). Four of these masses are specially associated with the name of St. Michael, and the remaining one with angels and archangels generally (vol. ii. 99, ed. Ballerini). The Gelasian Sacramentary merely gives Orationes in sancti archangeli Michaelis (Patrol. lxxiv. 1177), but in the Gregorian is dedicatio basilicae sancti Michaelis (col. 134, ed. Menard).

On a survey of the foregoing evidence, we are inclined to consider the most satisfactory explanation to be that there was a Roman commemoration originally distinct from any connexion with the commemoration of the manifestation on Mount Garganus, and probably of earlier date than the alleged appearance there. This original Roman festival might fairly be associated with the church in the Via Salaria, which, however, got thrown into the shade by the increasing fame of the commemoration on Mount Garganus. Subsequently Boniface erected a church to St. Michael in Rome, to the locality of which we shall again refer. The presence of this church in the city, and the distance of that on the Via Salaria, may have caused the latter to be less frequented, so that the more recent church became the favourite in martyrologies.^h

^f It may be remarked that twice in these masses are allusions to "loca sacra (dicata)" to God in honour of St. Michael, implying, according to some, the existence of several churches.

^g It is suggested (Leslie, not. ad Liturg. Mozarab., in loc.) that Sept. 30 was really the anniversary of the dedication of the church in the Via Salaria, which was shifted to Sept. 29 to accord with that of the dedication of the church on Mount Garganus. In view, however, of the close proximity of the days, this seems rather far-fetched.

^h There is an allusion to the church in Via Salaria

In considering the above view, it will be well to bear in mind (1) that the mention of the Via Salaria occurs in the oldest sacramentary; (2) that this locality cannot at all be reconciled with the notices of the church built by Boniface; (3) that in some of the martyrologies we have cited the Roman commemoration comes first, whereas we are told that Boniface built his church soon after (non multo post) the manifestation on Mount Garganus; (4) that a church of St. Michael was existing in Rome prior to the episcopate of any Boniface except Boniface I. (ob. A.D. 422), who lived long before the alleged date of the manifestation on Mount Garganus. This we know on the authority of Anastasius Bibliothecarius (80), who tells us that Symmachus (ob. A.D. 514) enlarged and improved the church of St. Michael, so that the church, and presumably also the festival, were existing before his time.

On these grounds we hold it to be at any rate fairly probable that the local Roman festival is earlier than the Apulian. To the inquiry, however, how far such a festival is traceable back, it must be admitted that there is a scarcity of evidence. Baronius (Mart. Rom., May 8, not.), who argues for the great antiquity of the Roman festival, cites in evidence the Christian poet Drepanius Florus; but he is certainly wrong in supposing him to be the Drepanius mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris, and the poet in question is to be referred to about A.D. 848 (Cave, Chartoph. Eccl., p. 160). Nor need we attach much weight to his remark that in a MS. volume of sermons in the Vatican library, bearing the names of Augustine and others, is one of Gregory the Great for the festival of St. Michael. Still the evidence of the Leonine Sacramentary is indicative of a decidedly early date, and we probably shall not err in assuming the existence of the festival in the 5th century.

We must next refer to the church of St. Michael built by Boniface. This, it will be remembered, was spoken of in the Mart. Romanum parvum as being in circo, in a place known as inter nubes; and the martyrology of Ado in like manner speaks of it as in summitate circi. What this locality is, is very doubtful. Baronius (l. c.) identifies it with the Moles Hadriana, and connects it with an appearance of the archangel in that place to Gregory the Great, on the occasion of the cessation of a pestilence. The Boniface he considers to be either the Third (ob. A.D. 606) or Fourth (ob. A.D. 615), rejecting the claims of Boniface II. (ob. A.D. 532), on grounds, however, which depend for their validity on the acceptance of his theory as to the locality. It may be remarked that this place is now and has been for centuries known as Castello di St. Angelo. Stilling again (Acta Sanctorum, p. 71), following Donatus, considers that the place hinted at is the head of the Circus Flaminius, and that the church is that which still exists in the Forum Piscarium.ⁱ If this locality be accepted, the reason against Boniface II. falls to as still existing in the 9th century, in a list by an anonymous writer of the holy places about Rome, cited by Eckhart (de rebus Franciae Orientalis, vol. i. p. 831).

ⁱ Another famous church of St. Michael in Rome may be mentioned here, that built near the Vatican by Leo IV. (ob. A.D. 855) in honour of the victory over the Moslems the ground, and the non multo post of the martyrologies is certainly more applicable to him.

In the foregoing remarks we have dwelt on the local Roman festival, whether or not borrowed from the Apulian commemoration: and doubtless some considerable time elapsed before the observance became a general one in the Western church. Still, by the beginning of the 9th century, it had obviously become one of the chief festivals of the church, for the council of Mentz (A.D. 813), in ordaining what festivals are to be observed, specifies Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, the festivals of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. John the Baptist, the Assumption, the "dedicatio S. Michaelis," and the festivals of St. Remigius, St. Martin and St. Andrew (can. 36, Labbe, vii. 1250: see also Capitularia Regum Francorum, ii. 36; vol. i. 748, ed. Baluzius). It must be added, however, that the notice of the council of Mentz appears to be the first.^k There is no mention of the festival in the Regula of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz. Before leaving this part of our subject, we may call attention to the special prominence given to the feast of St. Michael in the ecclesiastical laws of Ethelred II., king of England (A.D. 978-1016). The date of the festival is not mentioned, but there can be no doubt that it is September 29. It is ordered that the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before the festival shall be kept as a fast, and that men shall walk barefoot to church and make their confessions. On these days all slaves are to be free from work. A neglect of the fast is to be punished in a slave by stripes, in a free man by a fine (30 pence if he is poor, 120 shillings if athane), which is to be given to the poor (Patrol. cli. 1167).

On turning to the Eastern church, we meet with a variety of commemorations, assignable to various causes.

(1.) Most widely observed of all is the festival of November 8. This the Greek church dedicates to St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and All Angels (ἡ σύναξις τῶν παμμεγίστων ταξιαρχῶν Μιχαὴλ καὶ Γαβριὴλ καὶ πάντων τῶν ἀσωμάτων δυνατέων). The notice for the day in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the first volume of the Acta Sanctorum for May (p. lii.), is ὁ γδοσάτην οὐρανίσιον κυδαίνει τάγματος Ἀρχων. The same is the case with the Russian church: reference may be made to the figure in the curious pictorial calendar (ibid. p. lv.). In the Armenian calendar, as given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1. 653), the day is dedicated to Michael and Gabriel. We find it also as one of the numerous feasts of the Ethiopic church, of which we shall again speak (Ludolf, Hist. Aeth. p. 398); and in the Coptic calendar (ibid., also Selden, de syndet. vet. Ebraeorum, pp. 226 sqq., ed. Amsterdam, 1679) we find the day dedicated to St. Michael, with a second and third festival on the two following days. This special prominence given in the Coptic church is interesting in connexion with the incident we shall now mention. The original reason which led to the establishment of this festival is unknown, but a curious story is told in the annals of Said-Ebn-Batrik or Eutychius,¹ patriarch of Alexandria (ob. A.D. 940). This is to the effect that the patriarch Alexander (ob. A.D. 326) found on his accession a large temple existing in Alexandria, which had been built by Cleopatra in honour of Saturn. In this was a large idol of brass, named Michael, to which sacrifices were offered, and a great annual festival observed. The bishop finding that open opposition to this idolatry failed, suggested to his people that they should change the festival into one to the archangel Michael, and offer the sacrifice to him, so that he might intercede for them to God. The advice was taken, the idol broken up and made into a cross, and the temple became the church of St. Michael, whence "the Copts in Egypt and Alexandria still keep the feast on that day to the angel Michael, and sacrifice numerous victims" (Annales, vol. i. p. 435, ed. Pocock; Oxford, 1658: see also Selden, p. 202). It is sufficient to remark on this story, found in a writing often of a most foolish character, that there is no evidence of the existence of any idol named Michael [not improbably there may have been in some earlier document some confusion with Moloch, who in many respects may be viewed as equivalent to Saturn, and whose name hardly differs from Michael, save by a slight metathesis], and such a breaking up of an idol was not a likely event to have happened in Alexandria so late as the time of Constantine.

(2.) We shall next mention the manifestation said to have happened at Chonae, close to Colossae. The legend is to the effect that there being a great danger of inundation from the river Lycus, by which a church dedicated to St. Michael might have been submerged, the archangel opportunely appeared to the bishop Archippus, and opened a chasm in the earth, which carried off the water. Dr. Lightfoot remarks that thus "the worship of angels is curiously connected with the physical features of the country" (p. 71 n.), which is described by Strabo (xii. 8. 16) as πολύτρητον καὶ εὐσειστον. This event is commemorated on September 6 in the Greek [in some printed editions of the Menaea on September 7; Acta Sanctorum, in loc. § 185], Russian and Ethiopic churches (Ludolf, p. 390). The heading for the day in the Menaea is ἡ ἀνάμνησις τοῦ παραδόξου θαύματος ἐν Κολασσαῖς τῆς Φρυγίας παρὰ τοῦ ἀρχιστρατήγου Μιχαὴλ, and the verse in the poetical Greek Ephemerides, which we have already once cited, is Ῥοὺν Μιχαὴλ ποταμῶν χώνευσε νόων ἄγων ἕκτη (p. xliii.). Reference may also be made to the quaint figure in the pictorial Moscow Calendar (p. xlv.). Of this legend, Acta are extant both in Greek and Latin. It may be remarked here that there was a very famous church to St. Michael at Chonae, called by Nicetas Choniata, a native of the place, τὸν ἀρχαγγελικὸν ναὸν . . . μεγέθει μέγιστον καὶ κάλλει κάλλιστον (p. 230, ed. Bekker).

(3.) The Menology of cardinal Sirletus (Canisius, Thesaurus, III. i. 438) also connects June 8

^k The sermon on the festival of St. Michael, once attributed to Bede, is certainly spurious (Patrol. xciv. 502). In connexion with Mentz it may be mentioned that St. Boniface is said to have built a monastery to St. Michael at Ordorf, in consequence of a vision of the archangel. This building of the monastery, however, is mentioned in a life of St. Boniface, written after the middle of the 11th century (Patrol. lxxxix. 645), and there is no mention of a festival of St. Michael in the list of festivals given in the statutes of St. Boniface (ib. 824).

with St. Michael, and it seems possible, on the authority of a MS. Synaxarion, to associate this with the dedication of the church of St. Michael in Sosthenium, near Constantinople; though, from the almost total absence of allusions to such a festival, it must be viewed as at any rate of not more than a local celebration. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. ii. 3), in describing the building of Constantinople by Constantine, and referring to the numerous churches with which it was adorned, mentions as especially famous one situated in a place formerly known as the Hestiae, but afterwards as Μιχαήλιον, so called from the belief that the archangel had manifested himself, and from the miracles supposed to have been wrought by his means. It may be noted here that Nicephorus Callistus (Hist. Eccles. vii. 50) mentions two churches built by Constantine, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τῷ Ἀνάπλῳ, καὶ ὁ Σωσθένιον ὁ χῶρος κληῖται ᾧμιούρησεν. It is not quite clear here whether he is referring to two distinct localities (so Valesius, note to Sozomen, in loc.), or means that the title Sosthenium had been given to the Anapulus. On this point it may be noted that the heading to the chapter in Sozomen, to whomsoever it may be due, speaks of the Sosthenium as though it were the same as the Hestiae or Anapulus, and that Cedrenus (p. 498) refers to the church, τοῦ ἀρχιστρατήγου ἐν τῷ Ἀναπλῷ καὶ Σωσθενίῳ. Theophanes merely speaks of the place as the Anapulus (p. 34, ed. Classen). Nicephorus certainly only describes one locality, namely, on the Thracian side of the Bosphorus, and thirty-five stadia of direct distance from Constantinople, in the direction of the Euxine.

This will be the most convenient place for referring to the other churches dedicated to St. Michael in or near Constantinople. The emperor Justinian, we are told by Procopius, levelled to the ground two churches of St. Michael, one in the Anapulus, and the other on the Asiatic side, which had become very dilapidated, and rebuilt them again in a very costly manner at his own expense (de aedificiis Justiniani, i. 8). From the following chapter we find that the same emperor built on the Asiatic side of the straits another church to St. Michael. Besides all these, Duncange (Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iv. pp. 97, 186) mentions no fewer than fifteen other churches dedicated to St. Michael in or near Constantinople, besides a church τῶν ἑννεα ταγμάτων (i. e. of the nine orders of angels). Procopius also tells us (ii. 10) of a very large church of St. Michael built by Justinian at Antioch.

(4.) In the Coptic church we find June 6 and the two following days kept as first, second, and third feast of St. Michael (Selden, p. 240; also Ludolf, p. 418). It may be observed that in the Ethiopic calendar, while the first of these three days forms one of the monthly festivals of St. Michael, the second and third days do not enter into the feast, but on the second is a commemoration of St. Gabriel.

(5.) Besides all the above, the Ethiopic church commemorates St. Michael on the twelfth day of each month, that is of their own calendar, answering in different months to a day varying from the ninth to the fifth of our own (Ludolf, in loc.).

(6.) Thus far the name of Michael, either alone or in connexion with the angels generally, has entered into the titles of the different festivals. We may add further that there are commemorations in the Ethiopic church of Seraphim and Cherubim on November 9 and June 27 (Ludolf, pp. 398, 420), and on November 4 of "equi cherubini" (ibid. 397, where see note), and on November 30 of Seraphim (ibid. 399) in both the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars.^m

In connexion with this part of our subject, we may call attention in passing to the doctrine of guardian angels, a doctrine anciently believed in by the Jews, fully ratified by our Lord, and always held more or less definitely by the church.ⁿ A festival of the "Guardian Angel" seems often to have been held, particularly in Spain, on various days, especially March 1. At quite a late date, it was definitely fixed in the Roman church for October 2, by Paul V. (ob. A.D. 1621) and Clement X. (ob. A.D. 1676).

In conclusion, one or two further remarks in connexion with the observance of festivals of St. Michael, that have not fitted into our main subject, may here be added.

No office for a festival of St. Michael is found in Pamelius's Ambrosian or Mabillon's Gallican Liturgy; but in the Sacramentarium Bobianum is a mass in honore Sancti Michaelis. The collect for the day in the Gregorian Sacramentary has passed through the Sarum missal, with but slight modification, into our own prayer-book. The epistle in the Comes, as edited by Pamelius (Liturgg. Lat. ii. 47) is Rev. i. 1-5, which, though also that of the Sarum missal, has not been retained in the prayer-book. The gospel in the Comes and missal is the same as our own, Matt. xviii. 1-10. In the Mozarabic missal, the propheta, epistle, and gospel are Rev. xii. 7-17 [this is read for the epistle in the Sacramentarium Bobianum, of which vv. 7-12 form the epistle in our own church], 2 Thess. i. 3-12, Matt. xxv. 31-46. The gospel in the Sacr. Bobianum is Matt. xvii. 1-17 (Patrol. lxxxv. 875, where see Leslie's note).

Several orders of knighthood claim the archangel as their patron saint, e.g. the French order founded by Louis XI. in 1469. The order of the Wing [del Ala], i. e. of St. Michael, said to have been founded by Alphonso, king of Portugal (ob. A.D. 1185), in memory of a victory over the Moslems, appears, however, a very doubtful affair altogether.

Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article, I have to express considerable obligation to Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, iii. 281 sqq.), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, v. i. 465 sqq.), and Stilling (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 29). Reference may also be made to Stengelius, C., de Michaelis archangeli principatu, apparitionibus, templis, cultu et miraculis (Aug. Vind., 1629); Maius, J. B., de Festo Michaelis, Kilon., 1698;

^m It may be noted that in the Calendar as given by Selden (p. 226), these days are noted respectively, as of the "four angelic living creatures," and of the "twenty-four elders," probably with reference to Rev. iv. 4.

ⁿ The following beautiful prayer in connexion with the Guardian Angel deserves to be cited, from the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Basil:—ἀγγελον εἰρημικόν τῇ ἐκάστῃ ἡμῶν ζωῇ παρακατάσσεισον, φρουροῦντα, διατρούοντα, διαφυλάσσοντα, φωτίζοντα, ὀδηγοῦντα ἡμᾶς εἰς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθόν (Renaudot, p. 81).

MILAN, COUNCILS OF (Mediolanensia Concilia). The two first councils of Milan were held within a year of each other, with the council of Sardica between them, and have been called the first and second under pope Julius.

(1) A.D. 346, at which the semi-Arian profession of the year before, called the Macrotyche, was rejected (Mansi, ii. 1369).

(2) A.D. 347, at which Photinus, metropolitan of Sirmium, was condemned, and Valens and Ursacius received into communion on abjuring Arianism (Mansi, iii. 159-62).

(3) A.D. 355, at which the emperor Constantius was present, and the condemnation of St. Athanasius was once more decreed, all who would not agree to it being exiled. Marcellus and Photinus were condemned in the same breath. It is said to have been attended by upwards of 300 bishops, but as only thirty seem to have subscribed to what was decreed against St. Athanasius, the majority must either have remained passive or withdrawn. Foremost among those thirty were Valens and Ursacius, who had renounced Arianism at the previous council. The synodical letter addressed to Eusebius of Vercelli, who, therefore, could not have been present, though he had been invited to it, was, in all probability, their composition. (Mansi, iii. 233-50.)

(4) A.D. 380, at which the charges brought against a virgin named Indicia were pronounced false, and her accusers condemned. (Mansi, iii. 517. Comp. St. Ambr. Ep. 5 and 6, ed. Ben.)

(5) A.D. 390, when Jovinian and his followers, who had been condemned at Rome for heresy by pope Siricius, had a similar sentence passed upon them by St. Ambrose and his suffragans. The subscriptions to their letter, indeed, hardly bear out its heading. (Mansi, iii. 689 and 663-7.)

(6) A.D. 451, attended by Eusebius, bishop of Milan, and eighteen suffragans, their deputies having returned from the East; when the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, which had been sent thither by them, was read, and having been found consonant to scripture and antiquity—above all to what had been written on the Incarnation by St. Ambrose—was approved. (Mansi, vi. 527 and 141.)

(7) A.D. 679, at which a letter was addressed to the emperor Constantine Pogonatus by Mansuetus, bishop of Milan and his suffragans, in anticipation of the sixth council; and accompanied by a dogmatic profession of high interest, in connexion with the creed then in use. (Mansi, xi. 203-7.) [E. S. Ff.]

The second, formerly confused with the first, was held A.D. 416: for its eight first canons condemning Pelagianism, also see 109-16 of the African code. Of the remaining nineteen, the 23rd is not found in that code at all; while the 20th suggests that the first half of canon 106 in the code has been interpolated. The rest are to be found up and down the code, disconnectedly, not always forming whole canons. (Mansi, iv. 325-49, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS.) [E. S. Ff.]

MILITARY SERVICE. Militia in later usage appears to include the performance of any public service, either civil or military

(see Ducange, Gloss.). So Augustine (Serm. 82, § 3, de Diversis, vol. v. p. 1905; Migne, Patrol.) says that Holy Scripture in speaking of soldiers does not mean those only who are occupied in active warfare (armatâ militiâ), but that every one uses the weapons of his own special warfare, and thus is enrolled as a soldier in his own grade (quisque militiae suae cingulo utitur, dignitatis suae miles describitur). In Latin writers the word has a triple meaning: the Militia Palatinalis belonging to the officers of the palace; Castrensis to military service in the camp; and Cohortalis to civil service in the provinces. (See Vales, Not. in Soz. H. E. v. 4; Bingham, Eccl. Ant. iv. 4, § 1.)

It also applied to those who held lands, possessions, or titles by tenure of feudal service. Thus, e.g., the Laws of the Lombards (lib. iii. tit. 8, c. 4) provide that no "miles" of a bishop, abbat, or abess shall lose his fief (beneficium) without being convicted of a crime. In Anglo-Saxon chronicles the title "miles" is commonly used to describe those who were attached in any capacity to the household of a prince. For examples see Ducange (Gloss.). So Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 83. Sigismund, king of Burgundy, speaks of the title of patrician conferred upon him by the emperor Anastasius as "militiæ titulos," and Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. c. 42) speaks of the patriciate which a certain Mummulus obtained from king Guntram as a "militia." Sometimes it appears to be used simply for any rewards given in return for service. Thus Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 39) speaks of the widow of a certain Badegilsus, bishop of Le Mans, claiming some property which was alleged to have been given to the see, as the hire given personally to her husband (haec est militia viri mei); and (id. x. c. 19) speaking of the treasures left by a certain bishop Egidius, says that those of them which were the produce (militia) of evil doing were carried into the king's treasury.

Thus in ecclesiastical writers the word is often found expressing any kind of service either civil or military. The Apostolic Canons (c. 82) provide that any of the clergy wishing to retain any public employment (στρατεῖς σχολάζων), so as to serve both the emperor and the church, were to be deposed, on the ground of the command, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." (See Beverege, Not. in loco, and Bingham, Eccl. Ant. vi. 4, § 9.) Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24) narrates that a council of Constantinople, A. D. 360, deposed one Neonas, bishop of Seleucia, because he had admitted to holy orders certain men who were bound to civic offices, πολιτευόμενοι (see Vales, Not. in loco). A capitulary of Constantine (Cod. Leg. Offic. de Episc. et Cler.) speaks of the curiae to which certain men belonged as "officia quibus militant." It is often also especially applied to ecclesiastical service. In the Ordo Romanus, c. 1, the members of the procession that precedes the pontiff to the church are ordered to walk in the order of their respective offices (partibus prout militavit). Gregory the Great (Ep. iii. 11) speaks of the servants of the church as "militia clericatus." St. Remigius (Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. i. 205) speaks of the lectors' service as "militia lectorum."

In the more limited meaning of warfare it must be considered—

I. As regards the laity. The profession of arms in the earlier days of the church appears to have been considered with some distrust, as scarcely compatible with the Christian character, since it necessitated the shedding of blood and taking part in capital punishments. None of the councils, however, venture to prohibit it. The first council of Nice indeed (c. 12) orders that those who had made profession of the faith and cast away the military belt, and then returned to the service and given money to be restored to their rank, should be for three years among the hearers and then for ten years among the prostrators. But this canon appears to have referred to some particular case, very probably to that of soldiers who had quitted the army rather than commit idolatry, and then, repenting of what they had done, regained their position on condition of offering sacrifice. (See Bingham, Eccl. Antiq. xi. c. 5, § 10.) The first council of Arles, A. D. 314 (c. 3, Bruns, Canones, ii. p. 107) appears to recognise the fact that the profession of Christianity should not be made an excuse for evading the duties of citizenship, by excommunicating those who throw down their arms in time of peace. Another reading is "in time of war." The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. c. 32) provide that a soldier who applies for baptism should promise to obey the injunctions given to soldiers by John the Baptist, to do injury to no man, to accuse no man falsely, and to be content with their hire. If he gave that promise he was to be admitted, if he refused to do so, to be rejected.

Ecclesiastical writers treat the subject very much in accordance with their own personal temperament, the ground taken by those who deny that a Christian can continue to be a soldier being always that some of the duties required by a military profession are incompatible with the laws, or at least with the spirit, of Christianity. Tertullian, as might be expected, is most outspoken and uncompromising. In answering the question whether a soldier in uniform can be admitted to the church, he asks in return whether there can be a soldier who is not obliged to take part in bloodshed and capital punishments, and again inquires how a Christian can possibly fight without the sword which his Lord has taken from him (de Idol. c. 19). Again (de Coron. Milit. c. 11), in answering the question whether warfare in any way is a lawful occupation for a Christian, he contrasts the ordinary duties of a soldier with the position of a believer. How, he asks, can a son of peace make war, or he whose duty it is to cast out idols guard an idol's temple? How can one who is forbidden to burn incense submit to have his own corpse burned by military rule? The case is different, he adds, when those who were actually soldiers were converted, as the soldiers who came to John the Baptist and the believing centurion. In such cases a believer ought either to desert at once, which, he asserts, is a common practice, or to be resolute not to be compelled to perform duties which are forbidden by the laws of his Christian faith. Faith, he adds, knows not the meaning of the word compulsion. But in other places he admits that his opinion had not been generally acted on by Christians. "We fill your camps," he says (Apologet. c. 37), "we man your fleets, and serve in your armies" (id. c. 42.) The well-known legend of the Thundering Legion proves also that Christians were in considerable numbers in the army of the emperor Aurelius (Euseb. E. H. v. 5). Origen (contra Cels. viii. §§ 73, 74), in answering the question of Celsus why Christians do not bear arms and bring help to the emperor, admits the fact that they were unwilling to take up arms and slay men, but alleges that as priests they were ever warring with their prayers for the emperor, and thus serving him with better weapons than they would have used in the army. Lactantius (Institutiones, vi. c. 20) considers any occupation that implies shedding of blood is unfit for a Christian.

The same ground is taken by Paulinus of Nola (Epist. ad Milet., Ep. 25; Migne, Patrol.).

Another class of writers take a milder view, and speak with more hesitating utterance. Basil (Epist. ad Amphiloch., Class 2, Ep. 188, § 13; Migne, Patrol.), while admitting that bloodshed in lawful war is innocent, says that those who commit it contract a certain impurity, and should abstain from communion for three years. The Greeks used this canon as an argument against the emperor Phocas, when he insisted that the soldiers who fell in battle on his side should be inserted in the book of martyrs (see note, Migne, Patrol. in loco).

It is not clear whether Leo the Great (Epist. ad Rustic. c. 12) is speaking specially of military service or of secular business in general when he forbids penitents to return to the warfare of the world (militiam secularem), on the ground of the apostolic injunction, "no man that warreth entangleth himself in the affairs of this life;" and because no man is free from the snares of the devil who involves himself in worldly warfare (militia mundana), adding (c. 14) though the occupation may be lawful in itself.

A very different view is taken by Augustine. He says (Ep. Class iii. 189, c. 4; Migne, Patrol.) that it is wrong to suppose that no soldier can serve God while engaged in actual warfare, giving as examples David and Cornelius, the soldiers who came to John the Baptist, and the centurion who came to our Lord. Again (De Diversis Quaest. i. 4) he owns there are many bad soldiers, but adds they are those who do not conform to military discipline, just as many Christians become bad when they disobey the commands of their master Christ, and (Serm. 302, c. 16, Migne, Patrol.) it is not their evil occupation but their evil hearts (non militia sed malitia) which makes soldiers evil men; and in another place asserts that he is not guilty of homicide who slays men in lawful battle, "Deo auctore" (De Civit. Dei, i. cc. 21-26).

In later years all doubt on the subject quite disappeared, and war began to be considered even meritorious when undertaken against unbelievers, or on behalf of the interests of the church. Pope Stephen II. (Ep. 144, Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. ii. 10) encouraged the Gauls to take up arms in defence of the church, adding that he felt quite sure that St. Peter would be lenient to the sins of those who fell in the service of his church. Rabanus Maurus (de Eccl. Discip. ii. 5) asserts that those who engage in a just war are innocent, since they are only obeying the lawful commands of their sovereign. Hincmar of Rheims (Epist. ad Car. Calv. cc. 9, 10) says that those who declare war and those who fight as soldiers in a just cause are blameless, and (c. 11) that a soldier who shed blood in lawful warfare is innocent, the responsibility resting with the king. Neither was any difficulty made about sending the soldiers from church fiefs when land was held by ecclesiastical persons under feudal tenure. Hincmar of Rheims, in his Epistle to Hadrian (Opp. ed. Paris, 1645, ii. 608), urges very sensibly that if the church holds lands under the laws of the king, they must render to the king the duties belonging to them; and (Ep. 46) says to send forces to the army of the king is simply to render to Caesar what is due to Caesar. The second council of Vern (A.D. 844, c. 8) provides that when bishops were prevented by illness from bringing their forces themselves, they should send them under proper leaders. It is needless to multiply proofs of this, as will be seen in the following section; the great difficulty was to prevent the clergy from themselves leading their troops and engaging in actual warfare.

II. As relates to the clergy. These were always strictly forbidden to bear arms. The first council of Toledo, A.D. 398 (c. 8), forbids anyone who after baptism has put on the military belt to be raised to the office of a deacon. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (c. 7), anathematizes all who, having been once enrolled among the clergy, return either to warfare or to secular employment. The first council of Tours, A.D. 460 (c. 5), excommunicates all clergy who shall engage in warfare. The council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 1), speaking of the case of clergy who might be in a besieged city, provides that all who minister at the altar should positively abstain from shedding human blood; those who had done so, even in the case of an enemy, should be removed for two years not only from their office, but from communion. The two years were to be spent in fasting, prayers, and almsgiving. At the end of two years they might be restored, but never promoted to higher stations. The penance might be protracted at the will of the bishop, if not performed to his satisfaction. The first council of Maçon, A.D. 581 (c. 5), provides that any clergy wearing arms shall be kept for thirty days on bread and water. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 19), forbids that any employed in secular warfare or pursuit (militia) should be ordained; and c. 44 provides that clergy who have willingly borne arms in any revolt shall lose their rank, and be sent for discipline to a monastery. The council of Lestines, A.D. 743 (c. 2), forbids any of the clergy to wear arms or to accompany armies, except one or two bishops with their chaplains in attendance on the prince, and one presbyter attached to each division of the army. The first council of Soissons, A.D. 744 (c. 3), forbids abbats to bear arms, even those who by their feudal tenure were obliged to send soldiers from their lands. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 37), provides that clergy who wore arms should lose their offices.

Leo I. (Epist. 3, §§ 4, 5) orders that if any baptized person has engaged in warfare, he shall not be admitted into holy orders, giving as a reason that soldiers are obliged to execute the commands of their superior officer, however unlawful they may be. It may also be noted that the canon of Basil just given, forbidding any who have shed blood to be admitted to communion for three years, would effectually prevent the clergy from bearing arms.

That the clerical office was held to imply incapacity for bearing arms is also implied in the law of Honorius (Cod. Theod. vii. lib. 20; De Veteran. leg. 12), which forbids anyone to enter the clerical office in order to excuse himself from serving in the army on plea of being an ecclesiastical person. [See PRINCES, CONSENT OF.]

In practice, however, it is evident that these injunctions were occasionally transgressed upon many pleas. It appears to have been not uncommon for monks and clergy to accompany an army to the field for the purpose of helping it with their prayers. Bede (H. E. ii. 2) speaks of the slaughter at Westchester of a great number of monks of Bangor who had assembled to help the army of the Britons by their prayers, and whom he calls an army (militia); and (i. 20, p. 57) of Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, who took command, on an emergency, of the army of the Britons, and defeated the Picts and Scots by the weapons of prayer and praise. The transition from such weapons to those of a more secular kind was easy. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 30) speaks of James, bishop of Nisibis, acting as general (στρατηγός) of the forces of the city during the siege by Sapor, and using his engineering skill in directing the working of the machines upon the walls; but it is added that he himself took no personal share in the defence, but remained all the time within the church in prayer; the enemy were finally discomfited without bloodshed by a plague of gnats and flies which arrived in answer to his prayer. Other clergy do not appear to have been so careful to observe the nice distinction between advice and action, especially in cases where the interests of the church were concerned. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 15) speaks of one Marcellus, a bishop of Apamea, who led a band of soldiers and gladiators against the pagans, and was slain in the affray. It is added, proving that his conduct was considered meritorious, that the council of the province prohibited his relatives from attempting to avenge his death, on the ground that they should rather give thanks that he was accounted worthy to die in such a cause. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. 43) speaks of two prelates, Salonius and Sagittarius, who wore armour and slew many men with their own hands in battle. Boniface of Mayence (Ep. ad Zach.) asked the pope's advice about certain bishops who fought armed and shed blood with their own hands; the answer was, that such should be deposed. Paul Warnefrid (Hist. Longobard. v. 40) applauds the bravery of one Zeno, a deacon of Ticene, who went into battle clad in the robes of Cunibert, king of the Lombards, and was killed in his place.

In later days, when the church began to hold lands under the feudal system, it seems that in some cases the bishops were expected to come in person to the army of their sovereign. Charles the Bald (Sirmond, Conc. Ant. Gall. iv. pp. 143-145) brings a charge against a bishop named Vuenilo that he had not helped him in his advance against the enemy either in his own person or with the forces that it was his duty to bring. Hincmar of Rheims (Ep. 26), writing to pope Nicholas, speaks of himself and his fellow bishops as going with the king against the Bretons and Normans, according to the custom of the kingdom. See also Flodoard (Vita Hincmar. iii. 18). The second council of Vern, A.D. 844 (c. 8), when providing that bishops who are weak of body shall send their forces under command of one of the king's officers, indicates that it was the usual custom for bishops to lead their forces in their own persons.

But efforts were continually made to keep the clergy as far as possible from actually mingling in war. A capitulary of Charles the Great (Capit. iii. c. 141; Migne, Patrol. xcvii. 814) provides that no priest shall accompany the army, except two or at most three bishops elected by the others, for the purpose of prayer and benediction, and with them chosen priests of good learning, and with the permission of their own bishops, who should celebrate divine service, attend to the sick, and especially take care that no one died without receiving the holy sacrament. They were not to bear arms, nor to go into battle, nor shed blood, but to employ themselves in their proper duties. Those ecclesiastics who held fiefs which obliged them to provide soldiers, were to send their men well armed, and they themselves to remain at home and pray for the army. Hincmar of Rheims, whatever his own practice may have been, gives very good advice upon the subject. In his epistle to the bishops (Opp. ii. 159, cc. 4, 5) he says that the soldiers due from the possessions of the church were to be sent under their appointed leaders to the help of the prince, but that the bishops themselves were to give advice and use all their efforts to arrest the effusion of blood. The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 37), provides that clergy are not to carry arms on pain of losing their grade; also (c. 47), that bishops should send their forces under the command of some of the church vassals (ex subditis et ecclesiasticis ministris), chosen with the consent of the archbishop. A curious provision follows: that such leaders should not indulge in any idle hope of succeeding to the bishopric, unless in accordance with the provision made by Gregory the Great, for which see PRINCES, CONSENT OF.

But the literature of the period abounds in indications that many bishops and abbots preferred the excitement of the camp to the seclusion of the cloister or the monotony of pastoral duty. [P. O.]

MILK or MILKPAIL (IN ART). Milkpails are represented in the Callixtine catacomb, 6th cubiculum of St. Callixtus (Aringhi, vol. i. p. 557). In these two paintings the Lord seems to be shepherd and lamb, or priest and sacrifice. The lamb in any case is bearing the mulctra, with the pastoral staff. It may be supposed that the vessel which often accompanies the Good Shepherd is of the same kind. (See Buonarroti, vi. 2.)

On some sarcophagi (see Bottari, pl. xx.; Aringhi, vol. i. p. 291; Maffei, Verona Illustr. iii. p. 54) shepherds are represented in the act of milking their flocks. On the whole it seems more likely (see Ezekiel xxv. 4; Heb. v. 12, 13; 1 Cor. iii. 2; 1 Peter ii. 2) that the mulctra refers to the preaching of the Gospel, than to the Eucharist.

The milkpail is sometimes taken as a symbol of spring (Bottari, iii. 62); and Martigny quotes a couplet to this effect from the Calendarium Bucherianum [CALENDAR, p. 256].

MILK AND HONEY. A mixture of milk and honey was in ancient times commonly administered to infants immediately after baptism (Tertullian, *de Cor. Milk and honey were also on certain occasions offered on the altar. See HONEY AND MILK, p. 783; LITURGY, p. 1021, § 16. [C.]

MINIATURE (Miniatura). This term is derived from minium, or red lead, the pigment universally made use of in the earliest days of ornamental writing, in order to decorate the capital letters, titles, and margins of various

MSS. Hence also Rubric, as the Service-books, which employed the attention of the most skilful copyists, were generally most freely ornamented; and red, or minium, is always preferred, where any single colour is used to relieve black and white MS.

It will be convenient to separate throughout the subject of ornamental writing [LITURGICAL BOOKS] from that of miniatures proper. These illustrate the text, but they are not part of the writing, or dependent on it. They may illustrate the facts narrated, and be pictures of architecture, ceremonial, costume, or action; or may be actual portraits. Frequently they involve spirited or grotesque representations of birds, beasts, fishes, insects, and reptiles, done in a naturalistic way, and purely for the sake of the drawing. In this case, they are called "illuminations" in the 12th century, when naturalistic skill was prevailing over grotesque fancy. About the end of that century, says Dom Guéranger (Institutions Liturgiques, vol. iii. p. 368), "begins the reign of illuminators." They took the subjects of their richly decorative borders from the vegetable kingdom, and imitated leaves, flowers, and fruits, with wonderful exactness, and often proceeded to insects or precious stones, in search of brilliant and sparkling objects of imitation.

The earlier miniatures which come within our period are of a very different character. The separation between ornamental writing and illustrative miniature is at once wide and narrow. A miniature is of course always a part of the ornament of a page of MS.; but it may not be artistically connected with the written text. As Professor Westwood observes, "the earliest MSS. with miniatures (and they are among the oldest which have survived to our times) simply contain small square drawings let into the text, without any ornamental adjuncts." He mentions three of these invaluable relics, preserved in the Imperial Library at Vienna, namely, a Roman Calendar, described by Schwartz (de Ornamentis Librorum, ed. 1756, p. 38), as "egregium vetustatis monumentum atque pulcherrimum Bibl. Vindobon. cimelium." It contains allegorical figures of the months, eight in number, each about eight inches high, finely draped and exquisitely drawn; and they are supposed to have been executed as early as the reign of Constantine II.* Also the famous purple Greek Codex Genesios, with forty-court, Peinture, pl. xxvi.), written for the empress Juliana Anicia at the beginning of the 6th century, and ornamented with her portrait and many miniatures, and drawings of plants. These are described by Lambecius (Bibliotheca Vindobonensis, Vienna, 1665). D'Agincourt gives, copies of the illustrations of the Vatican Virgil which Westwood says may go back to the time of Constantine; and these, too, are in simple rectangular form, and though both beautiful and illustrative, are not decorative. The last word will be confined throughout this article to miniatures which are connected with the writing of a page and form part of its whole effect. It would seem that in almost all the early codices the text was everything to the scribe, and all the ornament belonged to it, as to a sacred thing. Hence the great attention paid to gold and silver writing, and the constant habit of enclosing miniatures in capital letters, where they were brought into unity with the rest of the page as a pictorial composition.

It is curious, further to distinguish decoration from illustration and graphic ornament from miniature, that they have by no means flourished and decayed altogether in the same place or at the same time. From the 6th to the 9th centuries is certainly a time of general collapse, except in the Irish, Hebridean, and Northumbrian monasteries; and few illuminated MSS. can be pointed out as certainly executed during that period, or until Charlemagne's revival of art in the 9th. But in our own country, in the 7th and 8th centuries, while miniature painting had fallen so low as to be simply distressing to the modern observer, extraordinary skill was manifested in ornamented writing. "It is impossible," says Professor Westwood, "to imagine anything more childlike than the miniatures contained in the splendid Hibernian and Anglo-Saxon MSS. of this period. Neither can miniature be said to have materially improved between the 8th and 11th centuries, the drawing of the human figure being rude, the extremities singularly and awkwardly attenuated, and the draperies fluttering in all directions." (See the illustrations in Palaeogr. Sacra from the Irish psalter preserved in St. John's College, Cambridge, and Ruskin, The Two Paths, Lect. I.)

In the present article we have only to deal, strictly speaking, with the subject of ornamental writing as to the capital letters (heads of capitula or chapters), which may not only be rubricated or ornamented letters, but contain pictures illustrative of the text. But it is difficult to observe this distinction in Anglo-Saxon, Irish, and, indeed, in Visigothic MSS. The grotesques of the latter often mould the letters themselves into conventional forms of birds, flowers, and animals, often of great graphic vigour; and the extraordinary curves and interlacings of the two former are full of serpentine and lacertine forms. The Irish MSS. are different. The delicacy and decision of their working is incredible (see Palaeographia Sacra, Gospels of Moeiel Brith MacDurnan, and Book of Kells), but the miniatures display a kind of fatuity and morbid indifference to accuracy, beauty, and all else, which is a curious anomaly, and suggests a somewhat unhealthy asceticism. It is doubtless true that their delicacy and precision of execution were unrivalled by continental artists of their time, or indeed of any other period. There can be no doubt, also, that missionaries from the Celtic parts of Britain, as St. Gall and Columban, carried their arts and religion to various parts of the continent, and we may assert with Professor Westwood, that many of the splendid capital letters of the Carolingian period were executed in imitation of our earlier codices; though he admits that the best Franco-Gallic MSS. drew much of their elegant foliage ornament from remembrances of classic art.

But those who study such MSS. as the Irish psalter above-mentioned, and some English specimens, will think there is considerable ground for the somewhat ill-tempered observations of the Benedictine Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, ii. 122: "Les ornemens des liturgies Anglo-Saxonnes semblent n'être le fruit que d'imaginations atroces et mélancoliques. Jamais d'idées riantes, tout se ressent de la dureté du climat. Lorsque la génie ne manque pas absolument, un fond de rudesse et de barbarie caractérise d'autant mieux les MSS. et les lettres historiées qu'on a plus affecté d'embellir." It is possible, however, that these lacertine and ophidian forms may have vague reference to Eastern symbolism of the serpent, and be one more link of connexion between the British and Oriental churches. The finest known instances of animal-initial letters are perhaps the evangelic symbols of the four gospels in the evangeliary of Louis-le-Débonnaire. (See Count Bastard, Peintures des Manuscrits, vol. ii. and GROTESQUE, p. 750.)

II. Illustrative miniatures date from a very early period. They are found in Egyptian papyri. Pliny says (Hist. Nat. xxv. c. 2) that certain physicians painted, in their works, the plants they had described, as in the Anician Dioscorides; and in xxxv. c. 2 he says that Cicero gave Varro great credit for introducing portraits of more than 700 illustrious persons into his works. Seneca (de Tranquill. Anim. ix.) speaks of books as illustrated (cum imaginibus). Martial says (Epigr. 186):

"Quam brevis immensum cepit membrana Maronem Ipsius vultum prima tabella gerit."

Fabricius (Bibl. Lat. cur. Ernesti, i. p. 125) gives the title of a book by Varro on miniature painting, called Hebdomadum, sive de imaginibus libri.

The earliest MSS. with miniatures (some of the oldest remaining to our times) contain, as has been said, only small square or rectangular drawings let into the text. Those of the Viennese MSS. and the Vatican Virgil have been mentioned; Professor Westwood also names an liad in the Ambrosian Library at Milan with miniatures (not yet published, though announced), and the Syriac evangeliary of Rabula at Florence (6th century) is another example. In our own country the gospels of St. Augustine survive, and are referred to the 6th century (Pal. Sacra); also the Golden Greek canons (Brit. Mus. MSS. Add. No. 5111). Though writing still flourished in the 8th century in Ireland and Northumbria, pictorial power seems to have fallen very low, or to have been possessed only by Visigoths, or by the Lombards, whose early efforts chiefly took the direction of sculpture. The Carolingian Revival or "renaissance" was certainly influenced by Byzantine art, and a reference to D'Agincourt (Peinture, early examples) will shew that the Greek workmen had not lost heart and skill like those of Western Europe, and that Greece was to teach the world once more. Greek miniature-art, at all events, never fell so low in the dark ages as that of the Western Empire, always retaining a hold on classic art. Two MSS. of the 9th and 10th centuries are mentioned by Professor Westwood as containing beautiful allegorical figures, personifying Night, with robes powdered with stars and an inverted torch, and the Angels of Fire and Cloud, with the march of Israel through the Wilderness.

The beautiful work of Count Bastard contains every necessary gradation of examples of the progress made in the first eight centuries, from simple writing in red letters, with dotted borders or strokes, to highly ornamented letters—then to letters formed by grotesques of natural objects—finally to completed pictures of persons or things. Books on purple or azure vellum sometimes, though rarely, contain miniatures, as do the 11th century purple Psalter in the Bodleian Library, that in the library of the convent of the Remonstrants at Prague, and the splendid chrysograph of St. Médard of Soissons in the Bibliothèque Nationale (Bastard, vol. ii.). This contains, as Guéranger says, various "gracieux et étonnans édifices." The Menology of Basil is a storehouse of examples of Byzantine architecture, resembling the buildings found in some of the earliest Italian paintings. Much information on this subject will be found, in the most agreeable form, in the earlier chapters in Curzon's Visits to Monasteries in the Levant.

The MS. of Rabula is described by Westwood and Guéranger, and the former gives a beautiful illustration in colour (Pal. Sacra) of the miracle of Bethesda. The whole of the Rabula miniatures are given by Assemani, in his catalogue of the Laurentian Library. Under articles ASCENSION, CRUCIFIX, DEMONIACS, and JUDAS, in this Dictionary, will be found woodcut outlines of some of these.

Interlaced work, Gospels of Durrow, 7th century.

Count Bastard's book illustrates the principal French MSS. now in existence, as Professor Westwood's Palaeographia and Irish and Anglo-Saxon MSS. are our chief authority for northern caligraphy and miniature. The French archaeologist virtually gives us access to all the riches of the Bibliothèque Nationale. He begins with a splendid purple page in gold and silver writing from the 6th-century psalter of St. Germain des Prés. The interlaced ornament which prevails over all northern work for centuries after has already begun in a treatise of St. Ambrose (7th century, uncial with capitals). It is by no means confined to northern art, however, as a decided example of it is given in Pal. Sacra, No. 8 in the Arabic gospels; and the Greeks themselves had a braided ornament. For its use on Byzantine capitals see Stones of Venice, vol. ii. pp. 136, 137. Professor Ruskin considers it as decidedly of Arab origin, arising from the necessity for delicately pierced screens and slabs of perforated stone to allow free passage for air, but afford perfect concealment. The Arabs made these perforations in the shape of stars, and connected them by carving the intermediate spaces in the slabs of stone, in the semblance of interwoven fillets, which alternately sank beneath and rose above each other as they met. But its great popularity is founded on the natural taste for intricate ingenuity of line and pattern, which certainly prevails in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.

very remarkably, and, as has been said, attains a rather morbid pitch in the latter. The constant use of wicker and interlaced hurdles in northern life would give this turn to Irish and Anglo-Saxon ornament in particular. But a very pleasing proof of its independent origin in Ireland was lately given by Mr. French, of Bolton. A cross had been ordered to be made, from drawings, in wicker and other plaited work, by some Irish craftsman of great skill, who at last produced one in all respects answering the instructions sent him, except that he had been obliged to insert a circle round the intersection of the limbs as a foundation for the other work. This shews the origin of the peculiar Irish cross with perfect certainty, and the adoption of patterns from wicker-work is obvious. Professor Westwood's authority may be quoted for this anecdote.

The earliest ornament which indicates observation of nature on the part of the caligraphist is in a MS. of extracts from St. Augustine of Hippo (second half of 7th century—the property in the 8th century of Ulric Obrecht, of Strasburg). Birds and flowers are used here, daffodils being carefully observed and drawn, and here the extraordinary Frank fancies of grotesque birds, fishes, and faces seem to begin (Bastard, vol. i.). Beasts and human figures are later, appearing in Carolingian work. The colours are red, green, and brown, with purple and yellow; and interlaced work prevails. Red initials seem to have been used from the earliest date, as they appear in a 5th-century MS. of Prudentius. The first architectural ornament is on a fragment of the canons of Eusebius, of the early 7th century.

A Merovingian MS. of the second half of the 7th century (Bast. vol. i. Recueil des Chroniques de St. Jérôme, d'Idace de Lamégo, Coll. des Jésuites) possesses special interest from the spirited work of some true scribe-draughtsman. Its capital letters are drawn brilliantly and exactly with the pen and without colour (lettres blanches ou à jour), and point to the real origin and principles of caligraphic miniature very admirably. And in some of the best Carolingian MSS. the pen breaks out vigorously in all manner of grotesques. The most amusing triumph of penmanship ever attained, we apprehend to be in an initial portrait of a monk-physician. [See woodcut in GROTESQUE.] No offensive or outrageous allusion or idea seems to occur in any of these records, as might be expected, though in the sacramentary of the abbey of Gellone, 8th or 9th century, there is a crucifixion, with angels, where much blood is used, and the drawing is grim and inferior. It soon recovers, however, in the Visigothic MSS., where many human and angelic figures are represented, and which may perhaps be distinguished from the earliest work by the number of beasts of chase represented in them, boars and hares in particular. One of the former is annexed. The northern taste for distortion here begins to appear in the human figures. One example of an Italian-Lombard MS. is conspicuous for the absence of interlaced work, and for a tendency to geometrical arrangement; which is a marked feature in the French-Lombard examples also. They are more numerous than the Italian, but still dwell on interlacings. The great MS. of St. Médard of Soissons [LITURGICAL BOOKS], written for Charlemagne (Bastard, vol. ii.), contains not only various birds executed with naturalistic accuracy, but grand whole-page miniatures. The use of gold and scarlet in the

No. 2. From the Sacramentary of the Abbaye de Gellone.

Charlemagne MSS. is very brilliant, and new "initiales fleuronées," with evidence of fresh study from nature, occur in Drogo's Sacramentary.

The importance of ancient miniature, as representing architecture, costume, and ceremonial, cannot be overrated, and the picture in Count Vivien's evangeliary of the presentation of the work to Charlemagne is most instructive; but actual portraits are not wanting in some MSS. The emperor Lothaire is represented in his evangeliary with Emma his wife; also Henry III. and the empress Agnes. A MS. is said to be now in the Escorial which contains portraits of Conrad the Salic and Gisela; and the Countess Matilda is depicted in her gospels in the Vatican. The existing Graeco-Latin MSS. before Jerome and the Vulgate do not contain any paintings, and we must pass on to northern art, especially for Irish and Anglo-Saxon miniatures. Professor Westwood's two works contain, or give references for, the whole subject of early caligraphy and drawing. His earlier work puts forth an able, and apparently quite valid, plea for the antiquity of MSS. such as the Gospels of Moeil Brith MacDurnan and the Book of Kells, with that of St. Columba. They seem to date from the earlier Irish or Gaelic missions to the English of Northumbria. But the fac-similes of Irish and Anglo-Saxon miniatures and ornaments constitute an introduction to the history of fine art in Britain, from the Roman occupation to the Norman conquest, and throw a light on the monastic culture of that period. The chief characteristic of the earliest fine Irish or English is the greatly increased size and importance of the capitals and first lines of the text, with their pattern-ornament, which sometimes occupies whole pages, but is often enriched with miniature. They are certainly enough to prove, as Westwood observes, that from the 6th to the end of the 8th century, when art was practically extinct on the continent, a style of work, totally distinct from any other in the world, had been originated, cultivated, and brought to a marvellous state of perfection. Though British, Irish, and Anglo-Saxon pilgrims to Rome and Ravenna doubtless derived various inspirations of sacred art from the study of the great mosaics and of the remaining MSS. in churches or convents; they were taught the faith first at home, and returned home afterwards to execute highly original works of art—the Irish, as it would seem, with less feeling for natural form than the English; but both with a certain natural vigour and innate force of character. Their subjects, as Adam and Eve, Abraham, Moses, and the typical events of the Old Testament, with the miracles of mercy and some events of the Passion of the Lord, are those of Rome and Byzantium; in short, they repeat the universal picture-teaching of the early church, up to the 6th century. But their treatment is their own. Dots, lines, zigzags, interlacings, the serpentine ornament, and, far above all, the trackless intricacy of spiral patterns, entirely distinguish this school from all others.^a The differences between Irish and English MSS. are certainly slight, so that Baeda's assertion that the early church of Britain differed in no respect from the Irish may include their fine art with other matters.

What is here said applies to works of earlier date than the 10th century, when a national style of more gorgeous character arose, in emu-

^a The Book of Durrow, or Gospels of St. Columba, is almost to a certainty written by the saint's own hand, whatever doubt may be felt as to the exact date of the book of Kells. Westwood quotes this from the late Dr. Petrie, and also gives from him the usual request of the scribe for the prayers of the reader, at the end of the Book of Durrow: "Rogo beatitudinem tuam, sancte presbyter Patrici, ut quicumque hunc libellum manu tulerit, meminerit Columbae scriptoris, qui hoc scripsit ipsemet evangelium per xli. dierum spatium, gratia Domini nostri." Below is written, in a contemporary hand, "Ora pro me, frater mi: Dominus tecum sit." All four gospels are contained in the MS.

lation of Charlemagne's great MSS., and when classical ornament (such as that of Count Vivien's Bible, or that of St. Paul without the Walls, D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xlv.) had begun to affect the insular artists.

Single figures predominate in the early Northern codices. In Westwood's folio illustrations (1868) will be found a St. Matthew from the Golden Gospels of Stockholm (6th or 9th century), and a David from the 7th-century psalter of St. Augustine; the symbolic evangelists from the Gospels of Durrow, Trinity College, Dublin, (irresistibly rude and quaint in figure, framed in delicate spirals); the Temptation of our Lord from the Book of Kells, 7th century, with three other splendid illustrations; with pages from the Gospels of Lindisfarne or St. Cuthbert, and two pictures of David, as warrior and psalmist, from the Commentaries on the Psalms by Cassiodorus, "Manu Baedae," in the cathedral library at Durham. He also gives pictures of evangelists from the Gospels of MacDurnan (Archiep. Library, Lambeth), about 850, and the 8th or 9th century Gospels of St. Chad. Those from the Gospels of St. Petersburg and St. Gall are marked by Irish character, and the second childhood of the school appears in the Irish Psalter at St. John's College, Cambridge.^b see suprà, woodcut of Crucifixion. The great Bible of Alcuin, and the psalter of king Athelstan (end of 9th century), are certainly far in advance of any of these as regards progress, and further promise, in representative art. The Irish school was simply devotional, and its working was limited by technical tradition. The artist spent his life in peaceful elaboration of spirals; but he forgot, or was unable, under the painful trials of the time, to learn fresh truths from Greek or Roman sources. Still worse, he seems never by any accident to have looked with hope or pleasure, or in search of fresh subject, on external nature and its beauties. Consequently, he preferred single images of evangelists, constantly ruder and more fantastic as his cloistered life grew fainter and more morbid in its fancies. But in the Nativity, Ascension, and Glorification of our Saviour, and the zodiacal signs of Athelstan's psalter, we have the beginning of early mediæval art in England, with all its life and eagerly-crowded figures, and yet also with its strong stamp of Classicism or Byzantinism. It seems in this most singular and beautiful picture as if a later hand, more purely Gothic, had executed the two lower subjects of the Ascension and Glorification, while the others retain a shade of classical grace in composition. The Ascension greatly resembles that of the great Syriac MS. of Rabula; so much so, as in the mind of the writer to connect the Eastern and English schools of art, and form an important link between the ancient English church and the East.

^b See also the Gospels of MacRegol (Westwood, pl. xvi.), preserved in the Bodleian Library, where St. John's eagle is in tartan chequers. The Book of Kells contains various pictures of events in the life of our Saviour in Irish style, and also some well-drawn animals, as dogs on p. 403, hares, rats, cats, mice, cocks and hens; but the style could never last, still less contend with the splendour and the naturalistic style of the Carolingian MSS.

The Augustinian or Gregorian-Augustinian MSS., one of which is in all probability now preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, No. 286, the other in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, claim priority in time to the English, though probably not to many Irish MSS. Four miniatures, besides a large whole-page figure of St. Luke, are given from them in Palaeographia Sacra.^c Their ornament is purely Romano-Byzantine. They are of the highest interest, as perhaps the oldest known specimens of this kind of Roman pictorial art in this country or elsewhere, and probably a few years anterior to the MS. of Rabula. With the exception of a leaf of St. John's Gospel in Greek, with miniatures of the apostles, now preserved at Vienna with the illuminated Greek Pentateuch of the 4th century, these are held to be the oldest existing specimens of written or painted Roman-Christian iconography. The Entry into Jerusalem, the Raising of Lazarus, the Capture of our Lord, and the Bearing of the Cross, are four out of the twelve subjects of the Cambridge MS. Three of these correspond to those so frequently repeated in the catacomb paintings, and on various sarcophagi. The initials are plain red, and the writing a fine uncial.

A remarkable characteristic, to a colourist, of the Book of Kells and some parts of the Gospel of Moel Brith MacDurnan, is the beautiful use made of different tones and appositions of blue and green. The writer can compare it with nothing he has seen, so well as with the azures, purples, and blue-greens of many of the mosaics of Ravenna, which, with those of Rome, may doubtless have suggested much to northern pilgrims possessed of a style and special powers of their own.

Many curious questions as to the distinguishing characteristics of Classical, Anglo-Saxon, Carolingian, and even Eastern miniatures, have been lately raised by the celebrated Psalter of Utrecht. The date of its extraordinary illustrations seems very doubtful, whatever may be said of the apparently more ancient text. There are insuperable objections to Herr Kist's view that they go back to the time of Valentinian; indeed they appear to the writer more likely to be the work of a travelled and highly educated penman of English, perhaps Northumbrian-English birth, employed in an early Carolingian scriptorium. He may have been a pupil of Alcuin's, was possibly a palmer from the Holy Land, and certainly a "Romeo" or pilgrim to Rome. The drawings seem to be all by one hasty but skilful hand, directed by a mind of infinite facility of idea, and graphic power of realising the idea once formed. The illustrations are of two kinds; caligraphy, strictly speaking, and the pen and ink miniatures. The MS. is a large vellum 4to. in admirable preservation, and contains the whole of the Psalms, according to the Vulgate, with the Apocryphal Psalm 'Pusillus eram,' the Pater Noster, Canticles, Credo, and the Athanasian Creed. All are written throughout in triple columns, in Roman rustic capitals, very like those of the Vatican Virgil as to size (Nouv. Tr. de Dipl. iii. p. 56, pl. 35, fig. iii. 2). The elegance of the letters resembles the Paris Prudentius (Ibid. fig. viii.). The headings and initials are red uncials, and the first line is also uncial, and larger than the rest of the text. By the writing, in fact, the MS., says Professor Westwood, ought to be assigned to the 6th or 7th century; but for the remarkable initial B; of which this is certainly to be said, that those who are acquainted with Count Bastard's Carolingian facsimiles, and Professor Westwood's Saxon reproductions, will probably see that the letter unites the rich use of gold and scarlet of the one with the unmistakable knot-work and ophidian form of the other.

Each psalm has its pen and ink drawing, illustrating its subject with the inventive vigour of the best Gothic age, and not altogether devoid of Scandinavian vehemence of treatment. These works are 165 in number. Had they been executed with any degree of right deliberation, in the colours of any century from the 4th to the 13th, the MS. would have been by far the most valuable in existence. It is not that they are unskilful, but the artist seems always to have been distracted by the effort to catch fleeting fancies, to secure one in any form before another chased it away. In several instances the spaces allowed him by the scribe have not been sufficient. They are left across the whole page, cutting the triple columns of text; but the illustrations sometimes trench upon it, as in the 147th and 148th Psalms, given in Professor Westwood's facsimile. (Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. pl. xxix. and text pp. 15, 16.) The present writer, however, is not disposed to infer from this that these drawings are copied from some earlier MS. They are too original, too inventive, and too unconventional; and, to his apprehension, bear the stamp of a single mind as decidedly as the drawings of Rabula, the Syrian, in the great MS. of the Laurentian Library at Florence.

This MS. was compared, in the first instance, with two others which strongly resemble it. All three must have been copied from some earlier and unknown original; or else, the other two from the Utrecht Psalter. These two are the Harleian Psalter and the Psalter of Eadwine; and they possess the admitted characteristics of Anglo-Saxon work, which are by no means diminished by the presence of ideas drawn from classical sources, and represented according to classical models. For there was so much copying of Graeco-Roman, or classical work, in the scriptoria, that it would seem that late subjects in the pictures prove their recent origin more forcibly than ancient subjects prove their antiquity. The frontispiece and the first page contain difficulties which are repeated throughout the MS. In the first there is a Sun and Moon, the first apparently a human figure seated within an orb, the other a crescent only. David sits below in a round classical temple, with convex vault and a fleur-de-lys finial. An angel dictates to him, in drapery with edges frittered away in the true Anglo-Saxon flutter (see plates xxxii., xlii., xlii. Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.). Opposite him is the representative of the Evil King, or Tyrant, under a regular pediment, on a massive chair, with round arches carved at back, and holding a decidedly northern double-edged sword. He has a toga, with fibula; the capitals of the columns above him and David alike, are convex Byzantine, like some in the Stones of Venice, evidently variations of the composite order. There is a well-sketched river-god below, a tree not unlike those in the Paradise of the Vienna Codex Genesios, and a Hell, into which the Tyrant's guards seem to be hooked and driven. The presence of about 18 hells in the first half of the MS. is certainly much against its pictures being of early date.

The Utrecht Psalter should be compared with the two pages given in Shaw's Dresses and Decorations of the Middle Ages, from the 11th century Anglo-Saxon Calendar (from Cottonian, Julius A 6), and with the 9th or 10th century Prudentius. The likeness of the drawing, especially in the drapery, and the Saxon tightness of legs in so many of the figures, is very striking. Again, in our woodcut from the psalter of Athelstan will be observed the oral or clypeate glory, on its way of transition from the Roman Imago Clipeata to the Vesica of the early Renaissance. This occurs very frequently in the Utrecht Psalter, and will be found in Westwood, plate xxix., but it is rather transitional than classical. Other features indicating lateness of date are the Saxon javelins, some with apparent banderols; the absence of anything like a labarum or cross-vexillum; the long northern trumpets; the organ at Ps. cl. fol. 163; the extraordinary number of devils, often with tridents, passim; and particularly the great monster-mouth of hell, which is certainly late in Christian art, though it may possibly be derived, as an idea, from the roaring mouth in Plato's Phaedrus.

Some of the classical features have been noticed, but besides them there will be found an Atlas, fol. xlvii. v; the Three Fates, fol. 84 r, very well drawn; a zodiac, sun and moon, Ps. 65; a warrior in a Phrygian helmet, fol. xlii. 5; the very classical representations of water, fol. lxxxviii. v. (with griffins); the sun and moon; the double pipes, in fol. xvii. v.; and the chariot of God with four horses, seen in front view, Ps. lxxii. A Crucifixion occurs at fol. 67. (See ORGAN; RESURRECTION; SATAN; SERPENT.)

The palaeographical controversy places its date between the 6th and 9th century, and extends far beyond our limits; but it may be permitted to the author of this article, as a landscapist fairly well acquainted with the scenery of Egypt and Syria, to express his inability to see anything in the least resembling it in the Utrecht Psalter. He cannot find anything like a palm, which no Alexandrian could have omitted; nor like an olive, which is the forest-tree (so to speak) of Syria.

The literature of the Utrecht Psalter is very extensive, but the principal works relating to the MS. itself are as follows: Her Kists, Archief voor Kerkelijke Geschiedenis van Nederland, vol. iv. (Leyden, 1833); the Baron van Westreenen's Investigations, also in the Archief; Professor Westwood's account in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. p. 14; Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, The Athanasian Creed in Connection with the Utrecht Psalter, being a Report to the Right Hon. Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, on a MS. in the University of Utrecht, completed Dec. 1872; the Report addressed to the Trustees of the British Museum on the Age of the MS. by E. A. Bond, E. M. Thompson, Rev. H. O. Coxe, Rev. S. S. Lewis, Sir M. Digby Wyatt, Prof. Westwood, F. H. Dickinson, and Prof. Swainson; with a preface by A. P. Stanley, D.D. Dean of Westminster, 1874; Sir Duffus Hardy's reply, Further Report on the Utrecht Psalter, also in 1874; and, finally, the excellent History, Art, and Palaeography of the Utrecht Psalter, by Walter De Gray Birch, F.R.S.L.

MINISEUS, martyr with Tisicus; commemorated at Laodicea July 23 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. July, v. 389).

[C. H.]

MINISTER. 1. A name frequently given to inferior clergy, in contradistinction to the order or orders above them. Thus Lactantius speaks of "presbyteri et ministri," using the latter word to designate all ranks of clergy below the presbyterate. In the title of the 18th canon of Eliberis the words "sacerdotes et ministri" are used as equivalent to "presbyteres et diacones" in the body of the canon. In the title of can. 33, on the other hand, "ministri" are all the clergy below the rank of bishop. In I. Tours, c. 1, "sacerdotes et ministri ecclesiae" are the whole body of the clergy of the church; where we are probably to understand by "sacerdotes," priests, "ministri" including the other orders. Compare ORDERS, HOLY.

2. Bishops frequently use the term "minister ecclesiae," in subscriptions, as "Ego N. Carnotensis ecclesiae minister," or "Ego M. . . Sanctae Meldensis ecclesiae humilis minister."

3. "Minister altaris" is sometimes used as equivalent to "priest."

4. Archdeacons and archpresbyters are sometimes spoken of as "ministri episcoporum." [C.]

MINISTERIALIS or MINISTRALIS.

(1) Ministerialis Calix is the chalice used for administering the consecrated wine to the faithful, which was often distinct from that used by the priest in the act of consecration.

(2) Ministerialis liber is an office-book, especially an altar-book.

(3) Pope Hilary is said (Liber Pontificalis in Vit. Hil.) to have appointed in Rome "ministrals qui circuirent constitutas stationes;" that is, clergy who should perform the sacred offices in the several churches of Rome where STATIONS were held. [C.]

MINISTERIUM. The vessels and other articles used in the ministry of the altar are called collectively "ministeria sacra." Thus Pope Sixtus (according to the Liber Pontificalis) "constituit ut ministeria sacra non tangerentur nisi a ministris sacris." Pope Urban I., according to Walafrid Strabo (de Reb. Eccl. c. 24), "omnia ministeria sacra fecit argentea."

The word is also used for the Credence-table, on which the vessels were set before they were placed on the altar. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

MINISTRA. When Pliny in his well-known letter (Epist. x. 97) speaks of two female servants or attendants, called ministrae, whom he thought it necessary to put to torture, we see that even in those days the word designated an office-bearer in the church; nor is there any reason to doubt that it is used as equivalent to the Greek διάκονος (Rom. xvi. 1). See DEACONESS. [C.]

MINISTRALIS. [MINISTERIALIS.]

MINISTRY. [ORDERS, HOLY.]

MIRACLE-WORKING. We find a great number of allusions in early times to this pretension, generally made by the founders of new sects. Simon Magus (Acts xiii. 9) was apparently the first of this class of persons to come into collision with the gospel. Another instance is recorded in xix. 13-16, in connexion with the so-called exorcists in Ephesus. The Clementine Recognitions (lib. ii. n. 9), a work of the third century, introduces him as describing himself thus: "I am able to disappear from those who would apprehend me, and, again, I can appear when I please; when I am minded to fly, I can pass through mountains and stones, as through the mire; when I cast myself headlong from a precipice, I am carried as if I were sailing to the earth without harm; when I am bound I can loose myself, and bind them that bound me; when I am close shut up in prison, I can cause the doors to open of their own accord; I can give life to statues and make them appear as living men," etc., etc. Tertullian remarks that Simon Magus, for these juggling tricks and pretended miracles, was anathematized by the apostles and excommunicated; and that such was the invariable rule with regard to this class of men—"et alter Magus qui cum Sergio Paulo, quoniam iisdem adversabatur apostolis, luminum amissione multatus est. Hoc et astrologi retulissent, credo, si quis in apostolos incidisset. Attamen cum Magia punitur, cujus est species astrologia, utique et species in genere damnatur. Post Evangelium nusquam invenias aut sophistas, aut Chaldaeos, aut incantatores, aut conjectores aut Magos, nisi plane punitos" (De Idololatriâ, cap. ix.). The whole treatise is very interesting, and full of information upon this subject. It was written long before the author's lapse into Montanism, and it is singular that the Montanists were among the worst offenders in this pretence to supernatural powers. Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 16) quotes the authority of Apollinaris for his description of their pretended miracles, and relates that they were expelled from communion as being actuated by demons. It was the habit in the early church to refer all this class of impostures, even when recognised clearly as frauds, to diabolical influence. Thus Firmilian, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, writes to Cyprian (Ep. lxxv.), mentioning the case of a woman who counterfeited ecstasies and pretended to prophesy, performed many marvels—"mirabilia quaedam portentosa perficiens"—and boasted that she would cause an earthquake. This woman, he proceeds to say, after having deceived a presbyter, named Rusticus, a deacon, and many lay people, was subjected to exorcism, and so shewn to be a cheat, instead of a person sacredly inspired—"ille exorcista inspiratus Dei gratiâ fortiter restitit, et esse illum nequissimum spiritum, qui prius sanctus putabatur ostendit"—apparently regarding the woman as merely a passive agent; and yet, in the very next sentence, he speaks of her deceiving by "præstigias et fallacias daemonis," and of her assuming to minister the sacraments, and such like. The view taken by the church of such persons was, in fact, not invariably the same. Cases in which the free will of the sufferer was apparently overborne by malign influences from without (obsession), were classed as Δαιμονιζόμενοι (energumens), i.e. possessed, and placed under the care of exorcists. They were regarded as objects of pity, and incurred no censure from the church, being permitted to receive the holy communion as soon as their recovery was made manifest by a time of probation among the audientes. But where it was considered evident that the will of the person in question was in league and co-operative with the evil spiritual influence, i.e. in cases of the claim to working of miracles, found in conjunction with dissoluteness of life, or with heretical teaching, these were treated as involving the most grievous criminality, and punished with the greatest severity. Thus the canons of St. Basil appoint the same punishment for one who confesses himself guilty of sorcery (γοητεία) as for a murderer, i.e. twenty years' penitence. Τὸν γοητείαν ἐξαγορεύοντα τοῦ φονέως χρόνον ἐξομολογεῖσθαι (can. 65). St. Augustine, in his treatise on Heresies, adduces various instances similar to that mentioned above (De Haeres. capp. 23, 26).

We find traces of this practice in more than one passage of the New Testament. Thus, in 2 Tim. iii. 13, πονηροὶ δὲ ἄνθρωποι καὶ γόητες προκόψουσιν ἐπὶ τὸ χεῖρον, πλανῶντες καὶ πλανώμενοι; where we see the connexion pointed out above (1) between forbidden arts and moral depravity, and (2) between the same arts and false teaching. Also, 2 Thess. ii. 9, where exactly the same view is taken, κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ Σατανᾶ ἐν πάσῃ δυνάμει καὶ σημείοις καὶ τέρασιν ψεύδους—in which passage it seems probable that the apostle was speaking of a future whose distinctive forces and tendencies were visible and powerful even in his own time. Theodoret, commenting upon this passage, says: Οὐκ ἀληθῆ θαύματα ποιοῦσι οἱ ἀπὸ τῶν ψήφων τὰς ἐπωνυμίας ἔχοντες; and, similarly, St. Athanasius, Οἱ λεγόμενοι ψηφάδες καὶ πάλιν αὐτοὶ ὁ ἀντίχριστος ἐρχόμενος, ἐν φαντασίᾳ πλανά τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς τῶν ἀνθρώπων (Quaest. 124. ad Antioch.). The great number of laws against the professors of this art are an indication of the favour which it met with among the masses of the Roman population. They may be consulted in Cod. Just. lib. ix. tit. 18, De Maleficis; and Anianus remarks upon a law of Theodosius under this title, "malefici vel incantatores vel immissores tempestatum;" and the Speculum Saxonium, lib. ii. art. 13, par. 6, classes the pursuit of magic with apostasy and poisoning: "Si quis Christianus—apostataverit, vel venenum alicui ministraverit, aut incantaverit," etc. (quoted by Ducange). MISAEAL. [MISHAEL.]

MISERERE. (1) The 51st [Vulg. 50th] Psalm, from its first word in the Vulgate translation. This psalm, as an expression of the deepest humiliation and contrition, is used especially in times of sadness; in the communion of the sick and the burial of the dead both in East and West, and also in the office for penitents and in the office for the dying in the East.

(2) By Miserere we also understand a service for times of humiliation, in which the chanting of the 51st Psalm forms a prominent part. Suitable music for this office has been written by various composers, but the most famous is that of Gregorio Allegri († 1640), which is sung yearly at Rome in the Sistine chapel on the Wednesday and Friday in Holy Week. MISSA, martyr; commemorated in Africa Dec. 5 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MISSA, whence the English "mass," in ecclesiastical usage originally meant the dismissal of the congregation. In later Latin this word was equivalent to missio, as remissa to remissio. Compare ascensa = ascensio, accessa = accessio, collecta = collectio, confessa = confessio, and many others. There appears to have been a custom of dismissing assemblies, whether civil or religious, by proclaiming the words, "Missa est." Thus Avitus archbishop of Vienne, A.D. 490: "In churches, and palaces, and judgment-halls the dismissal (missa) is proclaimed to take place, when the people are dismissed from attendance" (Epist. i.; Migne, lix. 189). Two references in Ducange shew that the word was borrowed by the Greeks for the same use, at least in secular places of assembly. Thus Luitprand (de Rebus per Europ. Gestis, v. 9) says that at Constantinople it was the "custom for the palace to be open to all soon after the early morning, but after the third hour of the day to forbid entrance to every one until the ninth, all being sent out by a signal given, which is mis." In the Chronicon Paschale Alex. it is said that Justinian, in 532, when the sedition of the factions broke out, "gave missae (ἔδωκε μίσσας) to those belonging to the palace, and said to the senators, 'Depart every one to guard his own house'" (p. 624, ed. Niebuhr).

II. Missa Catechumenorum. The word missa was used in the church in reference to the dismissal of the catechumens. Thus, by the Council of Carthage, 398: "That the bishop forbid no one to enter the church and hear the word of God, be he Gentile, or heretic, or Jew, until the dismissal (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 84). St. Augustine, about the same time: "Take notice, after the sermon the dismissal (missa) of the catechumens takes place: the faithful will remain" (Serm. 49, c. 8). Cassian, A.D. 424, speaks of one who was overheard while alone to preach a sermon, and then to "give out the dismissal of the catechumens (celebrare catechumenis missam), as the deacon does" (Coenob. Instit. xi. 15). The council of Valentia, 524: "That the gospels . . . be read before the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 1). The Council of Lerida in the same year decreed that persons living in incest should be allowed to remain in church only to the mass (missam) of the catechumens" (can. 4). The formula of dismissal in the Latin church was in their case, "If there be any catechumen here, let him go out" (Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 336, ed. 2). There is no reason for thinking that they were anywhere warned out by the words which from the 8th century at least (Ordo Rom. i. 21, 24; ii. 15; Mus. Ital. vii.) have been used at the dismissal of the communicants, viz. "Ite, missa est." In the Mozarabic rite, on the Wednesdays in Lent, the priest or deacon addressed the penitents after their last prayer—"Stand in your places for the dismissal (ad missam)" (Miss. Mozar., Leslie, 99). So long as there were catechumens these words were doubtless intended for them also, each class was to remain in its proper place until the notice to go was given.

Isidore of Seville, who used the Mozarabic liturgy, writing in 636, says, "The missa is in the time of the sacrifice, when the catechumens are sent out; the Levite crying, 'If any catechumen has been left, let him go out;,' and thence the missa, because they may not be present at the sacraments of the altar" (Orig. vi. 19). The explanation appears to be that, the more ignorant, hearing of the missa, imagined that it meant, not the dismissal of the non-communicating classes, but the service from which they were excluded. The popular usage, thus founded upon error, though essentially improper, seems to have been early, if slowly, followed by the clergy. The first instance occurs in a letter in which St. Ambrose describes an event then quite recent, which occurred on Palm Sunday, 385: "After the reading [of the eucharistic lessons] and the sermon, the catechumens being dismissed," an interruption occurred, after an account of which he adds, "nevertheless, I continued in my duty; I began to perform mass (missam facere). While I am offering I am made aware," &c. (Epist. 20, § 4). The next is in the 3rd canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 390, which forbids presbyters to reconcile penitents "in publica missa." Leo, in 445, expressed himself against the "custom of a single mass" in small churches on festivals, at which more desired to be present "than the church would hold at once" (Epist. xi. 2). Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, used the word freely, but in the plural, from which we should gather that the usage was still unsettled:—"If you observe carefully, you will see that the missae do not take place when the divine lessons are recited in church, but when the gifts are offered, and the body and blood of the Lord are consecrated" (Serm. 80, § 2. Comp. 81, § 1). Cassiodorus, 514, in Italy: "The celebration of holy masses" (Expos. Ps. 25, v. 7); and again, "Missarum ordo completus est" (Ps. 33, concl.), where he means the order of the eucharistic office. The plural is used by Gregory of Tours, 573, as "expletis missis" (De Mir. S. Mart. ii. 47), "dictis missis" (De Glor. Mart. 34), etc., and by others. The idiom may have arisen from a rubric in the Gregorian Sacramentary, in an early copy of which the order for Good Friday ends thus—"Then let him (the priest) communicate, and all the clergy; and let the dismissals take place (fiant missae)" (Pamel. Rit. SS. PP. L. ii. 257). Gregory I. himself, 590, commonly uses the phrase solemnia missarum (Epist. iv. 44, vi. 17, vii. 29). The variety of usage continued to the end of our period. E.g. in the 7th century the Council of Toledo, A.D. 646, uses both missas (can. 2) and missam (3); that of Autun, 670, has "a missa suspendere" (can. 11); that of Braga, 675, solemnia missarum (can. 4); that of Toledo, 694, missa pro requie (can. 5). In the 8th, the Ordo Romanus, about 730, has missarum solemnia (§ 19, Mus.

Ital., Mabill. tom. ii.), missa (24, 25, 26, 28, 30), and missae (22, 25, 26, 28, 46). The Council of Aix, 789, uses missa (can. 6), that of Frankfort, 794, solemnia missarum (can. 50). In the 1st capitulary of Theodulf of Orleans, 797, we have missa (cc. 5, 6) and solemnia missarum (cc. 4, 11, 46). The second council of Châlons (sur-Saône), 813, uses solemnitates (can. 39) and solemnia (60) missarum.

III. That part of the service at which communicants alone were present has been long distinguished from the Missa Catechumenorum by the name of Missa Fidelium. It was not so called, however, within the first nine centuries. In the following passage from Florus of Lyons, A.D. 837, the phrase means the dismissal of the communicants: "Tunc enim (sc. post evangelii lectionem) clamante diacono, iidem catechumeni mittebantur; id est, dimittebantur foras. Missa ergo catechumenorum fiebat ante actionem sacramentorum: Missa fidelium fit post confectionem et participationem" (Expos. missae, § 92 in fine). The service from which the catechumens were excluded was also very frequently called missa sacramentorum; but we are unable to find examples earlier than the 11th century (see Sala in Bona, Rer. Lit. ii., viii. 1).

IV. The breaking up of a congregation of monks after their offices was also called missa. Thus Cassian says that among the monks of the east one who came late to prayer had to "wait, standing before the door, for the missa of the whole assembly" (Instit. iii. 7). So again, ii. 7, "Celeritatem missae;" iii. 5, "Missa canonica;" 8, "Vigiliarum missae." Similarly, St. Benedict, when settling the number of psalms to be said at each office, as, e.g. at matins: "But after the three psalms are finished, let one lesson be read, a verse and kyrie eleison; et missae fiant" (cap. 17). The reader will observe the plural, as in the Gregorian Sacramentary.

V. In the liturgy of Gothic Spain (Missale Mozar., Leslie, 8, 11, et passim) missa is the name of an address to the communicants (= the Gallican Preface), corresponding in position to our exhortation, "Dearly beloved in the Lord." The origin of this usage is clear. The departure of the non-communicating classes is now followed by an anthem (sacrificium = the Roman "offertory"), and that by the word missa, which now appears as a heading prefixed to the address. Before the introduction of the anthem (Notitia Eucharistica, p. 342, ed. 2) the word would follow immediately the proclamation, "State locis vestris ad Missam," and would simply indicate that the "missa" or dismissal of the penitents and catechumens then took place. When these classes of worshippers ceased to exist, it was naturally supposed that the word was the name of the formulary that followed it. The address now called missa is by St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, called "Oratio admonitionis erga populum" (De Div. Off. i. 15), from which we should infer that missa retained its original meaning in the Spanish liturgy in his time. A Gallican preface in the sacramentary found at Bobio (which for convenience we shall call the Besançon Sacramentary, as it appears to have belonged to that province) is inscribed, "Missa Dominicalis" (Mus. Ital. i. 373); but as no other instance occurs in the Gallican liturgies this may be a clerical error.

VI. Portions of the daily offices were also called missae, probably because at the end of each a monk, might, on sufficient cause, obtain leave to withdraw. (1.) Thus, in the Rule of Isidore, compiled in 620: "In the daily offices of vigils the three canonical psalms are first to be said, then three missae of psalms, a fourth of canticles, a fifth of the matin offices. But on Sundays and feasts of martyrs let their several missae be added, on account of the solemnity" (Reg. 7; Holsten. ii. 208). The missae psalmodum here are psalms sung in addition to the "canonical" numbers. In another Spanish Rule, that of Fructuosus, the founder of the great monastery at Alcalá (Complutum), the psalms are called missae absolutely: "In the courses for the nights of Saturday and Sunday . . . let the vigils be celebrated with six missae each, with six responsories, that the solemnity of the Lord's resurrection may be more honoured by the greater amount of psalmody in the offices" (cap. 3; Holst. ii. 234). (2.) The above usage, seemingly peculiar to Spain, has been confounded with that of France, where the missae of an office clearly meant the lessons. Thus, in the rule of Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502: "Every Sunday observe six missae. For the first missae let (the history of) the resurrection be always read. . . . When the missae are finished, say the matin (psalms) in monotone, Exaltabo Te," etc. (cap. 21; ibid. 92). Sim. in the rule of Aurelian, also of Arles, 550: "On Christmas day observe six missae from the prophet Isaiah. . . . So on the Epiphany . . . observe six missae from the prophet Daniel. . . . Every Lord's day after nocturns, when the first missa, i.e. the resurrection, is being read, let no one presume to sit, but all stand" (Ordo Regulæ suffic. u.s. p. 112). Again: "On the feasts of martyrs, let three or four missae be observed. Read the first missa from the gospel, the rest from the passions of the martyrs" (Ordo Regulæ Virg. suff. Holst. ii. 72; Sim. c. 38).

VII. The daily offices were themselves called missae, as by the council of Agde in 506: "At the end of the morning and evening missae (i.e. of matins and vespers, as Dupin and others understand it), after the hymns, let little chapters from the Psalms be said" (can. 30). Hence much later the phrase "missal office" is used for "matins": "The church in which both the evening and morning or missal office, is performed" (De Gest. Aldrici, xx.; Baluz. Miscell. ed. Mansi, i. 90).

VIII. During the latter part of the first liturgical period, at least, the prayers to be inserted in the liturgy as proper to a given day or object were collected under the common title of Oraciones, or Oraciones et Preces. Many instances survive both in the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries. For the former, see Lit. Rom. Vet. Muratori, i. 493, 7; 504, 5, 8, etc.; and for the latter, ibid. ii. 54, 65, 7, etc. Four such groups of prayers in the missal of the Franks are headed respectively, "Oraciones et Prec. pro Regibus," "Orat. et Preces in Natali S. Helarii," "Orat. et Prec. unius Martyris," and "Orat. et Preces communes cotidianeae cum Canone" (Lit. Gall. 316-322). At a later period these sets of proper prayers were collectively called missae. The word is not used thus in the Leonian Sacramentary, nor in all the copies of the Gregorian. In the former, each group is headed by the name of the day only, or where there are more than one for the same day by the words, "Item alia." In one of the earliest of the Gregorian, that published by Pamelius, Missa does not occur in this sense. Sometimes we have "ad missam" after the name of the day (Rituale, SS. PP. ii. 250, 312, etc.). It is common, however, as a title in the other copies, as Missa pro Regibus (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 187), Missa Votiva (ibid. 193, etc.), Missa pro Peste animalium, Missa in Contentione (Codex Vatic. opp. St. Greg. v. 215, 6), etc.; and in the only extant copy of the Gelasian, made in the 8th century, as Missa in Monasterio (Murat. i. 719), Missa contra Iudices male agentes (ibid. 732), etc. The usage probably came from France; for the word is employed in this sense in the Gothico-Gallican missal (e.g. Missa in Sancto Die Epiphaniae, Lit. Gall. 208, Missa in Symboli Traditione, 235; and sim. passim), the Frankish (but only in "Item alia Missa," the equivalent of "Orat. et Prec." ibid. 323-5), and the Vetus Gallicanum (e.g. Missa de Adventu Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ibid. 333, etc.) of Thomasius and Mabillon, not one of which is later than the 8th century, and in the Besançon Sacramentary (e.g. Missa in Natale Domini, Mus. Ital. i. 290; Missa in Epiphania, 296, etc.), which was written in the 7th. The word is not once employed in this manner in the liturgy of Milan (Pamel. tom. i.), but we find it in Spain in the later parts of the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, 428, 434, etc.), and most probably in the 13th canon of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, when, defending hymns of human composition, it says, "Componuntur ergo hymni, sicut componuntur Missae, sive preces, vel orationes," etc. As there was still a dismissal of penitents, and probably of catechumens, in Spain in the 7th century, we cannot think that the word had yet acquired that other special meaning peculiar to Spain mentioned above in § v. When Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vi. 46) says that Chilperic, who died in 584, attempted certain "opuscula vel hymnos, sive Missas," the word is understood in the above sense.

The composition of these collective Missae varies greatly in the several liturgies.

(1.) The Roman Missa. This has (a) the Oratio, which answers to our collect for the day; (b) the (Oratio) super Oblata, or Secreta. This was for the acceptance of the oblations; but when they came to consist of the elements only, their intended use often so coloured their prayer as to make it inappropriate before their consecration. See Notitia Eucharistica, 412, 2nd ed. It was called Secreta, "because said secretly" (Amalaricus, de Off. Eccl. iii. 20). (c) The proper Preface.—This began with a constant formula, Vere dignum et justum est, aequum et salutare (whence the English, "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty"). See Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 293, 5, 6, etc. (Sacram. Leon.); 494, 5, 6, etc. (Sacr. Gel.); ii. 8, 9, 10, etc. (Sacr. Greg.). Proper Prefaces were very numerous in the early sacramentaries. At the end of one MS. printed by Muratori (u. s. ii. 273) there is a collection of 72 (Codex Vatic., while in another we may count no less than 220 (Cod. Othobon. ibid. 291). By the 11th century these were reduced to 11 (Not. Euch. 538). (d)

One division of the Roman canon begins thus, "Communicantes et memoriam venerantes in primis gloriosae semper Virginis Mariae," etc. Variations of this proper for certain seasons occur in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, but not in the Leonian. In the Gelasian they are generally headed "Infra Actionem" (Murat. u. s. i. 496, 553, 5, 572, etc.), but once "Infra Canonem" (ibid. 559). The following example is the formula for Maundy Thursday in that sacramentary: "Communicantes, et diem sacratissimum celebrantes; quo traditus est Dominus noster Jesus Christus. Sed et memoriam," etc. (Murat. i. 553). Other forms are provided for Christmas, Easter, Ascension Day, Whitsunday. (c) A prayer which forms part of the canon begins thus, "Hanc igitur oblationem servitutis nostrae," etc. This also is varied in the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries for seasons and occasions, as for Maundy Thursday (i. 553, ii. 55), Easter (i. 572, ii. 67), Whitsuntide (i. 601, ii. 90), for the dedication of a church (i. 613), or font (618), etc. It is also headed "Infra Actionem" (i. 553, 572, etc.). In the Gelasian Missae pro Scrutinio this prayer becomes a petition for the Competentes, and is followed by the recital of their names and another act of intercession for them, viz., "Hos, Domine, fonte baptismatis innovandos Spiritus Tui munere ad sacramentorum tuorum plenitudinem poscimus praeprari. Per." (Murat. u. s. i. 522). In an earlier part of the canon ("Infra Canonem") a prayer for the sponsors is also interpolated, viz. after the words "Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum" (ibid.). A special "Hanc igitur oblationem" was almost an essential part of masses for the dead (Gelas. u. s. i. 752-762; Greg. ii. 218-222), and was inserted in many votive masses (Gelas. i. 703, 719, 720, 4, 6, etc.; Greg. ii. 188, 193, 5, 200). (f) The (Oratio) ad Complendum, post Communionem, or ad Communionem (see the Sacramentaries in Lit. Lat. Vetus, Murat. passim). This was properly a thanksgiving after the reception, such as we find in every liturgy, and probably came from the earliest period. "When that great sacrament has been partaken of," says St. Augustine, "a thanksgiving concludes all" (Epist. 149, § 16). (g) Ad Populum (Sacram. Gelas.; Murat. u. s. i. 495, 6, 8, etc.), or Super Populum (Sacram. Greg. ibid. ii. 23, 8, 9, etc.), is the heading of a final benediction found only in some missae, especially in those for Lent. The Leonian Sacramentary has no headings, but several such benedictions may be distinguished in it; e. g., Protector (Murat. u. s. i. 297), Non praejudicet (ibid. 298), Tuere (ibid.), etc. The following is one example: "Super populum Tuam, Domine, quaesumus, benedictio copiosa descendat; indulgentia veniat; consolatio tribuatur: fides sancta succrescat: redemptio sempiterna firmetur. Per" (Sacram. Leon. Murat. i. 482). In the Romanizing parts of the Missale Francorum this collect is headed "Ad Plebem" (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 323, 5).

(2.) The Milanese Missa. (a) The collect for the day under the name of (Oratio) Super Populum (Pamel. Liturgicon. i. 293, et passim). This was originally said before the Gloria in Excelsis (ibid.), which, followed by the Kyrie, preceded the Prophecy and other lessons. It is now said after the Kyrie (Martene, de Ant. Rit. Eccl. i.

iv. xii. 3). (b) The (Oratio) Super Sindonem. The sindon is the "fair white linen cloth" of the English rubric. It was spread over the altar after the gospel, and this prayer was said over it. The following example is for the eve of the Epiphany: "Adesto, Domine, supplicationibus nostris, et populo Tuo, quem Tibi ex omnibus gentibus elegisti, veritatis Tuae lumen ostende. Per Dominum" (ibid. 314). (c) The (Oratio) Super Oblata. This has the same intention as the Roman Secreta. Before the creed was brought into the liturgy, it always followed the offertory anthem (offerenda), and this is obviously its right place; but now on Sundays and other feasts the creed intervenes, and very awkwardly. See Pamel. u. s. Martene, u. s. (d) The Preface corresponds closely to that of the Roman Sacramentaries. One is provided for every holyday. (e) In the Missa pro Baptizatis on Easter Eve a prayer is inserted "Infra Actionem," i. e. in the canon, in which the celebration is expressly declared to be on their behalf: "Hoc paschale sacrificium Tibi offerimus pro his quos ex aqua et Spiritu sancto regenerare dignatus es" (353). In the Missa for Maundy Thursday (339) there is a variation of the Communicantes bearing on the institution of the sacrament, and a prayer to be inserted "Post Orationem Sacerdotis pro seipso," i. e. after the "Nobis quoque minimis et peccatoribus." These, if we mistake not, are the only proper additions infra canonem admitted by this liturgy. (f) Another interpolation peculiar to the Missa for Maundy Thursday is the Oratio post Confractorium. This also refers to the institution. It begins thus: "Ipsius praeceptum est, Domine, quod agimus, in cuius nunc Te praesentia postulamus." (g) The (Oratio) Post Communionem corresponds to the Roman formulary, called Ad Complendum in the Gregorian, but more frequently Post Communionem in the Gelasian Sacramentary.

(3.) The Gallican Missa. (a) In the Gallican church the song of Zacharias was chanted after the Kyrie at the beginning of the service except in Lent (St. Germanus, Expos. Brev. in Martene, de Rit. Eccl. Ant. i. iv. iv. 1). It was called "the Prophecy" (Germ. ibid.), and was followed by a prayer, Collectio (Miss. Goth. in Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 190, 251, etc.) or Oratio (Sacram. Gallic. in Mus. Ital. i. 285) post Prophetiam, which was generally based on it, or contained at least some allusion to it. Three of those extant (Miss. Franc. Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5) do not exhibit the connexion with the canticle, being borrowed from the Roman sacramentaries. The first two are the originals of our Collects for the 6th and 11th Sundays after Trinity. One example occurs in the Reichenau Fragment (Neale and Forbes, Gall. Lit. 6; see also 28). (b) The Eucharistic litany of the West went conventionally by the name of preces (Not. Euch. 301). From Germanus (u. s.) we learn that in the Gallican church the preces were said after the lessons and homily. In several Missae we have a Collectio post Preceem (after the Collectio post Prophetiam), which can only be referred to the litany, and the general character of these collects corresponds to that position. In the Bezançon sacramentary they are headed "Oratio post Preceem." (Mus. It. i. 282), ex.: "O Lord God, who art both justly angry with Thy people and merciful to forgive them, incline Thine ear to our supplications that we who confess Thee with our entire affections may obtain not Thy judgment but Thy pardon" (ibid.). (c) The Praefatio Missae. This is, properly, a short address to the communicants on the sacred event commemorated in the Missa. It was delivered when the catechumens had left. Examples of such addresses are found in the Missale Gothicum (Lit. Gall. 190, 3, 6, 204, etc.), Gallicanum Vetus (329), and the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 290, 4, 5, 6, etc.), and the Reichenau Fragment (u. s. 20), but in very many instances they have been changed into or superseded by direct prayers (Goth. u. s. 198, 225, etc.; Gall. Vet. 333, 4, etc.; Sacr. Gall. Mus. It. 284, 9, etc.; Miss. Richen. u. s. 21). (d) The Preface was followed by a collect which had reference to the same subject. In the Missale Gothicum (u. s. 191, 4, 7, etc.) this is generally headed Collectio sequitur. In the Missal of the Franks the Praefatio (itself become a collect) and its collectio appear together under the common heading of Ante Nomina (Lit. Gall. 322, 4, 5), which indicates that they are said before the offertory and the recital of the names of those for whom prayer was made. These collects are Gregorian (among them are ours for the 1st, 4th, 7th, and 10th Sundays after Trinity), a fact which, with many others, suggests the influence under which the older Gallican forms were given up. (e) After the recital of the names the prayer Collectio post Nomina was said. This properly had two objects. It was a prayer for the acceptance of the gifts (so far corresponding to the Roman Super Oblata), and an act of intercession for both living and dead. E. g. "Suscipe . . . sacrificium laudis oblatum . . . Nomina quorum sunt recitationes complexa scribi jubeas in aeternitate" (Goth. u. s. 191); "Auditus nominibus offerentium, fratres dilectissimi, Christum Dominum deprecemur, . . . ut haec sacrificia sic viventibus proficiant ad emendationem ut defunctis opitentur ad requiem" (ibid. 201). A collect of this character is also found under the same title in the Missae of the Missale Gall. Vetus, u. s. 329, 333, 4, etc.), and of the Reichenau Fragment (Neale and Forbes, u. s. 2, 5, 9, etc.). In the Besançon sacramentary, which admits the Roman canon, the name is retained, but the Gallican collect is supplanted by a Roman (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 6, 7, etc.). In the Frankish Missal both name and thing are gone, and the Roman "Super Oblata" appears under its proper title (Lit. Gall. 310, 7, 8, 9, etc.). (f) The Collectio ad Pacem came next, a prayer said when the kiss of peace was given. It is properly a prayer for charity and peace, and collects to this effect appear under the name in M. Goth. (u. s. 188, 191, 4, 7, etc.), in M. Gall. Vet. (ibid. 330, 3, 4, 365), and in Miss. Richen. (u. s. 6, 10, 22, 29). In the M. Franc. the name is suppressed and Roman collects, with no reference in them to charity or peace, are substituted (Lit. Gall. 317, 8, 320, etc.). The true Gallican collect has almost equally disappeared from the Romanizing Besançon sacramentary, but the name has been left (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 9, etc.). One true example from the last-named book will serve as a specimen of all: "Cause, O good Jesu, Thy peace to glide into our hearts, in which is the fulness of love. Grant, O Lord, that we may ever preserve in spiritual affection that peace, which we now express with the mouth" (286). (g) The peace and its prayer were followed by the Sursum Corda, leading up to the Contestatio or Immolutio; for these were the names given to that which in the English and Roman books is called the Preface. It began with the words, "Vere dignum et justum est," or "Vere aequum et justum est" (Lit. Gall. 191, 197), and probably received the former name from the assent which the priest gives in them to the witness of the people, "Dignum et justum est." It probably acquired the name of Immolutio (which may be considered equivalent to the ἀναφορά (St. Mark's Lit. Renaud, 1, 144) or προσκομιδή (St. Basil Alex. 64; St. Greg. A. 99) of the Greek liturgies in rubrics immediately preceding or following the same formula), from its forming an introduction to the more sacrificial part of the service. Contestatio Missae, Immolutio Missae, Contestatio, and Immolutio, are used indiscriminately in the Missale Gothicum (Lit. Gall. Imm. 188, 191, 7, 9, etc.; Cont. 194, 209, 212, etc.), and in the Miss. Gall. Vet. (Cont. ibid. 330, 3, 357, 365, etc.; Imm. 334, 368, 9, 370, etc.). Contestatio only appears in the Miss. Franc. (ibid. 321, 4), the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 279, 284, 6, 8, etc.), and in the Reichenau fragment (which is peculiar in omitting Verè) (u. s. 10, 18, 23, 6, 7, 9). Almost every Missa had its proper Contestatio. When the Roman canon was used in the Gallican church, the proper collects of the Gallican Missae ended with the Contestatio, which was immediately followed by the Te igitur. Hence there are no Gallican collects after the Contestatio, in the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 279), or the Frankish Missal (Lit. Gall. 326), because in them the Roman canon was used in every mass. In the Gothic (300), and apparently in the Gallicanum Vetus, it was used in some only. Hence in both these, while many end with the Contestatio, many do not. The Reichenau Missal appears to have been purely Gallican. (h) The Contestatio invariably ended with the Sanctus, and this was followed in the strictly Gallican mass by the Collectio post Sanctus, which was founded on it, and was in fact often a contestatio (so to speak) to that doxology: e. g. "Vere sanctus, vere benedictus, Dominus noster Jesus Christus," etc. (Lit. Gall. 189; comp. 195, 202, etc.). The Collectio post Sanctus is the variable Gallican prayer of consecration; for it always concludes with the account of the institution introduced by the mention of the name of Christ, e. g. "Who came to seek and to save that which was lost. For He the day before" (202); "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who the day before He suffered" (210); "By the same our Lord, who the day before He deigned to suffer for the salvation of us and of all" (335). The narrative is never written out at length. (i) The words of institution were followed by a variable prayer called the Collectio post Mysterium (M. Goth. u. s. 189, 195, 210, etc.), or post Secreta (M. Goth. 192, 202, 222, etc.; Gall. Vet. 331, 335; M. Richen. u. s. 15). This collect was (at first, we may presume, always) an invocation such as we find in the Greek and Eastern liturgies, or at least an implicit invocation, i. e. a prayer for the sanctification of the gifts by the Holy Ghost: Ex. "Ut immittere digneris Spiritum Tuum Sanctum super haec solemniam" (M. Goth. 228); "De-scendat in aestimabilis gloriae tuae Spiritus, . . . ut fiat oblatio nostra hostia spiritalis" (Gall. Vet. 335); "Rogamus uti hoc sacrificium tua benedictione benedicas et Sancti Spiritus rore perfundas" (M. Richen. 15). The Spirit is not mentioned in many in which the effect of the prayer is the same: e.g. "Ut operante virtute panem mutatum in carne, poculum verum in sanguine, illum sumamus," etc. (M. Goth. 300); "Descendat, Domine, plenitudo majestatis, Divinitatis, pietatis, virtutis, benedictionis et gloriae tuae super hunc panem et super hunc calicem" (M. Richen. 11). (k) In the Gallican rite the fraction took place before the Lord's Prayer, which, as in other liturgies, came between the consecration and communion (Germanus, Expos. Martene, i. iv. xii. i.). The Gothico-Gallican Missal, and that only, gives a Collectio ad Panis Fractionem for the mass on Easter Eve. It evidently has some special history now unknown; for in it the oblation is offered "for the safety of the kings and their army and all standing around" (Lit. Gall. 251). (l) The Lord's Prayer was introduced by a form which is always headed in the missals, Collectio ante Orationem Dominicam. The following is a brief example: "Not presuming on our merit, O holy Father, but in obedience to the command of our Lord Thy Son Jesus Christ, we presume to say" (M. Goth. 192). Another ends thus, "Suppliant to Thee we cry and say, Our Father" (M. Gall. Vet. 346). Many are addresses in which the people are exhorted to say the Lord's Prayer, e.g. "Let us beseech the Almighty eternal Lord, that . . . He permit us to say with confidence the prayer which our Lord hath taught us, Our Father" (M. Goth. 202). (m) The Lord's Prayer was followed by a prayer with the title Collectio post Orationem Dominicam, which also varied in the several Missae. It corresponds to the constant Roman embolism, and like that is founded on the last petition of the Lord's Prayer, even beginning as that does, generally (not always; see M. Goth. 223, 230, 7; M. Gall. Vet. 346, 9) with "Libera nos." (n) The Benedictio Populi followed, which also varied with the season. By the 44th canon of Agde, A.D. 506, only bishops were permitted to pronounce this. The intention of the decree was, according to Germanus, about 50 years later, to "guard the honour of the pontifex" (Expos. in Mart. u. s.). These Benedictions are very uncertain in their formation. In the Gothico-Gallican Missal they generally consist of five distinct parts (Lit. Gall. 189, 196, etc.), but some are divided into three (198, 219, etc.), four (223, 228), six (192, 208), or nine (210). In the M. Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 333, 349, 365, etc.), and the M. Richen. (Gall. Liturgies, 2, 20) they are a continuous prayer. Zachary of Rome, A.D. 741, says that the Gallican Benedictions "multis vitiis variantur," and that the bishops were actuated by "vainglory" in making them, "sibi ipsis damnationem adhibentes" (Ep. 12; Labbe, vi. 1526). As no such episcopal benediction can be traced to Rome, some French writers have supposed that Zachary condemned the practice altogether; but the strength of his language would in that case imply a spirit of intolerance which we are unwilling to ascribe to him. It seems more probable that he referred to the length and ambitious character of the benedictions in use. From Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, we learn that in France the people were in the habit of leaving church after the gospel, if they did not wish to communicate (Hom. 80, inter Serm. August. App. 286; see also 281, 282). The council of Agde, in 506 (can. 47), the first of Orleans in 511 (can. 26), and the third of Orleans, 528 (can. 29), forbade them to go away before the benediction. An unvarying short blessing was always pronounced here by the priest, if the bishop was not present (German. u. s.). (o) After the communion the priest said the Collectio post Eucharistiam (M. Goth. u. s. 196, 211, 230; Gall. Vet. 331), or post Communionem (M. Goth. 190, 3, 8, etc.; M. Gall. Vet. 333, 5, 366, 7, etc.). This collect is often a brief exhortation to thankfulness, perseverance, or prayer (as M. Goth. 190, 193, 203, etc.; Gall. Vet. 331, 347 (where it is called Praefatio p. Euch.), 350). (p) The last proper collect is the Consummatio Missae, which name occurs Miss. Goth. 196, 230, 293, 4, 6, 7, 300). More frequently it is headed by the words, "Collectio sequitur" (M. Goth. 190, 3, 8, 214; Gall. V. 334, 350, 365, 6, 7, 8, 372), or "Item Collectio" (M. Goth. 298), or "Collectio" simply M. Gall. V. 331, 347, 371). Ex.: "That which we have taken with our mouths, O Lord, let us receive in our minds, and may an eternal remedy be made to us out of a temporal gift" (M. Goth. 190).

It appears probable from Gregory of Tours that in France the missae for one or more great festivals at least were copied out of the sacramentaries, and used in that convenient form under the conventional name of "Libellus." For he says of a bishop that on a certain occasion, "ablato sibi nequiter libello, per quam sacrosancta solemniam agere consueverat, ita paratus a tempore cunctum festivitatis opus explicuit" (Hist. Fr. ii. 22). An aged abbat asked to celebrate, said, "Oculi mei caligine obteguunt, nec possum libellum adspicere; presbytero igitur haec alteri legenda mandate" (Vit. PP. xvi. 2). As the canon was part of the missa and always very short, everything required by the priest for a given occasion, or even for a longer season, might be brought within the compass of a libellus.

(4.) The Mozarabic Missa.—St. Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, enumerates seven forms "in the order of the mass or of the prayers by which the sacrifices offered to God are consecrated" (De Eccl. Off. 15). His account of them is copied, and therefore confirmed by Etherius and Beatus, A.D. 783 (De Adopt. Christi, i.; Biblioth. V. PP. viii. 354; Colon. 1618), and is found to agree with the Hispano-Gothic sacramentary known as the Mozarabic Missal. We have to observe, however, that Isidore is speaking only of the Missa Fidelium, and that he combines prayers which we have to consider separately. (a) There is a variable prayer called the Oratio, founded on the Gloria in Excelsis and said after it, coming therefore before the prophecy. It often begins with praise and ends with prayer, as, e.g. that for Christmas: "Hodie nobis thesaurus natus est . . . Praesta nobis, Domine, per gloriam nativitatis tuae a malis propriis liberari" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, u. s. 37; comp. 20, 32, etc.). (b) Referring, as we said, to the prayers in the Missa Fidelium only, Isidore says,

"The first of them is the prayer (oratio) of admonition addressed to the people that they may be stirred up to hearty prayer to God" (u. s.). This is the address called Missa, mentioned above in § V. It corresponds to the Gallican Præfatio; see before (3) (c). (c) "The second is of invocation to God, that He will mercifully receive the prayers of the faithful and their oblation" (Isid. u. s.). This prayer appears in the Missae under the title of Oratio (Leslie, 9, 225). Alia Oratio (3, 17, 19, etc.), or simply Alia (11, 14, 21, etc.); the second being by far the more frequent. The reference in "alia" is to the Missa. (d) "The third is poured for the offerers or the faithful departed, that through the said sacrifice they may obtain pardon" (Isid.). This prayer corresponds to the Gallican Post Nomina and has that title (Leslie, passim). It quite satisfies the account of Isidore. E.g. one begins thus: "Nominibus sanctorum martyrum, offerentiumque fidelium, atque eorum qui ab hoc saeculo transierunt a ministris jam sacri ordinis recensitis" (27). As these are in effect prayers super oblata, it is peculiar that many of them are addressed to Christ; see pp. 4, 9, 11, etc. (e) "A fourth is introduced after these with reference to the kiss of peace, that all being mutually reconciled by charity may be associated together as worthy of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ" (Isid.). This prayer, like the corresponding Gallican, is headed "Ad Pacem." It is often addressed to the Son (Leslie, 9, 11, 15, etc.). (f) "The illation in the consecration of the oblation is introduced in the fifth place, in which the terrestrial creation and all the powers of heaven are called forth to the praise of God, and Hosanna in the highest is sung" (Isid.). This answers, as the reader will see, to the English preface and the Gallican immolatio. It begins always "Dignum et iustum est" (Leslie, passim). In the Mozarabic Missal the title, Inlatio is never wanting or varied. (g) It is followed by the Post Sanctus, which is, as in the Gallican, a contestation to the Sanctus. It generally begins "Vere Sanctus," very often including some reference to the Hosanna, which is sung by the choir after the Sanctus; but sometimes it takes up the Hosanna at first hand, as "Osanna in excelsis. Quantā nobis, Omnipotens Pater, hoc sacrificium reverentiā metuentium . . . caelestium voces admonent potestatum" (66); "Vere benedictus" (120). (h) It rarely opens without a catchword from either; but see examples, pp. 20, 153; where, however, the prayers are still founded on the Sanctus. This prayer is not mentioned by Isidore, probably because he regarded it as a variable part of the prayer of consecration (Adesto, adesto, Jesu bone, etc.), with which the priest proceeded immediately. It is quite possible, however, that it may have been borrowed from the Goths of Gaul, after the time of Isidore. (i) The canon ends with the account of the institution. This does not begin with "Pridie" like the Gallican, but thus, "Dominus noster Jesus Christus in qua nocte," etc. (Leslie, 5). Yet the invariable title of the prayer which follows it (the Post Mysterium or Post Secreta of Gaul) is Post Pridie (Oratio). This fact suggests that originally the canon of Gothic Spain was the same as that of Gaul. The Post Pridie is, in its typical specimens, a prayer for the sanctification of the gifts by the Spirit, and it is incredible that any liturgy, derived as this was immediately from the East, should have been without a prayer deemed essential to the consecration in all the Eastern churches. In the second place this prayer is clearly described by Isidore, though without the name Post Pridie, which was probably attached to it after his time: "Porro sexta ex hinc succedit confirmatio sacramenti, ut oblatio quae Deo offertur sanctificata per Spiritum Sanctum corporis et sanguinis confirmetur" (ib.). (k) The next variable prayer is the Ad Oratorem Dominicam, sometimes of considerable length. It leads up to the Lord's Prayer thus, "cum . . . proclamaverimus e tēris, Pater" (6); "nos docuit orare semper et docere, Pater," etc. (10). It is not noticed by Isidore, whose seventh prayer is the Lord's Prayer itself; but here again he may be silent because he thought that in mentioning the prayer, he implied the preamble, which in his day, we may add, was probably much shorter than the existing forms. (l) The Mozarabic embolism "Liberati a malo, etc." does not vary. It is followed by the "conjunction" of the consecrated elements. (m) After this a Benediction is given, which varies with the season. In all but two instances the Hispano-Gothic benediction is divided into three parts, at the end of each of which the people respond Amen. After the third response the priest says "Per misericordiam ipsius Dei nostri: qui est benedictus et vivit," etc. This is occasionally varied, but on no principle (see Notitia Eucharistica, 699, 2nd ed.). The blessing for the Epiphany is in five parts, apparently that it may take in all the subjects of commemoration on that day (Leslie, 63). The other exception (440) is in four. The mass (Commune plurium Virginum) is late, and the irregularity seems to arise simply from the division of one of the original members which was unusually long. We hear of the benediction in Spain from the council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (can. 18): "Some priests communicate immediately after saying the Lord's Prayer, and afterwards give the blessing in populo (sic, and so Isidore, u. s. c. 17); which we forbid for the future; but after the Lord's Prayer and the conjunction of the bread and cup let the benediction in populum (sic) follow." (n) A variable Post Communionem Oratio (Leslie, 7, 35, 40, 44, etc.) followed the reception, which is often, like the Gallican Collectio, an exhortation (ib. 63, 83, 89, etc.). This oratio, if used in the days of St. Isidore, would not be in his "Ordo Missae;" for the mass was supposed to be over before the communion; but it may be of later introduction, for he does not mention it in his account of the later part of the service.

IX. In the Gallican liturgies the prayers proper to a saint's day are often called the "missa" of that saint. Thus in the Besançon Sacramentary we have Missa Sancti Stefani, Missa S. Martini Episcopi, etc. (Mus. Ital. i. 292, 349, etc.); in the Gothic-Gallican, Missa S. Johannis Apostoli et Evangelistae, Missa Sancti Leudegarii martyris, etc. (Lib. Gall. 262, 283 etc.), and in the Gallicanum vetus, Missa S.

Germani Episcopi (ib. 329). From this use of the word flowed another, the festival itself on which those prayers were said being often called by the name of Missa. Thus in the Regulae Canonorum of Chrodegang, written in 757, cap. 34, we have Missa S. Remedii (= Remigii) Missa S. Martini (Migne, 89). A Decretale Precum of 779 directs that the services which it orders take place, Missa S. Johannis (Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 20; sim. in Capit. iii. ann. 806, Car. M. 449). In the third capitulary of Charlemagne in 803, a general gathering of the vassals of the empire is ordered to take place "on the eighth before the calends of July, i.e. on the mass of St. John the Baptist" (ib. 394). Sim. in a law of Pepin, A.D. 793 (ib. 543). St. Martin's principal feast (Nov. 11) was formerly called St. Martin in the winter, or in yeme. One example to our purpose occurs in the reign of Charlemagne, viz. in his Capitulary of Villis, A.D. 800, in which it is ordered that all foals belonging to the king shall be brought to the palace "on the mass of St. Martin in the winter" (Missa S. Martini hiemali, c. 15, ib. 334). This use of missa, which became very common after the 9th century, has bequeathed to us such combinations as Christmas, Martinmas, Candlemas (missa luminum), etc.

X. In this section we propose to give the various kinds of missae (in the sense considered in § viii.) that were in use before the 9th century, and to explain the terms describing them.

(1.) Missa Cardinalis. This phrase, which is understood to mean "high mass," occurs in the Miracula S. Bertini, ii. 7; Acta Bened. saec. iii. (the 8th century), i. 132: "Die Dominico horâ quâ cardinalis missae conventus publice agebantur."

(2.) Missa Chismalis. The proper prayers used on Maundy Thursday at the mass at which the chism is consecrated are so called in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 554), in the ancient Rheims use of the Gregorian, the extant copy of which was written in the time of Charlemagne (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. xxii. § 3 in fine, Missa Chismale (sic), and in the Anjou pontifical a little later (ibid. § 8, n. 4).

(3.) Missa Communis = publica (as "common prayer" with us) in Epist. Brailonici Caesarug. A.D. 627 (Vita S. Amiliani praefixa): "Ut missa recitaretur communis injunxi" (Acta Bened. saec. i. P. iii. 206).

Missa Communis also meant a mass said for several persons in common. Thus in one under that title the priest prays "for those for whom he has made up his mind to pray" living or dead, and "for all the faithful, whose names the book of blessed predestination contains written" (Mon. Liturg. Alem., Gerbert, i. 270).

(4.) Missa Decensita. By a charter dated in the year 760 a grant of land was made to the church at Brioude, "ut omni tempore missae ibidem decensitae esse debeant" (App. Acta Vet. n. 14; Cap. Reg. Fr. ii. 1393); i.e. as it is understood, shall be duly and properly performed.

(5.) Missa pro Defunctis. See OBEQUIES.

(6.) Missa Dominicalis. This is the title of missae to be used on Sunday (Dies Dominicus) in the Gallican Sacramentaries. See the missae 75-80 in Missale Goth. (Lit. Gall. 292-299), the 36th in Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 375) and eight missae in the Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 365-383).

(7.) Missa de Exceptato is the title of a missa standing before that for Christmas Eve in the Milanese Missal (Pamel. u. s. i. 445). We are probably to understand with Pamelius, that it is for exceptional use; viz. when seven Sundays occur in Advent, which in the province of Milan begins on the first Sunday after Martinmas. Mabillon, however (Lit. Gall. 99), reads, Missa de Expectato, and suggests a comparison with the "Praeparatio ad Vesperam Natalis Domini" in the Miss. Gall. Vet. (ibid. 336); but the reading in all the editions, including Mabillon's own, is not Praeparatio but Praefatio, and the formula which follows the above heading is a "preface" in the Gallican sense; i.e. an address to the people. See Thomasius, Liber Sacram. ii. 441, Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 706; Forbes, Gall. Lit. 158.

(8.) Missa pro Gratiarum actione. There is no proper missa in the old sacramentaries that is, or could be, so described; but the holy Eucharist was celebrated as an act of special thanksgiving at an early period. Thus in a work of the 5th century we read that when a woman had been healed at the ordinary celebration "an oblation of thanksgiving was again made for her" (De Prom. et Praed. Dei; Dim. Temp. 4; inter opp. Prosperi). A rubric in the present Roman Missal orders that "for thanksgiving be said the mass of the most holy Trinity, or of the Holy Ghost, or of the blessed Mary" certain proper prayers (Oratio, Secreta, Postcommunio) "being added under the same ending." The Missa de Trinitate descends from an early period, being found in the Codex S. Blasianus of the Gregorian Sacramentary which is of the 9th century (Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Alem. i. 260). The Missa de Spiritu Sancto is only an adaptation of the Gregorian missa for Whitsunday (Murat. u. s. ii. 90). We cannot connect them with acts of thanksgiving within our period; but that a special celebration on recovery of health was then common may be inferred from a Narbonne pontifical, the MS. of which is not much later. In this it is said that the patient "restored to health by the mercy of God ought by no means to omit causing a missa pro gratiarum actione to be celebrated" (Martene, u. s. i. vii. iv. 13).

(9.) Missa Jejuni is the title of four Lenten missae (22-25) in the Missale Gothico-Gallicanum (Liturg. Gall. 231, etc.), and of four in the Sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 304). See after, Missa Quadragesimalis.

(10.) Missa Judicii, the mass said at an ordeal. The expression forms the title of the proper prayers used at a trial by cold water, as appointed by Dunstan of Canterbury (Baluz, Cap. Reg. Franc. ii. 647). The missa consists of a proper antiphon, collect, three lessons (Lev. xix. 10-14; Eph. iv. 23-28; St. Mark x. 17-21), gradual, offertory, secreta, preface, benedictio ad iudicium, antiphona post communionem, and post-communio. The words of delivery common (with variations) to this and later forms of the kind (see Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. vii. 3, 5, 8, 9, 17) are, "The Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ be unto you for probation this day." Gerbert (Disquis. vi. iii. 3) gives in full the missa of an "Ordo ad faciendum iudicium, cum volueris homines iudicio probare, vel aquae frigidae vel ferventis, aut igniti ferri, vel vomere-rum, aut panis et casei, vel mensuræ." Several orders, some with missæ, may be seen in Martene, u. s.

A kindred practice among priests was that of celebrating the Eucharist in attestation of their own innocence. Thus Gregory of Tours relates that in order to clear himself of a charge of having slandered the queen, "dictis missis in tribus altaribus se de his verbis exueret sacramento" (Hist. Franc. v. 50). This was probably common; for in 868 it was enforced by the Council of Worms, which ordered that bishops and presbyters accused of homicide, adultery, theft, and witchcraft should "celebrate a mass for each charge and say the secret publicly and communicate" (can. 10). So late as 1077 we find Gregory VII. using this method to purge himself from simony (Life by Bowden, iii. 12). Nor was it confined to the clergy. The year after the Council of Worms, Lothaire the king of Lorraine received the mass from the hands of Hadrian in attestation of his freedom from the crime of adultery (Fleury, Hist. du Christ. li. 23).

(11.) Missa Legitima is a mass celebrated with all due requisites. "We must own that to be a missa legitima at which are present a priest, one to respond, one who offers, and one who communicates, as the very composition of the prayers clearly shews" (Walafrid, de Reb. Eccl. 22). Compare the use of the phrase "communio legitima." Penitents supposed to be dying might be communicated without the previous laying on of hands by the bishop; but if they recovered after that, they were to "stand in the order of penitents, that when they had shown the necessary fruits of repentance, they might receive 'legitimam communionem' with the reconciliatory imposition of hands" (can. 3, Conc. Araus. A.D. 441; inserted much later in Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 138; compare Isaaci Lingon. Canones, i. 6).

(12.) Missa Matutina. The 4th canon of the Council of Vaison, held in 529, runs thus: "Ut in omnibus missis, sive matutinis, sive quadragesimalibus . . . semper Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus dicatur," etc. The ground of the distinction is that in Lent the celebration took place in the afternoon, whereas generally it was at the third hour (Notitia Euch. 31-36). The third Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, forbids men to attend armed "sacrificia matutina missarum sive vespertina" (can. 29). "Evening" masses include those of Wednesday and Friday which, except between Easter and Whitsuntide, were also in the afternoon. The Gothico-Gallican (Lit. Gall. 254) and Old Gallican (ibid. 372) missals have a missa matutinalis per totum Pascha pro parvulis qui renati sunt (mature dicenda, Miss. Gall. Vet.). At a later period the ordinary daily mass said in many monasteries after Prime in summer and after Terce in winter, was called missa matutinalis; as in the Consuetudines S. Victoris 68, in Martene, u. s. iii. 283; Constit. S. Dionys. Rem. ibid. 297, 301. This earlier mass was called missa minor in contrast to the missa major or conventualis, which was celebrated with greater ritual solemnity. See Martene, de Antiq. Monach. Rit. ii. 5.

(14.) Missa Omnimoda is the title of a votive

Missa in the Sacramentary of Besançon, which the priest offers for himself (as expressed in the præfatio) for sinners by name (as in the collectio), for persons living and departed whose names are presented (in the post nomina), for the sick, naming them, and generally for "all stricken with fear, afflicted by want, harassed by trouble, brought down by diseases, consigned to punishment, bound by debts, in captivity, and journeying" (in the ad pacem), these several petitions being summed up in the contestation (Mus. Ital. i. 359). A similar missa with much in common occurs in the Mozarabic Missal under the title Missa Votiva Omnimoda (Leslie, 441). Missa Omnimoda is again the name of a late mass of general intercession in the St. Gall codex of the Gregorian Sacramentary, probably written soon after the death of Charlemagne (Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Alem. i. 268).

(15.) Missa Omnium Offerentium is a name given to the invariable portions of the liturgy of Gothic Spain. The lesser missal which contains it is called Liber Omnium Offerentium. The name is appropriate because a considerable part of the service to which it is applied is assigned to the choir, the representative of the people; so that all the worshippers have their share in it. Whether the title was adopted for this reason is, however, not certain. In any case it may have been suggested by the occurrence of the words at the oblation of the chalice: "Omnium Offerentium eorum pro quibus tibi offertur, peccata indulge" (Miss. Mozar. 223). The same words occur together in a Collectio post nomina of Gothic France (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 237); but neither there does the context give them any conventional significance. In early times the people were said to offer even in the commemoration of the sacrifice of the cross after the consecration. Thus Florus of Lyons, explaining the Unde et memores, etc., of the canon, says, "Memores igitur Dominicæ passionis, resurrectionis et ascensionis, tam sacerdotes quam plebs fidelis offerunt præclaræ . . . majestati Dei non de suo, sed de ejus donis ac datis," etc. (De Expos. Missæ, 64). This is implied by a synod held by St. Patrick and other bishops, which order that a bishop in the diocese of another shall "on the Lord's day offer only by partaking," i. e. as a layman (can. 30; Migne, 53, col. 826).

(16.) Missa Paschalis. The missæ provided in the Gothico-Gallican Missal for four days in Easter week, viz. from Tuesday to Friday inclusively (Lit. Gall. 254-6), and those to be used from Monday to Friday of the same week in the Old Gallican (ibid. 367-371) are so called. There are also two Missæ Paschales in the sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 330, 2).

(17.) Missa Peculiaris. A mass said on any private account, as e. g. for the repose of the dead, was so called in the 8th century. Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 797, orders that "Missæ Peculiariæ performed by priests on Sundays be not so publicly performed as to draw the people from the public celebrations of masses, which take place canonically on the third hour" (Capit. c. 45; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1147).

(18.) Missa Pontificalis, a mass celebrated by a bishop. We are not aware that the phrase occurs within our range of time. The Ordo Romanus I., supposed to have been compiled about 730, which gives directions for an episcopal mass, is inscribed in its earliest extant copy, which is of the 10th century, Ordo Ecclesiastici Ministerii Romanae Ecclesiae. A later copy has Incipit Ordo Ecclesiasticus Romanae ecclesiae, qualiter Missa Pontificalis celebretur (Mus. Ital. ii. 2, 3).

(19.) Missa Praesantificatorum. See PRESANCTIFIED, MASS OF THE.

(20.) Missa Privata is used in two senses. It either means (1) "A mass celebrated in private and on a special account without singing, and but one clerk ministering, whether it be in a church or private oratory" (Merati in Gavanti, p. i. in Rubr. Gen. Obs. Praelim. § 46), in which case it is distinguished from a solemn mass; or (2) "A mass in which the priest alone communicates" (ibid.), in which case it is opposed to a public mass. A daily mass celebrated out of devotion in the earlier ages would come under the former head. An example (in Cassius bishop of Narni) is mentioned by Gregory I. (Dial. iv. 56). In neither sense does the phrase appear to have been in use during our period. See Missa Solitaria.

(21.) Missa Publica is a celebration at which all may be present and communicate. The expression is frequent in the epistles of Gregory I. Thus he "forbids that Public Masses should on any account be celebrated" in a (certain) monastery by the bishop of the diocese, that the retirement of the monks might not be invaded by the concourse of people from without (iv. 43), and severely condemns another bishop for having placed his throne in a monastic church and celebrated "Public Masses" there (v. 46). He orders an oratory to be "solemnly consecrated without Public Masses" (vii. 72), and speaks in reprobation of a bishop who had "built an oratory in the diocese of another . . . and did not fear to celebrate Public Masses there" (xi. 21). Another example from a law of Charlemagne in 803 will suffice. Among other restrictions laid on the chorepiscopi he forbade them to "give the benediction to the people in Publicâ Missâ" (Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 382).

(22.) Missa Quadragesimalis, a missa to be used in Lent. See above, Missa Matutina, and Missa Jejuni. A lenten missa in the Besançon Sacramentary bears the title Missa Quadragesimalis (Mus. Ital. i. 302). One of those in the Gothico-Gallican Missal is headed Missa in Quadragesima (Lit. Gall. p. 234). In the last-named missal there are in all only six proper missae provided for Lent. The Gallicanum Vetus is defective from Christmas to the great scrutiny and exhibits none (ibid. 338). There are but five in the Besançon rite. On the other hand the Gelasian and Gregorian give a missa for every day in the season, and the Mozarabic one for every Sunday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Roman missae for the week-days in Lent are supposed to have been chiefly borrowed from those of Milan (Pamel. Rituale, i. 328). The latter is peculiar in having none for the Fridays (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. xviii. 21; Gerbert, Mon. Lit. Al. i. 42).

(23.) Missa Quotidiana appears to be a missa that may be used on any day that has no proper prayers provided for it. There is an example (Missa Cottidiana) in the Besançon Sacramentary (Mus. It. i. 382). Compare Legendis Cottidianis (379), Lectiones Cottidianas (338, 381), Lectiones

Cottidianae (382, 3), which are the headings to lessons for similar use. Again, we have Lectio libri Danieli Prophetæ in Cottidiana (sc. Missa) legenda (278). Two missae in the same book have the incoherent title of Missa Cottidiana Dominicalis (380, 3), i. e. a missa that may be used on any Sunday that has not its proper missa. In the Gregorian Sacramentary is Missa Quotidiana pro Rege, i. e. that might be said whenever the priest chose (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 188). See further under Missa Romensis.

(25.) Missa Romensis, i. e. borrowed from the Roman books. The old Gallican canon was very short, being nothing more than the recital of the institution, which was added to the variable Collectio post Sanctus. The first words of it (Ipse enim pridie quam, etc.) are frequently so added in the Gothico-Gallican Missal (Lit. Gall. 189, 192, 5, etc.). The Besançon Sacramentary, however, had adopted the long Roman canon, which it put after the contestatio (see PREFACE), omitting the post Sanctus. It occurs thus in the first missa in the book, and that missa bears the title, Missa Romensis Cottidiana (Mus. It. 279). As the missa retains most of its Gallican forms under their usual names (post nomina, ad pacem, etc.), the word "Romensis" must refer to the canon almost entirely, and therefore "Cottidiana" here indicates the daily use of that. The last missa in the Gothico-Gallican Missal has the similar heading, Missa Cottidiana Romensis (Lit. Gall. 300); but after the first collect the MS. fails us. That collect, however, being identical with one in the Besançon missa helps the conclusion that the Roman canon followed in that book also, and that the Goths in Gaul, though retaining throughout their liturgy their own mode of consecration, yet permitted an optional use of the Roman.

(26.) Missa de Sanctis. At a very early period it became the custom to observe the anniversary of a martyr's death. On such occasions the Eucharist was celebrated, partly as an act of intercession for the soul of the deceased, and partly as a thankful commemoration of the triumph of truth and grace in his death. Soon the rite was observed in the case of other eminent Christians, and ere long, the original ground of it becoming obscured, the celebration was supposed to be in honour of the person (in honorem ipsorum,—in ejus honore; Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 47, 75). The story of Polycarp (A.D. 147) gives us the earliest example of such commemoration: "We deposited his remains where it was fitting, where gathered together as opportunity serves with joy and gladness the Lord will grant unto us to celebrate the natal day of his martyrdom, both in memory of those who have fought the good fight (for twelve suffered with him), and for the training and preparation of those who will be called to it" (Eccl. Smyrn. Epist. 18). Tertullian, A.D. 192: "We make oblations for the departed on one day in the year, for birthday gifts" (De Cor. 3). Cyprian in 250 orders his clergy to inform him of the days on which any were put to death, "that he might be able to celebrate their commemorations among the Memorials of the Martyrs . . . that oblations and sacrifices in commemoration of them might be celebrated" where he was (Epist. 12 ad Presbyt.).

Again: "As ye remember, we never fail to offer sacrifices for them as often as we celebrate the passions and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration" (Ep. 39 ad Presbyt.). Sixty-two sermons ascribed with confidence to St. Augustine, who died in 430, were preached on martyrs' days (Class. iii. ed. Ben.). In the course of time proper Missae were written for these occasions, such as are now known under the name of Missae de Sanctis.

The titles of such missae in the ancient sacramentaries are variously constructed. In the Missale Gothicum we have, e.g. Missa in Natale Agnes (sic) Virginis et Martyris (Lit. Gall. 215), Missa S. Saturnini, Episcopi et Martyris (ibid. 219), Missa de pluris Martyris (sic) (287), etc.; in the Besançon Sacramentary, Missa Sancti Stefani (Mus. It. 3, i. 292), Missa in Sanctorum Infantium (293), Missa de uno Confessore (347), etc. In the Milanese Missal all run thus, In Festo S. Thomae (Pamel. i. 444), etc.; in that of Gothic Spain thus, In Natale SS. Innocentium (Leslie, 48), or In Sancti Stephani Levite et Martyris (41), or In Festo Sancti Luciani Presbyteri et Martyris (289). The Roman sacramentaries use commonly the word Natale, as Natale Sancti Andree Apostoli (Sacr. Leon. Murat. i. 464), In Natali Sancti Johannis Evangelistae (474), In Natal. Innocent. (Gelas. ibid. 499), but In Nativitate Sanctae Euphimiæ (643). The Gregorian has Natale Sanctae Priscæ (ii. 19), and so generally; but (of a preface), Item alia Specialis in Festivitate S. Cypriani (335).

Some of the Missae de Sanctis retained their original intercessory character for a long time. In the Leonian Sacramentary there is one headed "Sancti Silvestri," in which are prayers both for him (dec. A.D. 336) and Simplicius (dec. 483); for the former in separate prayers, that "he may rejoice for ever in the society of the saints" of God, and that "endless beatitude may glorify him" (Murat. i. 454); for the latter, that "his soul being freed from all things which from the nature of man it hath brought on it, may have its portion in the lot of holy pastors" (ibid.). This Missa is not found in the Gelasian or Gregorian books. Another instance is the Gregorian Super Oblata in the missae of St. Leo and St. Gregory: "Vouchsafe to us, O Lord, that the (Greg. this) oblation by the immolation of which Thou hast granted that the sins of the whole world should be forgiven may profit the soul of Thy servant Leo (Gregory)" (ibid. ii. 25, 101). An archbishop of Lyons observing that the last clause had been altered into, "may profit us through the intercession of the blessed Leo (Gregory)," wrote to Innocent III., A.D. 1198, for an explanation. The pope justified the change by quoting as Scripture a sentiment of St. Augustine (Serm. 159, c. 1, and Tract. 84 in S. Johan. xv.): "Since the authority of Sacred Writ says that 'he who prays for a martyr wrongs a martyr,' the same should by parity of reason be thought of the other saints" (Deor. Const. iii. 130). The earlier and the mediaeval grounds are combined in a passage of Gregory of Tours, who tells us that persons stricken with ague who "devoutly celebrated masses in honour of St. Sigismund and offered the oblation to God for his repose" were immediately healed (Mirac. i. 75).

(27.) Missa pro Scrutinio. Those masses were so called which were said on the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Sundays in Lent on behalf of the catechumens preparing for baptism on Easter Eve. "Scrutinium," says Amalarius, "proprium syntagma habet et propriam missam" (De Eccles. Off. i. 8). Four Missae pro scrutinii electorum are assigned, one to each of the Sundays above-named, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Murat. i. 521, 5, 9, 533). The Gallican church had only one such Missa, which was said on Palm Sunday, until Charlemagne ordered the observance of the Roman system of scrutinia (Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372). It is called Missa in Symboli Traditione (Mus. It. i. 314; Lit. Gall. 235, 346). At Milan the creed was delivered to the competentes on the day before Palm Sunday (Sabbato in Traditione Symboli) and a similar mass said (Pamel. i. 336).

(28.) Missa Secunda. Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vit. Pont. R. 69) states that Deusdedit of Rome, 614, "instituted a Second Mass in clero;" i.e. among monks (see CLERUS and above Missa Matutina). A second public celebration had long been the custom when a church open to all could not contain at one time all who desired to communicate. Leo, A.D. 440, says that this was the practice at Rome, and begs the pope of Alexandria to sanction it in his patriarchate, "that their observance might in all things accord" (Ep. 11 ad Diosc. 2).

(29.) Missa Secca. Dry Masses are not heard of before the 13th century. We refer to them here because, owing to an oversight in regard to the pontifical of Prudentius of Troye, they have been put by some four hundred years earlier. See Notitia Eucharistica, 816 n. ed. 2.

(30.) Missa Singularis. A special Mass on behalf of one person. The phrase occurs in the life of Wilfrid of York by Haddius, A.D. 720: "Omni die pro eo Missam Singularem celebrare" (cap. 62 in Gale, Script. xv. i. 78). In the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, 446) is a Missa Votiva Singularis, in every prayer of which the name of the person (everywhere supposed to be one) is to be inserted.

(31.) Missa Solitaria. We do not find the expression in use before the Middle Ages, but by the beginning of the 9th century priests had certainly begun to celebrate without attendants. This is forbidden by the council of Mentz, 813: "No presbyter, as it seems to us, can sing masses alone rightly, for how will he say, The Lord be with you. . . when there is no one with him?" (can. 43). The council of Paris, 829: "A reprehensible practice and worthy of meet correction has, partly through neglect, partly through avarice, crept in in most places; viz. that some of the presbyters celebrate the solemn rites of masses without ministers" (i. can. 48). Comp. Cap. Reg. Fr. v. 159; Add. ii. 9; Herard, cap. i. 9.

(32.) Missa Specialis, a private mass in the more ancient sense, i.e. for a special object. Thus in the Gregorian Sacramentary, a missa to be used when a priest says a mass for the forgiveness of his own sins is entitled Missa Specialis Sacerdotis (Murat. ii. 190; compare two with the same heading among those ascribed to Grimoldus, Pamel. ii. 428). "Special," of a preface, mentioned above in (26), means that it commemorates St. Cyprian alone, and not Cornelius also, as another does, their feasts falling on the same day. The expression occurs also in an epistle of Charlemagne to Fastrada. "Et sacerdos unusquisque Missam Specialem fecisset, nisi infirmitas impedisset" (Ep. de Vict. Avar. in Hist. Franc. Script. 187, or Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 257). He is speaking of the litanies and other services prescribed for a public fast.

(33.) Missa in Symboli traditione. See Missa pro Scrutinio.

(34.) Missa de Tempore; i.e. adapted to some sacred day or season of the Christian year. Such masses are in all the ancient missals, though the phrase is late. The Gregorian, Milanese, and Mozarabic provide missae for every Sunday in the year, as well as for the great days of Christmas, Epiphany, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Easter, etc. In some cases also for the feria connected with them. The Gallican rites having been suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne towards the close of the 8th century (Lebrun, Dissert. iv. art. i.) are less methodised and full, but they are framed on the same principle.

(36.) Missa Votiva. By this is now meant any mass not of the day, even though prescribed, as, e.g. the masses of the Blessed Virgin on the first two Saturdays in Advent (Merati in Gavanti, P. i. Rubr. Gen. Obs. Prael. 66). Originally, however, it meant a celebration at which some special blessing, temporal or spiritual, was sought, whether for the celebrant or others. This is the character of two Missae Votivae (omnimoda, singularis) already cited from the Mozarabic Missal (see (14) and (30)). Other examples, though not so inscribed, occur in the same book; as Missa de Itinerantibus, de Tribulationibus, pro alio Sacerdote fratre suo vivo, de uno Infirmo, pro Infirmis (pp. 447-454). The Besançon Missal has four headed "Missa Votiva" for blessings on a single person to be named in the office (Mus. Ital. 360-2); and two others, one of which, pro Vivis et Defunctis (363), speaks of brothers, sisters, and benefactors. In the other, entitled Missa in domo cujuslibet (364), the names of the family are to be introduced. There are no missae of the kind in the other Gallican missals with the exception of one entitled Orationes et Prec. pro Regibus in that of the Franks (Lit. Gall. 316). If we except some masses for the dead, there are no Missae Votivae in the Ambrosian Liturgy, nor does the phrase appear in it. The collections under the names of Grimoldus (Pamel. ii. 388) and Aleuin (ibid. 517) contain votive missae, but they are not so described. This is the case also with the Leonian (Murat. i. 434, etc.) and Gelasian (ibid. 725, etc.) Sacramentaries. In the ancient copy of the Gregorian printed by Pamelius (tom. ii.) we find neither the name nor thing; but both in those printed by Muratori (ii. 193, etc.), Gerbert (Mon. Vet. Lit. Alem. 279 etc.), the editors of the works of Gregory published in 1615 (tom. v. 221, etc.) and others.

We find an early instance of a votive celebration of the Eucharist in St. Augustine. His presbyters were requested to send one of their number to pray in a haunted house. "One went, offered there the sacrifice of Christ's body, praying to His power for the cessation of that trouble. Through the mercy of God it forthwith ceased" (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, 6).

XI. The Eucharist had acquired the name of missa a long time before any one phrase (such as missam celebrare, audire) was generally accepted to denote the celebration of the sacrament or lay attendance at it. The following list is thought to contain all in use within our limit of time.

(1.) Missam agere, peragere. The Gelasian Sacramentary: "Si fuerit oblata, agendae sunt missae, et communicet" (Murat. i. 596). Sim. in two edicts of Hunneric the Vandal, A.D. 484: "In ecclesiis vestris missas agere" (Hist. Persicc. Vand. Vict. Vit. ii. 2), "Reperti sunt contra interdictum missas in sortibus Vandalorum egisse" (ibid. in c. xiii.). We find also missam peragere; e.g. Ordo Rom. I., after prescribing the consecration of the oil for the sick before the end of the canon, adds, "et deinceps peragitur missa ordine suo" (c. 30; Mus. It. ii. 20).

(2.) Missam audire. We have not noticed this, afterwards common, phrase in the writers of the first eight centuries. It occurs, however, early in the 9th; viz. in the 19th canon of the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813: "Let families give their tithes in the place in which their children are baptized, and where they hear masses through the whole course of the year." The council of Paris, 829: "Satiatus igitur est illis missam non audire, quam eam ubi non licet nec oportet audire" (i. 47). It is instructive to observe that when Gratian, A.D. 1131, professes to give the 47th canon of Agde (A.D. 506), for "Missas a saecularibus totas teneri... praecipimus," he substitutes "Missas... saecularibus totas audire... praecipimus" (De Consecr. i. 64).

(3.) Missam cantare, decantare. Bede says of Ceolfrið that from the day he left his monastery to go to Rome to the day of his death "quotidie missâ cantatâ salutaris hostiae Deo munus offerret" (Hist. Abbat. Wirem. § 16, sim. § 13). In 803 a petition was presented by the people to Charlemagne, praying that when the king and his lay subjects went against the enemy the bishops might stay at home and attend to their proper duties, among which are mentioned "Missas cantare et letanias atque eleemosynas facere" (Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 405; sim. 470, 5, 730, etc.). The council of Mentz, 813: "Nullus presbyter, ut nobis videtur, solus missam cantare valet recte" (can. 43). We must suppose that originally the use of the word cantare implied that the mass was sung or chanted. That this meaning was lost sight of in the 9th century is evident from the language of Amalarius and others respecting the canon: "In eo videlicet quod ista oratio specialiter ad sacerdotem pertinet... secreto eam decantat" (Amal. Eglola, 21). Remigius of Auxerre: "Consuetudo venit in Ecclesiâ, ut tacite ista obsecratio atque consecratio cantetur" (in the chapter De Celebr. Miss. of Pseudo-Aleuin, Hittorp. 284).

(4.) Missam celebrare. This is in very common use from the 6th century downwards, and sometimes even of the laity; as of the sick seeking to be healed, "Si... missas devote celebrant" (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 75); even of a woman, "Celebrans quotidie missarum solemniam" (De Glor. Confess. 65). The Capitulary of Aix, 789: "Auditum est aliquos presbyteros missam celebrare, et non communicare" (c. 6, Labbe, vii. 970). Theodulf of Orleans, A.D. 797: "Missam sacerdotem celebrante" (Capit. i. 6, ibid. 1138), "Sacerdos missam solus nequiquam celebret" (ibid. c. 7). See Capit. Reg.

Franc. i. 409, 417, 956, 1206. "Missarum mysteria, solemnia, celebrare" are also frequent, as Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 90, 87.

(5.) Missam consecrare. Gregory of Tours: "Ejus clerici concinant qui consecrat missas" (Vitae Patr. 5).

(6.) Missam dicere. Dictis missis (Hist. Franc. ix. 20; Mirac. i. 34, 90). The council of Mâcon 581: "Ut archiepiscopus sine pallio missas dicere non praesumat" (can. 6).

(7.) Missam facere. St. Ambrose: "Missam facere coepi" (Epist. xx. 4); the council of Toledo, 646: "Missas facere" (can. 2), "faciendi missam" (8); Ordo Rom. I.: "Quando (presbyter) in statione facit missas" (c. 22; Mus. Ital. ii. 17); Charlemagne in 303: "Ipsi pro nobis et cuncto exercitu nostro missas, letanias, oblationes, elemosynas faciant" (Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 405; sim. in Epist. ad Fastradam, ibid. 257).

(8.) Missam peragere. See Missam agere.

(9.) Missam recitare. "Ut missa recitaretur communis inunxi dilecto filio meo" (Braulio, A.D. 627, in Ep. Vitae S. Aemiliani praeef. Acta Bened. saec. i. iii. 206).

(10.) Missam revocare meant to celebrate a mass, but the ground of the usage is obscure and doubtful. Mabillon thinks that there is in the expression an allusion per antiphrasim to the original sense of missa, "the people having been dismissed before are again called back to the sacrifice" (Lit. Gall. 57). But from what have they been dismissed? It is used when no previous service is implied as by Gregory of Tours, who says of a queen of the Franks that, after passing a night watching, she in the morning "missas expetiit revocari" (Mirac. S. Mart. i. 12). He relates also of his own mother, that, being warned by a vision that an epidemic would attack her house, she heard a voice at the same time saying, "Vade et vigila totam noctem in honore (S. Benigni) et revoca missas" (Mirac. i. 51). Similarly Venantius Fortunatus: "Vigiliis in honore Sancti celebratis, ac missa revocatâ, de praesenti curata est" (Vita S. Germani, 60; Migne, 88, col. 472); and again of queen Rade Gund: "Missâ revocatâ... sacrum componit altare" (Vita, 14; u. s. col. 503). It will be observed that in all these cases a special mass performed at request is implied, for which without doubt the person mentioned supplied the materials directly or indirectly. In the first instance it is said that the queen "offered many gifts." The original notion is, therefore, probably, to supply or furnish a mass; for "revocare" often = "reddere." Thus, "Eulogias revocans Domino rerum" (Vita Frontonii in Roswey, 240); and (completely to our purpose) St. Aridius in his will directs that several persons benefited by it, "singulis mensibus eulogias vicissim ad missas nostras revocent" (ad calc. Opp. S. Greg. Tur. 1312). "Missam revocare" means, therefore, we conceive, to cause a mass to be celebrated, supplying the means. The same Aridius, ordering matins and a mass to be maintained by his monks for ever, expresses himself thus: "Ut... maturius matutina et missa sanctorum domnorum a monachis ibidem revocetur" (ibid. 1314).

* This alone would disprove an earlier conjecture of Mabillon, that "missam revocare" means to celebrate a recurring festival (see above, No. IX.). When he offered this (in note to Fortunatus, Vita Germani, c. 60) he thought that the phrase was "peculiar to Fortunatus." The suggestion is reprinted by Migne, without comment, though withdrawn by Mabillon in Lit. Gall. 57.

(11.) Missam spectare. The Council of Orleans, 538: "Sacrificia matutina missarum sive vespertina ne quis cum armis pertinentibus ad bellorum usum spectet" (can. 29). Gregory of Tours: "Rex ecclesiam ad spectanda missarum solemnia petit" (Hist. Franc. viii. 7); "Ad basilicam... properavit, quasi spectatura missas" (ibid. ix. 9; see also x. 8, and S. Mart. Mir. iii. 19). This phrase was so familiar to Gregory that he falls into the use of it even when speaking of a blind man: "Cum reliquo populo missarum solemnia spectaret" (S. Mart. Mir. ii. 13).

(12.) Missam tenere. This idiom is clearly distinguished from missam facere by the council of Agde, A.D. 506: "Si qui in festivitatibus... in oratoriis, nisi jubente aut permittente episcopo, missas facere, aut tenere, voluerint, a communione pellantur" (can. 21). Here missam tenere is evidently said of the lay attendant. In canon 47 this is expressed: "Missas Die Dominico a saecularibus totas teneri speciali ordinatione praecipimus." So Gregory of Tours of a layman: "Procedens nobiscum ad ecclesiam missarum solemnia tenuit" (Hist. Franc. vi. 40). But the second council of Bracara, 560 or 563, appears to use it of priest and people both: "Si quis quintâ feriâ paschali, quae est Coena Domini, horâ legitimâ, post nonam jejunos in ecclesia missas non tenet... anathema sit" (can. 16). In the Rule of St. Benedict it is also used of the celebrant, as when providing for the reception of a priest into his monastery he says, "Concedatur ei... post abbatem stare et benedicere, aut missas tenere, si tamen jusserit ei abbas" (c. 60; Holst. ii. 55).

(13.) Missam tractare. "Non licet presbytero aut diacono, aut subdiacono post acceptum cibum vel poculum missas tractare" (Conc. Autiss. A.D. 578, can. 19). Ducange finds the expression in an edict of Hunneric already cited in (1): "Missas agere, vel tractare"; but this is a mistake. The context ("quibus voluerint linguis populo tractare") shews that "tractare" must be taken by itself, and that it means, as in other authors, to expound the Scriptures.

MISSAL (Liber Missalis, Missalis, Missale). I. The later missal contains the lessons and antiphons, as well as the canon, proper prayers or collects and prefaces, to be used at the celebration of the Eucharist throughout the year. Originally, however, the book so called did not contain either the lessons or antiphons. This is evident from the fact that the lectionary and antiphonary are often spoken of as books distinct from the missal, and that we have independent examples of both remaining. [See ANTIPHONARIUM; LECTIONARIUM.] Egbert of York, A.D. 732, who is, we think, the earliest writer who speaks of a Liber Sacramentorum under the name of missal, says, "Our master the blessed Gregory in his antiphonary and missal book (Missali libro)" (De Instit. Cathol. xvi. 1). We have that "missal book" (the Gregorian Sacramentary), and find in it neither antiphons nor lessons. Again: "Not our antiphonaries only bear witness, but those very copies which we have seen with their missals at the thresholds of the apostles Peter and Paul" (ibid. 2). He ordered that all who desired to be ordained priests should previously provide themselves with "a psalter, lectionary, antiphony, missal (missale), baptismal office, martyrology . . . and computus with cycle" (Can. de Remediis Peccatorum, i.). Charlemagne in 789: "If there be occasion to write out a gospel (i.e. a book of the gospels) or psalter and missal, let men of full age write them" (Capit. i. 70; in Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 68; vi. 371). Alcuin in 796: "Missas quoque reliquas de nostro tui missali ad quotidianam et ecclesiasticam consuetudinis officia" (Ep. 46, ad Monach. Vedast. i. 59, ed. 1777); "Misi chartulam missalem vobis" (Ep. 192, ad Mon. Fuld. 256). Ludovicus Pius, 816: Bishops are to "take care that the presbyters have a missal and lectionary or other books necessary for them well corrected" (Capit. 28; sim. Capit. R. Fr. i. 103; vi. 229). A copier of books, writing about 826 to an old friend who had become archbishop of Mentz, says, "Send me some good parchment for writing out one lectionary and one Gregorian missal" (latto Otkero, inter Epist. Bonifacianas, 138; ed. Wurdthw.). Amalarius, 827: "The authors of the lectionary and antiphony, and of the missal of which we believe the blessed Pope Gregory to be the author" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 30); "It is found written in the ancient books of missals and antiphonaries" (ibid. iii. 40). There were in 831 in the monastic library of St. Riquier at Centule several books known as missals: "Tres missales Gregoriani, missalis Gregorianus et Gelasianus modernis temporibus ab Albino (Alcuino) ordinatus . . . missales Gelasiani xix." (Chron. Centul. iii. in Dach. Spicil. ii. 311; Par. 1723). The Gelasian Sacramentary (and, we may add, the Leonian) resembled the Gregorian in consisting of prayers and prefaces only. Had Alcuin inserted the lessons and antiphons, a circumstance so unusual would certainly have been noticed. They were probably distinct books for a century at least after his time. Thus Walter of Orleans, A.D. 867, orders his clergy to "have the church books, to wit the missal, gospel (evangelium=evangelarium, as in the law of Charlemagne), lectionary (=epistolarium), psalter, antiphony, martyrology and homiliary, by which to instruct himself and others" (Capitula, 7). An episcopal charge of that period says, "Let your missals, graduals, lectionaries and antiphonaries be complete and perfect" (App. ad Reginonis Discipl. Eccl. 505; ed. Baluz.).

II. We do not read of Missalia Plenaria (or Plenaria) before the 9th century, but they are then spoken of in such a manner as to shew that they were neither new nor of recent introduction. A will is extant, written about the year 840, which bequeaths "a plenary missal with the gospels and epistles" (Testam. Heccardi in Péard, Pièces servant à l'Histoire de Bourgogne, 26). We gather from this that a plenary missal of those days did not contain the eucharistic lessons. Leo IV., A.D. 847, in some instructions to his clergy: "Let every church have a plenary missal and lectionary and antiphony" (De Curâ Past.; Labbe, Conc. viii. 36; sim. Ratherius of Verona, ibid. ix. 1271; and again Admonitio Synodalis, App. ad Regin. u. s. 503). The question was asked at visitations whether all the clergy were possessed of those several books, "Missale plenarium, lectionarium, antiphonarium" (Inquisitio 10, apud Regin. u. s. 7). The missale plenarium of a later age contained the lessons and antiphons as well as the collects and prefaces (Merati in Gavanti; Observ. Prælim. i. 4); but it is clear from the foregoing testimonies, though the fact has escaped Du-cange, Bocquillot, and others, that they were not included in the volume to which that name was originally given. Gerbert appears to be right in thinking that at first the plenary missal was a sacramentary which gave the missae for every day, and not those for Sundays and other chief festivals, or for other special use, alone (Disquis. ii. i. 29, p. 108; ii. 1, p. 116). There was a missal of the latter kind written in the 8th century in the library of St. Gall, and later examples are extant (ibid. 108). The missal which Alcuin mentions in his epistle to the monks of St. Vedast cited above was apparently one of this sort. It may well be doubted whether plenary missals in the other and later sense existed within our period. Gerbert (116) says that he never saw a MS. of that description belonging to the 9th century. No Roman missal of that age contains even the epistles and gospels. In France, however, the lessons without the antiphons had occasionally been incorporated with the missae long before; for we find them in the Besançon Sacramentary, which is assigned to the 7th century (Mabill. Mus. Ital. i. 275), though not in the other Gallican missals, which date from the eighth (Liturg. Gallic. Mabill. 175), or in the Frankish which Mabillon ascribes to the seventh (ibid. 178). A very ancient Tabularium or Polyptychon preserved at Rheims, the exact date of which, however, is not given, also points to France as the country in which the amalgamation began; for it mentions as one book, "a missal of Gregory with the gospels and lessons (=epistles)" (in Notis Baluz. Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1155).

Other information respecting missals will be given under SACRAMENTARY.

MISSI DOMINICI. The word missus is frequently found in Capitularies, designating a messenger, ambassador, or deputy. Commissioners named by the king, with a kind of vice-regal power within certain limits, were called missi regis. Of these there were in the Carolingian period two classes: (1) the ordinary missi dominici or dominicales, regales, fiscales, palatini principales, often called missi simply; and (2) extraordinary missi (legati or nuncii) appointed for special emergencies. It is with the first that we are here concerned.

Pepin (Capit. Aquitan. A.D. 768, c. 12, Pertz, Mon. Germ. iv. 14) ratifies the decisions of "missi nostri" whether in relation to church or state; but the more complete development of the system belongs to the age of Charles the Great. Probably with a view of diminishing the excessive power of the dukes, who exercised both judicial and administrative functions in their territories, he transferred to missi dominici the charge of taking account of any complaints that might be made against bishops, abbats, or counts, or other holders of similar offices (Capit. an. 779, c. 21; Capit. Papiense, an. 789-790, c. 10; Capit. Generale, an. 789, c. 11; in Pertz, iii. 38, 71, 69). After Charles became Roman emperor, he named secular and spiritual persons together on these commissions. In a capitulary of Aachen (Cap. Aquisgran. an. 802, Pertz iii. 91 f.), he declares that he has chosen from his nobles as well archbishops as bishops, abbats and religious laymen, and given them charge over the whole of his kingdom; he grants to all his subjects to live according to right law by their means; and he requires the commissioners to note any points in which the law appeared defective, and report them to him, that he may amend them. For the purposes of this supervision, the empire was divided into circuits (missatica, legationes), coinciding generally with the province of a metropolitan, unless where the great extent of the province rendered a subdivision necessary; thus Mentz is said to have contained four circuits and Rheims two. In general two commissioners, an archbishop, bishop or abbat, and a count, were named for each circuit (Pertz, iii. 97, 98), but occasionally three or four. The missi received written instructions, and the emperor frequently gave them oral directions also (Pertz, iii. 121). As they were the immediate instruments of the central power, no part of the administration lay entirely beyond their sphere. They were (1) to enforce the due execution of the laws, both in church and state (Capit. an. 802, cc. 25, 26; cf. cap. missorum an. 806, c. 2, &c. Pertz, iii. 137, 164). (2) Suits not decided by the counts or their deputies they might themselves judge, for which purpose they were to hold assizes four times a year, in January, April, July, and October (Capit. Aquisgran. an. 812, c. 8; Pertz, iii. 174). (3) They were especially to look to the due maintenance of the arrangements for levying troops (Brev. Capit. an. 803, Pertz, iii. 119). (4) They were to have the oversight of public lands, whether belonging to the state or to the church. Registers or "terriers" of all landed estates were consequently required by them. Not only were the benefices of bishops, abbats, abbesses, and counts or vassals of the king to be described, but also those belonging to the fisc (Capit. Aquisgr. an. 812, c. 7; Pertz, iii. 174).

To facilitate the carrying out of their several duties, the missi held provincial courts, to which were summoned the higher dignitaries of the clergy, the counts and other officials, the king's vassals, &c. Those who did not appear were reported to the general court of the king (Cap. missio data an. 803, c. 5; Pertz, iii. 122).

The missi were to report to the king the results of their mission, both orally and in writing (Cap. ad leg. miss. an. 817, c. 13; Pertz, iii. 217). Cases of special difficulty were referred to the decision of the king himself

These missi dominici continued in full activity until the dissolution of the Frank-Carolingian empire. As the central power declined, the functions of the missi were partly absorbed by the dukes in their several dominions, partly supplanted by new offices. In several dioceses the bishops acquired the rights once enjoyed by them (see e.g. Conventus Ticinensis, an. 876, c. 12, in Pertz, iii. 531). (Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. ix. 549 ff.; Gengler, Germanische Rechtsdenkmäler, Glossary, s. v. Missus.) [C.]

MISSIONS. 1. Though Christian Missions had their origin in the example and command of our Lord Himself (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20), yet, as has been often noticed, the church can tell but little of her earliest teachers. Three only of the Saviour's immediate followers hold any immediate place in the apostolic records. We are told, indeed, of the labours of St. Andrew in Scythia (Euseb. H. E. iii. 1), of St. Thomas in India, of St. Matthew in Aethiopia (Fabrice's Lux Evang. pp. 92-115), but the very scantiness of these notices proves how little that is reliable has come down to us respecting the work of the founders of the earliest churches.

2. Moreover, this comparative silence extends to the records of the succeeding centuries. We know that the church gradually extended her conquests through Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, Southern Gaul and Northern Africa (Justin, Dial. c. 117; Tertull. Apol. 37; Adv. Jud. 7), the very centre of the old world and of its heathen culture, but there is little information to be found which bears upon the exact processes adopted in securing these triumphs.

3. Prayers, indeed, for the conversion of the heathen were early recognised as proper to Christian devotion, and are to be found in the liturgies alike of Eastern and Western churches [HEATHEN, p. 761], but we look in vain for any traces of actual organisations for this end.

4. In the first instance, as we might expect, the diffusion of Christianity proceeded from the evangelising labours of individual bishops and clergy. It was naturally regarded as part of their duty to win over to the faith the heathen that dwelt around them. Thus ULPILAS, A.D. 325, the "Apostle of the Goths," devoted himself, heart and soul, to the conversion of his countrymen, and of the populous colony of shepherds and herdmen, which he had formed on the slope of Mt. Haemus. (See The Life of Ulpilas, by bishop Auxentius, published by Waitz, of Kiel, 1840.) Thus, also, Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, A.D. 370, made his cathedral church the centre of a wide mission field, and St. Chrysostom founded, at Constantinople, A.D. 404, an institution, in which Goths might be trained and qualified to preach the gospel to their own people (Theodoret, H. E. v. 30); nor even during the years of his exile among the ridges of Mt. Taurus, did he forget those toiling in far distant mission-fields. In several extant epistles we find him advising the dispatch of missionaries to various places, consoling some under persecution, animating others by the example of the great apostle St. Paul, and soliciting funds for supporting mission stations. (St. Chrysost. Opp. iv. pp. 729, 747, 748, 750, 799; Le Quien, p. 1099, § 14.)

5. But missionary zeal is "essentially the child of faith," and has depended, in all ages, on the varying spirituality of the several branches of the church. The great evangelising efforts of the early church were mainly those of the West. The Thebaid, it is true, sent forth its hosts of monastic missionaries, who penetrated the country districts of the East, which still remained sunk in idolatry, even when Christianity had been acknowledged and protected by the state, and sowed the seeds of knowledge in the region of Phœnicia, on the one side, and beyond the Euphrates on the other. But even before the famous churches of the East had become the prey of the anti-Christian armies of Mahomet, lethargy and inaction, as regards Christian missions, crept over them, and the work either ended altogether or notoriously declined. "One by one, that glorious centre of light, knowledge, and life, which the Anthonys, the Hilarions, the Basils, the Chrysostoms had animated with their celestial light, were extinguished, and disappeared from the pages of history. Eastern monachism could neither renovate the society which surrounded it, nor take possession of the pagan nations, which snatched away, every day, some new fragment of the empire." (Montalembert, Monks of the West, i. 376, 377; Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 34; Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 163.)

6. And even when we pass to the West, we must not expect speedy or immediate results. Herself scarcely recovering from the shock of change, the church found herself confronted with strange nations, of strange speech, and still stranger modes of life, who poured forth to fill the abyss of servitude and corruption, in which the empire had disappeared. They overran Gaul, Italy, Spain, Illyria, all the provinces in their turn. Chaos seemed to have come back to earth, and the agitations of society needed to be allayed, before mission work could be organized, or even effectually commenced.

7. But even now efforts were not wanting to deal with the inveterate paganism of the old world and the torrent of the northern invaders. From the islet of Lerins, off the roadstead of Toulon, where, in A.D. 410, a Roman patrician, Honoratus (S. Hilarii Vita S. Honorati, ap. Bolland, t. ii. Januar.), found a monastic home, went forth an influence, which created numerous missionary centres in Southern and Western Gaul, and sent bishops to Arles, Avignon, Lyons, Troyes, Metz, Nice, and many other places, who proved themselves at once the lights of their own dioceses, and the leading missionaries of their day amongst the outlying masses of heathendom.

8. When Clovis, in A.D. 493, became the single sovereign of the West who adhered to the confession of Nicaea, it might have been expected that the work of the numerous emissaries from Lerins would have been supplemented by the newly kindled ardour of the Frankish church.^a

And for a time orthodoxy advanced side by side with Frankish conquests. But the wars and dissensions of the successors of Clovis were not favourable to the development of Christian missions. Avitus of Vienne; Caesarius of Arles, and Faustus of Riez, proved what might be done by energy and self-devotion. But the rapid accession of wealth more and more tempted the Frankish bishops and abbots to live as mere laymen, and so the clergy degenerated, and the light of the Frankish church grew dim. Not only were the masses of heathendom lying outside her territory neglected, but within it she saw her own members tainted with the old leaven of heathenism, and relapsing in some instances into the old idolatries. (Perry's Franks, p. 488.)

9. A new influence was, therefore, needed if the heathen tribes of Europe were to be evangelised, and He who had said, "Behold, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. xxviii. 20), did not fail His church. He called the men who were to do the work, from two sister isles, high up in the northern seas, which had almost been forgotten amidst the desolating wars of the Continent. It was in the secluded Celtic churches of Ireland and the Scottish Highlands that the beacon was kindled, which, in the words of Alcuin, "caused the light of truth to shine to many parts of the earth."

10. Three well-marked stages distinguish the missionary history of the fifth and three following centuries:—

(a) A.D. 430–650.—While continental Europe was still agitated by the inroads of swarming tribes of barbarians, Ireland, unvisited by strange invaders, drew from its conversion by St. PATRICK an energy which was simply marvellous. A burst of popular enthusiasm welcomed his preaching, and Celtic Christianity flung itself, with a zeal that seemed to take the world by storm, into battle with the mass of heathenism which was rolling in upon the Christian world. COLUMBA, the founder of Iona, and the Apostle of the Albanian Scots and Northern Picts; Aidan, the Apostle of the Northumbrian Saxons; COLUMBANUS, the Apostle of the Burgundians of the Vosges; Callich, or GALUS, the Apostle of North-Eastern Switzerland and Alemannia; KILIAN, the Apostle and Martyr of Thuringia; VIRGILIUS, the Apostle of Carinthia, are but a few out of many,^b who were raised up to pour back with interest upon the Continent the gifts of civilisation and the Gospel. "Armies of Scots" crowded to the shores of Europe. From the Orkneys to the Thames, from the sources of the Rhine to the shores of the Channel, from the Seine to the Scheldt, the missionary work of the "Scot" extended, nor did it hesitate to brave the dangers of stormy and icy seas, in bearing the message of the Gospel to the Farœe Isles, and even to far distant Iceland.

(b) A.D. 596–690.—Again, when the conquest of Britain by the pagan English had "thrust a wedge of heathendom" into the heart of the great Christian communion of the West, and the British church failed to evangelise her pagan invaders, GREGORY the Great sent AUGUSTINE to the "men of Kent." Thus, in the very year that Columba breathed his last, the Roman missionaries landed, and slowly but surely won their way. Any ground they lost was more than recovered by the missionaries from Iona, who planted churches in the wilds of Suffolk (Bede, H. E. iii. 19), and on the coast of Essex, converted Mercia (Bede, H. E. iii. 21), and made Lindisfarne to Northumbria (Bede, H. E. iii. 13) what Luxeuil was to Switzerland. The disciples of Columba and the disciples of Benedict met in the land of the fair-haired Saxon boys, whom Gregory encountered in the forum of Rome (Bede, H. E. ii. 1), and between them not only won it over to the faith, but prepared its sons to transmit the light they had received to the heathen tribes of still pagan Germany.

^b Thus Fridolin (Acta SS. March 6) laboured in Subbia and Alsace; Magnold (Acta SS. April 26) founded a monastery at Fingen; Trudpert penetrated as far as the Black Forest, where he was murdered. See A. W. Had-dan's Scots on the Continent, Remains, p. 265.

(c) A.D. 620-755.—For, thirdly, when the Teuton of the Continent was crying from his native forests, like the Macedonian of old, "Come over and help us" (Acts xii. 9), eminent Anglo-Saxon missionaries flocked forth to rival the zeal of the followers of Columbanus in seeking the conversion of their kinsmen according to the flesh. Ground was first broken by the enterprising WILFRITH, who in his flight from his English diocese, in A.D. 678, was flung by a storm on the coast of Friesland, where he was hospitably received by the native chief, Aldgis, and appears to have reaped a harvest of conversions. (Bede, v. 19; Vita S. Wilfridi Episcopi, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii.) His work was taken up about twelve years afterwards by WILLEBRORD,^c a native of Northumbria, who, having been a student in one of the Irish monastic schools under Ecgberht, agreed, at his suggestion, to select eleven companions, and made the neighbourhood of Wilteburg, Utrecht, the chief scene of his labours (Vita S. Willibrordi, in Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii.; Annales Xantenses in Pertz, ii. 220; Bede, H. E. v. 10). His mission attracted many English helpers from their native land. Two brothers, named HEWALD, attempted to preach the word to the "old" or continental Saxons (Bede, H. E. v. 10), and sealed their devotion with their blood; SWITHBERT, having been ordained a missionary bishop by Wilfrith (Acta SS. Bened. iii. 586), laboured amongst the Boructuarians, whose territory lay between the Ems and the Yssel; Adelbert,^d a prince of the royal race of Northumbria, selected the north of Holland as the scene of his toils; Werenfrid made Elste his headquarters; Plechelm, also, Otger and Wiro, came forth to labour amongst the natives of Gueldres (Lingard, Anglo-Saxon Church, ii. 334); while Wursing,^e a native of Friesland, and other pupils of Willebrord, enlarged materially the sphere of his operations.

But the vast Teutonic pagan world had as yet been but partially assailed. The task of encountering German idolatry in its strongholds was reserved for a man of Devonshire, the well-known Winfrith, or as he was afterwards called BONIFACE (Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 334 sq.; cf. Bonifacius, der Apostel der Deutschen, Seilleurs, Mainz, 1845). He came forth first to help Willebrord at Utrecht, then to labour in Thuringia and Upper Hessa, then to do for Germany what Theodore had done for England, consolidate the work of earlier missionaries, and impart to the churches new stability and life. From England he attracted numerous and enthusiastic helpers. His kinsmen Wunibald and Willibald (Acta SS. Bened. III. ii. 176), their sister Walpurga, with thirty companions, and many others, crossed the sea, and shared the work in Germany, where, even before Boniface fell a martyr on the shores of the Zuyder Zee, the church had advanced beyond its first missionary stage. Monastic seminaries, as Amöneburg and Ordurf, Fritzlar and Fulda had risen amidst the Teutonic forests. The sees of Salzburg and Friesingen, of Regensburg and Passau, testified to his care of the church of Bavaria; the see of Erfurt told of labours in Thuringia, that of Buraburg in Hesse, that of Würzburg in Franconia; while his metropolitan see at Mainz had jurisdiction over Worms and Spire, Tongres, Cologne, and Utrecht. (Willibald, Vita S. Bonifacii, § 22; comp. Vita S. Columbae, Reeves, Adamnan, pp. 245, 299; Vita S. Willibrordi, Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. p. 354; Bede, v. 10.)

11. Two classes of missionaries were thus engaged in the conversion of Europe. The one laid the foundations, the other raised the superstructure. The first were mostly hermits and ascetics, the second disciples of Benedict, gifted with greater power of practical organisation, and a deeper knowledge of human nature.

(a) The Celtic pioneers.—Strange, indeed, to heathen Suevians and Alemannians must have appeared the Irish and Caledonian missionaries. Travelling generally in companies^f—their outfit a short pastoral staff (Cambuta Jona, Vita S. Columbae; Reeves, Adamnan, p. 324), a wallet containing food, a leathern bottle for water or milk (Vita S. Columbae, ii. 38), a case for the service books,^g they took ship and landed either at one of the ports along the mouths of the Loire, or one of the harbours of Flanders. Thus, after paying their devotions at the shrine of St. Martin of Tours, or St. Hilary of Poitiers, they would hurry on to the nearest frontier of heathendom from the Vosges mountains along the Rhine to the lake of Constance, or in the Jura. Before long the scene under the oaks of Derry or in sea-girt Hy was reproduced in the heart of Europe.^h At Annegraz and Luxeuil, the huts were of willow, switches, and brushwood; the (Hattener, Denkmäler, i. 227, 237; see also a curious paper on the Chronicon Jocelini de Brakelonda, printed by the Camden Society, 1840.)

^d He also was a Northumbrian (Bede, v. 11).

^c See the account of him in the Vita S. Liudgeri, c. 1-4, in Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 405, 406. Willibrord was also assisted by Wulfram, bishop of Sens. (Vita S. Wulframmi, Acta SS. Bened. saec. iii. i. 342.)

little chapel, with the round tower or steeple by its side;¹ the refectory, the kitchen, the byre for the cattle, the barn for the grain, and other buildings. Here these "soldiers of Christ,"² as they loved to style themselves, settled down, and lived and prayed and studied and tilled the waste. Men of learning, devotion, and singular missionary zeal, they soon impressed the hearts of wild heathen tribes. Hundreds flocked to listen to their religious instruction. Hundreds more, encouraged by their example, took to clearing and tilling the land. Luxeuil became the missionary capital of Gaul, and sent out its colonies into Burgundy, Rauracia, Neustria, Brie, Champagne, Ponthieu; reproduced the Scottish Brechin and Abernethy at St. Gall and Bobbio, and forced the careless Frankish churchmen for very shame to rouse themselves to the duties of missionary work.

(b) The English missionaries.—Thus these Celtic pioneers laid the foundations. Exacting ascetic, they awed the heathen by their indomitable spirit of self-sacrifice, and the sternness of their rule of life. The singular success of their missions in Northumbria and Mercia, Essex and Suffolk, was even more completely realised on the continent; Luxeuil began with thatched hovels, poverty, and hunger; it ended by becoming the University of Burgundy and France. But the work, great as it was, lacked the element of permanence, and it became clear that if Europe was to be carried through the dissolution of the old society, and missionary operations consolidated and united, the rigours of the rule of Columbanus must be softened, and a milder and more practical system must be inaugurated, before the Teuton of the German forests could be effectually evangelised. The crisis was a momentous one, but it had already produced a Benedict. With his marvellous genius for organisation, he arose to inaugurate a new missionary era, and to give to missionaries a more definite unity of plan. [BENEDICTINE RULE AND ORDER.] And now, just when they were most wanted, his disciples, the sons of the new-planted English churches, came forth to their Teutonic kinsmen. Teutons themselves, they were fitted, like no others, to be the apostles of Teutons. The monastic missionary became the coloniser.³ The labours of WILFRID and WILLIBROD, in Frisia, were quickly supplemented and absorbed by the work of the great Apostle of Germany. What BONIFACE did at Fulda is a type of what the English Benedictines did everywhere. With practised eye they sought out the proper site for their monastic home; saw that it occupied a central position with reference to the tribes, amongst whom they proposed to labour, that it possessed a fertile soil, and was near some friendly water-course. (Comp. the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, so graphically described in the Vita S. Sturmii, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii.) These points secured, the word was given, the trees were felled, the forest was cleared, the monastic buildings rose. The voice of prayer and praise awoke unwonted echoes in the forest glades. The brethren were never idle; while some educated the young, whom they had often redeemed from death or torture, others copied manuscripts, illuminated the missal, or transcribed a gospel. Others, again, cultivated the soil, guided the plough, planted the apple-tree or the vine, arranged the beehives, erected the water-mill, opened the mine, and thus, with wonderful practical aptitude for the work, presented to the eyes of men the kingdom of Christ, as that of One who had redeemed the bodies no less than the souls of His creatures.⁴ No wonder that the efforts of St. Boniface and of his enthusiastic followers attracted the hearts of the heathen tribes. "The experience of all ages," it has been remarked, "teaches us that Christianity has only made a firm and living progress, where from the first it has brought with it the seeds of all human culture, although they have only been developed by degrees" (Neander, Light in Dark Places, p. 417).

12. Thus the prominence of the monastic orders in the missionary work of this period is clearly marked. Monasticism founded the Celtic churches in Ireland and Scotland; fled with the British churches to the fastnesses of Wales and Cumberland, from the Saxon invaders; returned with Augustine to the coast of Kent; with Aidan peopled the Farne Islands; with Columbanus penetrated the forests of Switzerland; with Boniface civilised Thuringia and Frisia; with Sturm cleared the forests of Buchonia, and made Fulda an outpost of civilisation for the Teuton tribes, with its dom-church and schools, library and farmsteads, the influences of which were felt for years and years afterwards. But however the seeds of the gospel may have been sown in any place, whether by the influence of a Christian queen, or the faithfulness of Christian captives, uniformly, in conformity with apostolic practice, the management of the infant churches was entrusted to a local episcopate. Sometimes a bishop headed, from the first, the body of voluntary adventurers. More often, as soon as any considerable success had been achieved, one of the energetic pioneers was advanced to the episcopal rank, and in this capacity superintended the staff of clergy accompanying him,⁵ and as soon as possible ordained a native ministry from amongst the newly converted tribes, and established a cathedral, or corresponding ecclesiastical foundation. (Comp. the consecration of Swithbert by Wilfrid for the mission in Friesland. Bede, H. E. v. 11.) Such a provision had recommendations of a most practical character. Already, before the inroad of the new races, the bishops had become not only a kind of privy council to the emperor, but were regarded in well nigh every town as the natural chiefs. They governed the people in the interior of the city; they alone stood bravely by their flocks when the barbarous host appeared before the defenceless walls; they alone, while the civil magistrate and military leaders often sought refuge in flight, were found able and willing to mediate between their people and the heathen conqueror. It is no wonder, then, that on the conversion of any district, the native king or chieftain was glad to have near him one who could assume the functions of the pagan high priest, and was bound by the duties of his office to stand between the noble and the serf, and defend the helpless and distressed, and intercede for the criminal. [BISHOP.] Nor were the bishops' diocesan synods unimportant agents in developing missionary work. We find them from time to time not only settling ecclesiastical questions, but grappling with grave moral and social evils. We find them forbidding the sacrifice of men and animals in honour of the heathen gods; the exposure of weak or deformed infants; the worshipping of groves and fountains; the practice of idolatry and witchcraft (Vita S. Bonifacii, c. 8; Conc. Turon. c. 22; Conc. Germ. c. v.). We find them inculcating a due regard for the sacredness of human life, striving to abolish slavery, to elevate the peasant classes, and to secure regular forms of law (Greg. Ep. ii. 10, vi. 12; Bede, H. E. iv. 13; Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon Institutes, ii. 314).

⁵ Even in the Columban monasteries there were always bishops connected with the society, subject to the abbat's jurisdiction, who were assigned their stations, or called in to ordain, being looked upon as essential to the propagation of the church. (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 341; Todd, St. Patrick, 4-10.)

13. It is true that the converts, in whose interest these enactments were made, were too often admitted into the church by national and seemingly indiscriminate baptisms. Still it is to be borne in mind that the missionaries of the period had unusual difficulties against which to contend. Not only was society generally relaxed, not only were the recipients of the rite bound by peculiar ties to their native chiefs, but they were in a position very different from the converts of the apostolic age. No preparatory dispensation had made monotheism natural to them, or taught them, "line upon line," those elementary truths, which appear to us so easy to apprehend, because we have lived in an atmosphere permeated with their influence. They were not "proselytes of the gate," but infants in knowledge and civilisation, and they were admitted to "infant baptism" by teachers often themselves imperfectly educated, but who were "faithful in the few things" they did know, and were so made, in time, "rulers over many things."

14. We have, however, traces of a system of missionary instruction which is well-deserving of attention. From first to last it was pre-eminently objective. It dealt mainly and simply with the great facts of Christianity, with the incarnation of the Saviour, His life, His death, His resurrection, His ascension, His future coming, and then it proceeded to treat of the good works which ought to flow from a vital reception of these truths. Thus—

(a) To the Celtic worshippers of the powers of nature, and especially of the Sun, the Apostle of Ireland proclaimed the existence of one God, the Creator of all things, and then went on to dwell upon the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of His only begotten Son Jesus Christ, who is the true Sun, who was in the beginning before all, unbegotten, and from whom all things take their beginning, both visible and invisible. (S. Patricii Confessio; O'Connor, Script. Hibern. i. pp. cxviii., cxvii.; comp. also what is known as St. Patrick's Hymn, Todd, pp. 426-428.)

(b) Similarly, Augustine, in Kent, directed the attention of the royal worshippers of Woden and Thor to the picture of the Saviour on the cross (Bede, H. E. i. 25; Vita S. Augustini, ii. 16), and then, according to subsequent tradition (recorded by Alfric and expanded by Jocelin, Migne, Patrologia, saec. vii. 61), went on to tell him of such events in His wondrous life as were likely to make an impression on his mind; how for us men, and for our salvation, He became incarnate; how at His birth a star appeared in the East; how He walked upon the sea and calmed the storm; how at His death the sun withdrew his shining; how He rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and will come again to judge the quick and the dead.^a

(c) The arguments of Oswiu, king of Northumbria, in his exhortation to Sigebert, king of Essex, are mainly directed to the strain of the old Hebrew prophets against the absurdities of idolatry, and the folly of a system which taught the worship of deities that might be broken, absent, or trodden under foot. From the adoration of such gods he bids his royal brother turn to the true God, the Creator of all things, who is invisible, omnipotent, eternal, who will judge the world in righteousness, and reward the good with everlasting life.

(d) The correspondence of Daniel, bishop of Winchester, with his friend and fellow-countryman, the martyr Boniface, is very remarkable. While deprecating any violent and useless declamation against the native superstitions, he suggests to the great missionary that he should put such questions as would tend to suggest the contradictions of heathenism, especially in reference to the genealogy of the gods, the temporal disadvantages which pagan superstitions entailed upon those who held them, and so lead on his hearers gently to Christian truth. (See Migne, Patrologia, saec. viii. p. 707.)

(e) The fifteen sermons of the great Apostle of Germany shew that he required of his converts something far more real than a merely superficial form of Christianity. The subject of the first is the "right Faith," in which he expounds the doctrine of the Trinity, the relation of baptism to the remission of sins, the resurrection of the dead, the future judgment, and the necessity of repentance. The second, preached on

^b Bede, H. E. iii. 22. Though, during the mission of Paulinus in Northumbria, Coifi, the chief priest, regards the new faith as merely worthy of a trial, like the systems of heathenism, and a question of temporal advantage, yet it is counterbalanced by the parable of the thane on the belfress and uncertainty of life, which strikes a deeper chord and betrays a yearning for the gospel of a life beyond the grave. (Bede, H. E. ii. 13.)

Christmas Day, is concerned with the creation of man, his fall, the promise of a Saviour, His advent, and the story of Bethlehem. The fourth treats of the "Beatitudes;" the fifth, of "Faith and the Works of Love;" the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, of "Deadly Sins and the Chief Commandments of God;" the tenth and eleventh treat more fully of Man's Fall, of the Redemption wrought by Christ, His Sufferings, Death, Resurrection, and Future Coming. (Ib. saec. viii. 813.)

(f) Further information on the same point is supplied in the correspondence of Alcuin with the emperor Charlemagne.^p In teaching those of ripe years, he says that order should be strictly maintained, which the blessed St. Augustine (de Catechizandis Rudibus) has laid down in his treatise on this subject. (1.) A man ought first to be instructed in the immortality of the soul, in the future life and its retribution of good and evil. (2.) He ought, secondly, to be taught for what crimes and sins he will be condemned to suffer hereafter, and for what good works he will enjoy eternal glory. (3.) He ought most diligently to be instructed in the doctrine of the Trinity, in the advent of the Saviour, His life, passion, resurrection, ascension, and future coming to judge the world. Strengthened and thoroughly instructed in this faith, let him be baptized, and afterwards let the precepts of the gospel be further unfolded by public preaching, till he attain to the measure of the stature of a perfect man, and become a worthy habitation of the Holy Ghost.^q

15. Of vernacular translations, indeed, of the Scriptures and Liturgy, except in the Eastern church, we find, naturally, little trace in the missionary annals of this period.^r Ulphilas, indeed, composed an alphabet for his Gothic converts, and translated for them the Scriptures into their own language, but it does not seem to have occurred to the missionaries of the West that this was one of the most important requisites for following up oral instruction.^s All languages besides Latin and Greek they deemed barbarous, and shrank from giving them a place in the sacred services of the church. It is with misgiving that we think of Augustine at the court of Ethelbert, addressing his hearers through "the frigid medium of an interpreter." It is easier to imagine how Boniface and his disciples,^t coming forth from the first Teutonic church, which remained Teuton, found access, through their own tongue, to the hearts of the tribes of Germany. Still, even in the English church, the mother-tongue was never entirely banished from the services. The Synod of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) enacted that the priest should learn to translate and explain in the native language the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the sacred words used at the celebration of the mass, and, in the office of baptism, while individual prelates insisted on the need of clergy able to instruct their people in the elements of Christian knowledge. (Spelman, Concilia, p. 248; Johnson, English Canons, i. 247; comp. Bede, Ep. ad Egbertum, § 3; and Charlemagne, Capitul. § 14; i. 505.) A short form of abjuration of idolatry and declaration of Christian faith in the vernacular language is preserved among the works of Boniface (Migne, Patrologia, saec. viii. 810), and the work of Ulphilas for the Goths was followed up in some measure by Aldhelm's version of the Psalter (Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. i. 222), and Bede's version at least of the Gospel of St. John, while Caedmon's Metrical Paraphrase was an earnest of the new grandeur, depth, and fervour which the German race was to give to the religion of the East. (Bede, H. E. iv. 24; Caedmon's Paraphrase, ed. Thorpe, p. 47.)

16. One point more remains to be noticed. It is impossible to pass in review the missionary history of the church from the sub-apostolic age to that of Charlemagne, without being struck with the slow and gradual steps by which each important triumph of the faith was won. The conversion of Europe, for instance, is sometimes spoken of as though it was an event of speedy accomplishment. It requires an effort to realise the fact that the close of the eighth century, to which our review has brought us, did not see even the half of Europe won over, even in the most nominal form, to the Cross of Christ. The whole of the great Scandinavian peninsula, all Bulgaria, Bohemia, Moravia, Russia, Poland, Pomerania, Prussia, and Lithuania remained to be evangelised. In most of the countries no missionary had ever set foot, or if he had, was obliged to retire at once before the furious opposition of heathen tribes. Even at the close of the fourth century, after Christianity had enjoyed, during more than sixty years, the sunshine of imperial favour, the Christians at Antioch, a city which had well-nigh greater spiritual advantages than any other, constituted only about half of the population (Chrysostom, Op. tom. ii. 567; vii. 810), and more than fifty years after the conversion of Constantine, the cultivated and influential classes of old Latin Rome still remained heathen,^u while the word "peasant," synony-addiscere. Novum quoque ac Vetus Testamentum, in quantum sufficebat, lectionis assiduitate in cordis sui thesaurum recondere curavit." (Vitis S. Sturmii Abbatis, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 366.)

^u In the 5th century Leo, bishop of Rome, deprecates the deep corruption even of Christian society, and adjures his flock not to fall back into heathenism. The old heathen cultus, particularly that of the sun (Sol invictus) had formally entered itself into the Christian worship of God. Many Christians, before entering the basilica of St. Peter, were wont to mount the platform in order to make their obeisance to the rising luminary. (Merivale, Conversion of the Northern Nations, p. 179.)

^p Comp. Ep. xxxvii. Ad Dominum Regem, de subjectione Hunnorum, et qualiter docendi sint in fide, et quis ordo sit servandus.

^q This doubtless in his school at York Alcuin himself taught Alubert and Liudger, when they returned from their labours in the Frisian mission field. (Vita S. Liudgeri, Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii. 407.)

^r The Eastern church acted as if by intuition from the beginning, on the principle that the language of every nation, not one peculiar to the clergy, is the proper vehicle for public worship and religious life. (Stanley, Lectures on the Eastern Church, p. 309.)

^s Gibbon, iv. 33; Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language, p. 175; Davidson, Biblical Criticism, p. 676. This same feeling led, also, in the East to the Coptic, Armenian, and Ethiopic versions of the Scriptures.

^t The course of instruction preparatory to missionary work which Sturmii underwent is worthy of notice: "Psalmis tenaci memoria traditis, lectionibusque quam plurimis perenni commemoratione functis, sacrum coepit Christi per Scripturam spirituali intelligere sensu, quatuor Evangeliorum Christi mysteria studiosissime curavit mous with "unbeliever," tells its own tale. Slow, however, as was the actual rate of progress (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii. 225), there never was a period during these centuries when the flood was not really rising, though the unobservant eye might not detect it. Periods of marvellous acceleration are followed by periods of no less singular retardation, and in the darkest times there were ever some streaks of light, and the heaven destined to quicken the mass of society was never wholly inert or ineffectual. Who, in the fifth century, would have believed that in the wild destroyers and supplanners of the ancient civilisation of Rome were the fathers of a nobler and grander world than any that history had yet known? This wonderful transition is now a thing of the past. It is an accomplished fact. But it was a transition which, as we have seen, was slowly and gradually brought about. Shall we be surprised if, in this matter of slow development, the history of Christian missions should repeat itself? [G. F. M.]

MISSIS, martyr; commemorated in Cyprus Feb. 20 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

MISSORIUM. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vi. 2) tells us that Chilperic shewed him "missorium magnum quod ex auro gemmisque fabricaverat in quinquaginta librarum pondere." Flodoard also (Hist. Remen. ii. 5) speaks of a silver-gilt missorium given to the church of St. Remi at Reims. A missorium is defined by Macro (Hierolex. s. v.) to be "vas seu theca;" by Ducange (Gloss. s. v.) to be "lanx seu discus." The weight of 50 pounds seems excessive for a plate or paten, and suits better the notion of a shrine or reliquary. Dom Bouquet (on Gregory, l. c.) says that some take missorium to be an "abacus cum omni suppellectile." [C.]

MITRE (κιδάρις; Mitra, Tiara, Infula). The allusions to a head-dress of any description worn by Christian ministers as part of their official dress, which we meet with during our period of 800 years, or indeed before A.D. 1000, are decidedly rare; and as a rule must be considered of very doubtful character. These we shall presently discuss at length, but we shall speak briefly first of the head-dresses worn by Jewish priests and high-priests, since some would maintain that there is a distinct continuity between the Jewish and Christian churches in the matter of vestments.

The cap worn by ordinary Jewish priests is called מִנְיָעָה (Exod. xxviii. 40, xxix. 9, xxxix. 28; Lev. viii. 13), for which the LXX gives κιδάρις, a word which we shall have to consider subsequently in its Christian connection. It was made of fine linen folded together several times and fitting closely to the head (Josephus, Antiq. iii. 7. 3, where see Havercamp's note)^b. Josephus speaks of it as πῆλος ἄκανος, and compares it to a στέφανη; but the exact shape is not certainly known, whether it be a high conical cap, rounded off at the top (so Bock, Liturg. Gewänd. vol. i. p. 346 and plate ii. [which is reproduced in Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, plate viii.], following Braunius, de habitu sacerdotum Hebræorum, p. 518, who, however, does not speak very definitely: also Hefele, Beiträge, vol. ii. p. 225), or, as Marriott (p. 234), more like a skull cap, fitting to the shape of the head, "like a sphere divided in twain."

The cap of the high priest is styled מִצְנֶפֶת (Exod. xxviii. 4, 37, 39; xxix. 6; xxxix. 28, 31; Lev. viii. 9; xvi. 4), for which the LXX gives μίτρα or sometimes κιδάρις. The meaning of the root verb is to wind, the cap being doubtless akin to what we should call a turban. This, like the cap of the high-priest, was made of fine linen, but differed from it (to say nothing of a difference in general shape), in that on the front of it was a plate of gold (פִּיִּץ; in the LXX πέταλον; in the Vulgate lamina) attached to a band of blue lace, whereby it was fastened to the mitre. On this plate was engraved Holiness to the Lord. The description of Josephus (Ant. iii. 7. 7; see also Bell. Jud. v. 5. 7) refers to a triple crown worn over the linen cap, doubtless a later addition to the original form, and probably implying a quasi-royalty on the part of the wearer.

We now pass to the Christian church. Here the two most commonly found terms for the ecclesiastical head-dress are mitra and infula, though, as we have already implied, early satisfactory instances of their use are hardly forthcoming. The general history and usage of the two words is curiously unlike. The Greek word μίτρα is connected with μίτρος a thread, and has the two meanings of a girdle and a head-dress. Confining ourselves to the latter sense, we find the mitra as a cap worn by women. Thus Isidore of Seville (Etymol. xix. 31, 4) says of it "est pileum Phrygium caput protegens, quale est ornamentum capitis devotarum. Sed pileum virorum est, mitrae vero feminarum."^c It was worn also by Asiatics without distinction of sex, and seems, as we may infer from Isidore, to have been specially characteristic of the Phrygians (see e.g. Virg. Aen. ix. 616).^d We have already referred to the use of μίτρα in the LXX, and in the Vulgate we find mitra as one of the renderings of מִצְנֶפֶת (e.g. Exod. xxix. 9), the καὶ τὴν μίτραν it is more probable that the order of the two words has merely been interchanged, for it will be noticed that the first is plural and the second singular, instead of vice versa.

^b Josephus speaks of it as μασναεμφθής. This is of course the Hebrew מִצְנֶפֶת, which is the term for the mitre of the high-priest. Probably by the time of Josephus the word was used in a wider sense, and so we find it in Rabbinic Hebrew.

^c A mitra, in addition to a veil, was placed on the head of a virgin when she was consecrated to a "religious" life (Martene, de Rit. Eccl. II. iv. 13).

^d This cap will be remembered by its revival during the first French revolution.

^a In one passage (Exod. xxxix. 28 [xxxvi. 36, LXX]) it would seem at first sight that μίτρα was their rendering, but it seems to us that in the expression τὰς κιδάρεις...

other words put for it being cidaris and tiara.

Totally different in its origin from the mitra, the cap of women and effeminate men, is the infula, the fillet which decked the head of heathen priests and sacrificial victims. It is thus defined by Servius, "fascia, in modum diadematis a quo vittae in utraque parte dependent, quae plerumque lata est, plerumque tortilis de albo et cocco" (in Virgil. Aen. x. 538; see also Isidore, Etyim. xix. 30, 4, where the above definition is cited). We several times find Virgil speaking of the sacrificing priest as wearing the infula (e.g. Aen. ii. 430, x. 538). Again, the victims about to be sacrificed, whether beasts or men, were decked with the infula (Virg. Georg. iii. 487; Lucretius i. 87; Suet. Calig. 27). In the last cited passage, the case is that of a gladiator, who, having been guilty of cowardice, was "verbenatus et infulatus" prior to execution.

We shall now proceed to consider, seriatim, the cases adduced of the use of some kind of head-dress as part of the official dress of the Christian ministry in primitive times. The earliest instance is one which can perhaps hardly be strictly called a head-dress, but is sufficiently near to justify its presence here, and concerns no less a person than the apostle St. John. The passage in question occurs in a letter sent by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, to Victor, bishop of Rome (A.D. 192-202), on the subject of the Eastern controversy (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24; also cited in part, iii. 31: cf. also Jerome, de Viris illustribus, c. 45), in which he cites the names of different Asiatic bishops and martyrs who are claimed as having held to the Asiatic practice. Amid this enumeration we read, "Yea moreover John too, he who lay on the Lord's breast, who became a priest wearing the golden plate (ὅς ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορεκώς), and a witness and a teacher—he sleepeth in Ephesus." Before expressing any opinion as to the meaning of this passage, we shall cite a somewhat parallel instance from a later writer, Epiphanius. The reference has here been to Christ, as heir of the throne of David, which is a throne not only of royalty but also of priesthood. The Saviour thus stands at the head of a line of high-priests; James, the Lord's brother, being, as it were, successor, in virtue of his apparent relationship, and thus becoming bishop of Jerusalem and president of the church. "Moreover also we find that he exercised the priestly office after the manner of the old priesthood; wherefore also it was permitted to him once in the year to enter into the Holy of Holies, as the law commanded the high-priests, according to the Scripture. For so many before our time have related concerning him, as Eusebius*, and Clement and others. Further, it was permissible for him to wear the Golden Plate^e upon his head (ἀλλὰ

* This allusion is perhaps to be referred, considering the mention of the πέταλον that follows, to the above-cited letter of Polycrates. The passage of St. Clement, however, does not appear to be extant.

^e Binterim (Denkw. i. 2. 352) cites from the proceedings of the eighth general council (fourth of Constantinople, A.D. 869), from a letter of Theodosius, patriarch of Jerusalem, to Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, in which the writer says that he sends as a present the long robe and superhumeral and mitre (mitra in Anastasius's Latin), adding that his predecessors had been successively decked καὶ τὸ πέταλον ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς ἐξῆν αὐτῷ φέρειν), as the above-mentioned trustworthy writers have testified." (Haer. xxix. 4; vol. i. 119, ed. Petavius.)

The word πέταλον, it will be remembered, is that employed by the LXX to designate the יָצַב worn on the high-priest's forehead, and there can be no doubt, therefore, when we consider that the LXX would be the ordinary Bible of Polycrates and Epiphanius, that the meaning intended to be conveyed is either that these apostles actually wore on their foreheads a gold plate, in direct imitation of that of the Jewish high-priest^h, or that the language is distinctly and wholly metaphorical, meaning that each of these two apostles occupied in his turn the same position to the Christian church that the Aaronic high-priest had to the Jewish church. The question, it is evident, must mainly turn upon the words of Polycrates, whose position, both in date and locality, would make him an important witness as to St. John. Here, though it is impossible to feel positive and maintain that St. John certainly wore no such ornament, we feel that it is far more likely that the language is to be viewed as allegorical—(1) because of the allegorical character of the passage generally [cf. e.g. μεγάλα στοιχεῖα κεκοίμηται, etc.], on which see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 345 n. (ed. 4); and (2) because the perfect participle seems very strange, if it were merely meant to indicate that St. John was in the habit of wearing the πέταλον. If that participle points rather to "a state or condition resulting from a past act," then the statement becomes simple enough if we assume that Polycrates aims at bringing out the fact of "the supreme apostolic authority of St. John, whose office in the Christian church was to bear rule in spiritual things over the spiritual Israel, even as the high-priest of old over Israel after the flesh" (Marriott, p. 39 n.). One thing, at any rate, is plain enough: if St. John and St. James, or either of them, did wear this ornament, it was an ornament special to themselves, and ceased with them, affecting in no sense the further use of the church.

The next instance we shall cite is from the oration delivered by Eusebiusⁱ on the consecration of the great church at Tyre (Hist. Eccles. x. 4). This highly rhetorical discourse begins with an address to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, and his assembled clergy, as "friends of God and priests (ἱερεῖς), who are clad in the holy robe that reacheth to the feet, and with the heavenly crown (στέφανον) of glory, and with the unction of inspiration (τὸ χρίσμα τὸ ἐνθεον) and with the priestly vesture of the Holy Ghost." Here with this sacred garb (Labbe, viii. 987). In any case, however, a late 9th-century tradition such as this need not detain us.

^h It may be noted that in translating the extract from Polycrates, Jerome renders πέταλον by lamina, the word he had used in the Vulgate for the gold plate of the high-priest.

ⁱ Hefele (p. 225) remarks that though we are to take the πέταλον of St. John in its technical sense, neither Polycrates nor Eusebius asserts it to have been of gold. This, however, seems needless quibbling; if the word is supposed to be used technically the rest will follow.

^j There can be no reasonable doubt that by the τὸς παρελθὼν Eusebius simply means himself. Hefele (Beiträge, p. 226) strangely makes Paulinus the speaker.

the rhetorical character of the whole discourse suggests that the above words are by no means improbably used in quite a figurative sense, and have reference to the spiritual characteristics of the new covenant, in contradistinction to the externals of the old. Hefeles too, who argues strongly for the early use of the mitre, is not disposed to claim this passage in support of his view, but is evidently inclined to explain the στέφανος of the tonsure, which often goes by that name. At any rate, it is clear that no very certain conclusions can be built upon this example. Our next passage is in some respects similar. It occurs in one of the discourses of St. Gregory of Nazianzum (ob. A.D. 389), where he addresses his father, then bishop of Nazianzum, who sought to associate his son with him in the duties of his office. In the course of this he remarks, "therefore thou anointest the chief priest, and clothest him with the robe reaching to the feet, and settest the priest's cap [τὸν κίδαριον; one of the LXX words, it will be remembered, for the priestly and high-priestly head-dresses] about his head, and bringest him to the altar of the spiritual burnt-offering, and sacrificest the calf of consecration, and dost consecrate his hands with the Spirit, and dost bring him into the Holy of Holies." (Orat. x. 4; Patrol. Gr. xxxv. 829.) This citation may perhaps be assumed as evidence for the use of some kind of clerical head-dress in St. Gregory's time, but of what kind, or under what conditions worn, or whether the whole passage is to be viewed as allegorical, must remain doubtful. Much certainly in the passage is highly figurative, as the allusion to the calf, and to the Holy of Holies; which, so far as it goes, would be distinctly in favour of the latter view.

Some writers cite as evidence for the early use of some kind of mitre, a passage from Ammianus Marcellinus (xxix. 5), where he describes the outbreak of an African chief, named Firmus (A.D. 372). Against him was sent Theodosius, afterwards emperor, by whom the rising was completely crushed, and Firmus compelled to sue for peace. The historian, a heathen, speaks of the sending of "Christiani ritus antistes, oraturos pacem." Two days after, Firmus restored "Icosium oppidum . . . militaria signa et coronam sacerdotalem cum caeteris quae interceperat." When Hefeles (p. 227) can remark on this that thereby "is plainly meant the Infula of that bishop whom the heathen Africans had shortly before slain in the regions of Leptis and Ona" (op. cit. xxviii. 6), it may most decidedly be objected—(1) that the connecting of the two events, and indeed the assumption that the person slain (Rusticianus sacerdotalis) was a Christian, or that, if a Christian, he would have a "crown" at all, is a distinct begging of the whole question; and (2) that it is far more reasonable to understand by the corona sacerdotalis (the phrase used, it will be remembered, by a heathen) the golden crown, which abundant illustrations shew to have been worn by heathen priests. (See e.g. Tertullian, de Spectaculis, c. 23; de Idololatria, c. 18 [where see Oehler's note]; de Corona Militis, c. 10. We may also appeal to a canon of the council of Elvira, which is sufficiently curious to be given at length: "Sacerdotes qui tantum coronam portant, nec sacrificant, nec de suis sumptibus aliquid ad id

Equally inconclusive, in our opinion, is the series of passages quoted by Hefeles and others, in which the infula is mentioned in connexion with Christian vestments. In classical usage, the word infula was not confined to the more special meaning we have already dwelt on, but drifted into the meaning of ornaments and insignia of magistrates, or even into that of a magistracy itself. [See examples quoted from the imperial codes and elsewhere, in Forcellini s.v.] In later ecclesiastical Latin again, we find the word distinctly used for a chasuble (see e.g. Hugo de S. Victore Spec. Eccl. 6, Patrol. clxxvii. 353; see also Ducange s.v.), apparently as being the official vestment par excellence. We should thus be prepared to argue that, in the absence of evidence pointing the other way, the natural explanation to give to these earlier allusions to a Christian infula is that the word betokens, in a half poetic sense, the official dress, and indeed hardly more than the quasi-official position of ordained persons. The allusions cited are the following. The Christian poet Prudentius, when dwelling on the names of famous martyrs connected with the city of Saragossa, says (Peristeph. iv. 77 sqq.)—

"Inde, Vincenti, tua palma nata est,
Clerus hic tantum peperit triumphum,
Hic sacerdotum domus infulata

where the concluding reference is to Valerius, bishop of Saragossa. The whole poem, however, is written in a highly-wrought strain of metaphor, and is a palpable imitation of classical imagery. This is quite sufficient to shew that no special stress can be laid here on the word infulata.

About a century later Gelasius (ob. A.D. 496) speaks of certain characteristics in a person rendering him "clericalibus" infulis [where the plural is noticeable] reprobabilem (Epist. ix. ad episcopos Lucaniae, § 9; Patrol. lix. 51). Again in a biography [Hodegoricon] of Willibald, a disciple of St. Boniface, written by a contemporary nun of Heidenheim, it is remarked on the consecration of Willibald as a bishop, that "sacerdotalis infulae ditatus erat honore" (c. 11; in Canisius, Thesaurus ii. 116). In a biography of Burkhard of Würzburg, another disciple of St. Boniface [probably written two hundred years after the time of St. Boniface, but before † Hefeles dwells on the adjective clericalibus, as implying a head-dress distinct from that worn by laymen, and cites Ducange (Glossarium, s. v. infula) who quotes the order of a synod which prohibits clerics from wearing an infula "de seta sive serico more laicali." Again, an ancient statute ordains that, except in case of necessity, clerics are not to wear "vestes saeculares," or "infulam seu pileum de die in capite," and, in case of disobedience, beneficed clergy are to be fined a year's income. On this it may be remarked that (1) the date of the above mentioned synod is given by Ducange as A.D. 1311, and the statutes are of the date A.D. 1289 (Martene, Anecd. iv. 671), and therefore are not relevant to the present matter; (2) the prohibition in the former citation evidently refers to the material of the infula; and (3) to allow that at a given time clerics wore head-dresses of a different shape from laymen, is quite a different thing from allowing that the head-dress formed a part of the official dress entered in any sense into official ministrations.

A.D. 984; Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands ii. 314], Burekhard is spoken of as "pontificali infula dignus" (see Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vol. vi. 574), and the then pope is said to be "summi pontificatus infulae non incongruus." On all the above instances it may be remarked that while they allow us to explain them if we will of a Christian official head-dress, they most certainly cannot be considered as evidence compelling us to such a belief; and in the absence of any direct trustworthy evidence from ancient pictures of the existence of such a head-dress, and considering the known later use of the term infula, we cannot but feel that the probability inclines strongly against those who claim the above series of passages as establishing the ancient use of a mitre.

Two more passages which have been cited are absolutely of no weight. The first is a line from Ennodius, a poet of the fifth century, with reference to St. Ambrose, "Serta redimitus gestabat lucida fronte" (Epig. 77; Patrol. lxiii. 348), but the context, even the following line alone, serves to shew that we are dealing with metaphor and not with fact—"distinctum gemmis ore parabat opus." Finally, in a poem (Parænesis ad Episcopos) of Theodulf of Orleans (ob. A.D. 821), we are met with the line, "Illius ergo caput resplendens mitra tegebat" (lib. v. carm. 3, sub fin.; Patrol. cv. 360). The whole context, however, as Marriott has plainly pointed out, is dwelling on the contrast between the splendour of the Jewish high-priestly dress and the spiritual character which should be the ornament of the Christian minister. This contrast is elaborately worked out, and the line immediately following the one we have quoted is "contegat et¹ mentem jus pietasque tuum."

On a general survey of the foregoing evidence, it may, at any rate, be safely asserted that no case has been at all made out for a general use of an official head-dress of Christian ministers during the first eight or nine centuries after Christ. Many of the passages adduced in favour of such a view have been shewn to be, if not quite inconclusive, at any rate of very doubtful character. Hardly one can be called definite, plain or positive. Also, if direct evidence is sought on the other side, we may again appeal to a treatise of Tertullian we have already cited (de Corona Militis, c. 10). The words "Quis denique patriarches . . . quis vel postea apostolus aut evangelista aut episcopus invenitur coronatus?" ought to be definite enough, as shewing the usage in his time. When, further, as we have already remarked, the remains of early Christian art, which can really be considered trustworthy, furnish no evidence whatever for the use of such a head-dress, but distinctly point the other way; we feel, that while not venturing altogether to deny the possible existence, of a local or temporary kind, of a mitre or head-dress, here and there, we may still fairly say with Menard that "vix ante annum post Christum natum millesimum mitrae usum in ecclesia fuisse" (Greg. Sac. 557). Menard justly insists on the fact that in numerous liturgical monuments (e.g. a mass for Easter Day in the Cd. Ratoldi [written before A.D. 986], where the ornaments of a bishop are severally gone through), as well as in writers who have fully entered into the subject of Christian vestments, as Rabanus Maurus, Amalarius, Walafrid Strabo, Alcuin (Pseudo-Alcuin), there is no mention whatever of a mitre.

Even a writer as late as Ivo of Chartres (ob. A.D. 1115), while describing the Jewish mitra, makes no mention of its Christian equivalent. There are good grounds, however, for believing that at first the mitre was an ornament specially connected with the Roman church, from whence its use spread gradually over Western Christendom, though this use had evidently not become universal in Ivo's time. We shall very briefly cite an instance or two to illustrate this Roman connexion. The following is the earliest adduced:^m when the archbishop Eberhard of Treves was at Rome in A.D. 1049, Leo IX. placed on his head, in St. Peter's on Passion Sunday, the Roman mitre. The pope's words in the charter are "Romana mitra caput vestrum insignivimus, qua et vos et successores vestri in ecclesiasticis officiis Romano more semper utamini." (Ep. 3; Patrol. cxliii. 595; cf. also Ep. 77, op. cit. 703, where the same privilege is granted to Adalbert, bishop of Hamburg. We there read of the mitre, "quod est insigne Romanorum.") Again, a few years later, in A.D. 1063, Alexander II. granted to Burchard, bishop of Halbestadt, the privilege of wearing the archiepiscopal pallium and mitre, because of his special services to the Roman see. We cite in this case a clause of some interest, as shewing the concession of the use of the Roman mitre as not confined to the episcopal order: "Insuper mitras tibi ac successoribus tuis ac canonicis excellentioribus, scilicet presbyteris et diaconis in missarum solemnia ministraturis, subdiaconis in majori ecclesia tua et suprascriptis festivitatibus portandas concedimus" (Ep. 10, Patrol. cxlvi. 1287). In A.D. 1119, Calixtus II. grants the use of the "episcopalis mitra" to Godebald, bishop of Utrecht (Ep. 37; Patrol. clxiii. 1130). One more example may suffice. Peter Damian, in an indignant letter (c. A.D. 1070) to Cadalous, bishop of Parma, who was the anti-pope Honorius II., says scornfully, "habes nunc forsitan mitram, habes juxta morem Romani pontificis rubram cappam" (Epist. lib. i. 20; Patrol. cxliv. 242).

Any discussion as to the variation in form and material of this later mitre is quite beyond our purpose; suffice it to say that while the description of Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animæ, i. 214; Patrol. clxxii. 609), in the twelfth century, still seems to point to a cap made of linen (*mitra ex bysso facta*ⁿ), that of Innocent III. in the thirteenth, shews that in the case of the bishop ⁿ See for an example probably of this type, Marriott, plate xlv. (and cf. p. 220), figured from a MS. of the 11th century. This is the earliest example of the kind known to Marriott, except perhaps one in the Benedictional of St. Ethelwald, a MS. of the 10th century. Here, however, the figure wears a kind of gold circlet, which may indicate royal rank and not be an ecclesiastical head-dress in the strict sense at all.

^m A possibly earlier instance is referred to by Marriott (p. 241), from a coin of Sergius III. (ob. A.D. 911), where the mitra is said first to appear as replacing an older papal head-dress, the Camelaucium. This, however, must perhaps not be pressed in the absence of confirmatory evidence.

of Rome, at any rate, it was made partly of gold, and approximated to its later shape (de sacro altaris mysterio, i. 60; Patrol. ccxvii. 796).

It will have been observed that nothing has been said as to the restriction of the use of the mitre to the highest order of the clergy. On this, however, it can only be remarked that, as far as the first eight centuries at least are concerned, practically nothing from the whole of our scanty body of evidence is adducible. The mention of the infula in the life of Willibald has sometimes been cited, but we have already seen how slight is the basis on which the whole argument in connexion with the word infula rests.

In conclusion, the practice of the Eastern church may be most briefly referred to. Here the mitre, properly speaking, is unknown, and thus we find Symeon, archbishop of Thessalonica in the fifteenth century, declaring that all ecclesiastics, whether bishops or priests, except only the patriarch of Alexandria,* performed the sacred rites without any covering on the head (Expositio de divino templo, c. 45; Patrol. Gr. clv. 716; cf. Responsa ad Gabrielem Pentapopolitanum, c. 20, ib. 871. Reference may be specially made to Goar, Euchologion, p. 314). In the Armenian church, however, bishops have, it is said since the eleventh century, worn a kind of mitre, apparently in imitation of Rome, the priests of that church wearing a kind of bonnet.

A passing allusion may be made here to the mitra virginum, mentioned by Isidore of Seville, which appears to have been worn in addition to the veil by those who made profession of virginity. Isidore remarks that such a person, "because she is a virgin, may display the honour of a hallowed body 'in libertate capitis' [cf. ἐξουσία, 1 Cor. xi. 10] and 'mitram quasi coronam virginalis gloriæ in vertice præferat'" (de Eccl. Off. ii. 17. 11; Patrol. lxxxiii. 807). Again, in a letter of St. Remigius of Rheims, to Clovis, condoling with him on the death of his sister Albfleda, who had died shortly after baptism, he says of her, "fragrat in conspectu Domini flore virginitatis, quo scilicet et corona, quam pro virginitate suscepit" (Ep. 1; Patrol. lxx. 965). The use of the mitra by professing virgins is alluded to by Optatus (de Schismate Donatistarum, ii. 19; Patrol. xi. 973; also vi. 4, ib. 1072, where see Dupin's note).
